7. Within a few months of my 1997 annual performance evaluation, I reached my goal of becoming zone manager (similar to a department manager), when I applied for and received the position of zone manager of infants. I was evaluated on my performance in this position in July 1998. I continued to be rated as "above standard." I also continued to use the evaluation as an opportunity to remind Wal-Mart of my career goal to be promoted within the company. This time I wrote that I "would like to move up in management." See Jeanette Connaker's July 1998 Associate Evaluation, a true and correct copy hereto attached as Exhibit C.

8. Throughout my employment with Wal-Mart I tried to talk to my store's District Managers about getting into the Management Training Program. Both District Managers told me that I would have to relocate out of state to enter the program. I never saw a man relocate out of state when he entered the program. However, I was willing to consider relocation in order to become assistant manager and even spoke to Co-Manager Barry Barger about relocating to New Mexico.

9. When I talked to Co-Manager Barry Barger about entering the Management Training Program he told me to keep working, I was almost there. In the summer of 1998 Mr. Barger transferred to a store in New Mexico. I talked to him when he was in New Mexico about transferring into the Management Training Program in New Mexico. Mr. Barger told me I would have to transfer to New Mexico as a department manager. I did not want to take the chance of moving to New Mexico for just another hourly position and only the hope of a promotion. Therefore I decided not to make the move.

10. On September 17, 1998 I received a Great Job Award from Executive Vice President Tom Coughlin, Senior Vice President Kendall Schwindt and the Regional Vice President for my performance as zone manager of infants during Wal-Mart's Baby Week. The award states that Wal-Mart was recognizing me for "exceeding . . . [Wal-Mart's] expectations above and beyond!" Wal-Mart rewarded me with a Great Jobs button to wear on my uniform and one share of Wal-Mart stock. See September 17, 1998 Great Job Award and Letter from Kendall Schwindt, a true and correct copy hereto attached as Exhibit D.

11. My performance continued to catch the attention of Wal-Mart. In January 1999 I received a merit raise for developing the infants department into "one of the best departments, nationally." Mike Potter, my co-manager, filled out the Associate's Commendation Form. Mr. Potter praised me for increasing sales in my department by 19% and contributing almost a half million dollars in profit to the store over the past year. He also commended me for consistently placing either first or second in sales volume for the district and also for creating a stable associate team in my department, marked by little turnover. See January 17, 1999 Associate's Commendation Form, a true and correct copy hereto attached s Exhibit E.

12. Less than one month later, in February 1999, I was chosen as Associate of the Month for my store.

13. In March 1999, a support manager position became available. I immediately applied because I had been looking for an opportunity to reach my goal of becoming a support manager. At the time I applied for the support manager position, I had four years experience with Wal-Mart, I had held three different management positions with Wal-Mart, and I had received two awards and a merit raise in those management positions. However, I was not even interviewed for the support manager position. Brian Brown, a young male, was selected for the support manager position instead of me. Mr. Brown had worked at Wal-Mart for less than a year as a stocker in the lawn and garden department. He had never held a management position with Wal-Mart.

14. After Wal-Mart overlooked me for the support manager position, I approached co-manager Mike Potter. I told him I wanted to know why I had not been interviewed for the position. I also told him I was upset that the support manager position had been given to a male associate who had less experience than me. Mike Potter became irate after I mentioned a male had been chosen for the position. He did an about-face and told me that my performance evaluations were overstated and I was not worthy of a support manager position. He told me I would never move up within the company. Soon thereafter Mr. Potter gave me my first written coaching.

15. I then went to another co-manager and complained about not being interviewed and Mr. Potter's reaction to me, but the co-manager just ignored me. Then suddenly, two or three days after I complained that the support manager position was given to a less experienced male, Wal-Mart placed a female customer service manager in an overnight support manager position. This sudden, new support manager opening had never been posted.

17. In July of 1999 I received my last evaluation with Wal-Mart. I was rated as "exceeds expectations," the highest rating possible. Although I felt that Wal-Mart's decision to promote Mr. Brown instead of me and Wal-Mart's subsequent poor treatment of me indicated that they may never promote me, I still let Wal-Mart know that I was seeking a promotion during my evaluation. I noted that I wanted to "continued to learn and grow with Wal-Mart [and I] would still like to work toward support manager or assistant manager." See Jeanette Connaker's July 1999 performance evaluation, a true and correct copy hereto attached as Exhibit F.

18. During the first week of September 1999, I spoke with Kent Grier, assistant manager of softlines about not receiving the support manager position in March. Our District Manager was touring the store and I asked Mr. Grier if it would do any good to complain to the district manager about the position being given to Brian, who was less qualified than me, before I was even interviewed. Mr. Grier told me that talking to the District Manager would be pointless. I was not going to get promoted.

19. After my conversation with Mr. Grier I was convinced that despite my hard work and my great performance evaluations I was not going to get promoted. I gave Wal-Mart my notice and then left Wal-Mart to pursue college coursework.

20. During my five years with Wal-Mart there were no female co-managers and there were no female store managers of my store. There were no female district managers in my store's district.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Texas that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on March 30, 2003 at Round Rock, TX.

I, Rita Coones, declare:

1. I make this declaration on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I was employed by Wal-Mart, Inc. in Austin, Texas from September 9, 1995 through October 15, 1999. I am female.

3. My initial assignment was as a stocker in the Receiving Department on the night shift. My job consisted primarily of unloading trucks and stocking merchandise into the correct storage locations. At the time I was hired, I was the only female on the night receiving team.

4. On my ninety day review, I received an "above standard" evaluation and a $0.35 an hour raise. This increased my initial pay rate from $6.50 to $6.85 an hour. One month later, in December 1995, I received another $0.20 an hour merit raise for my "hard work on night receiving" and "in appreciation and recognition of [my] capabilities." (Attached hereto as Coones Exhibit A is a true and accurate copy of the Commendation Form dated December 1995.). This raised my pay to $7.05 an hour.

5. Throughout the time I worked as a stocker, I observed that men were allowed to operate the forklift while female associates were not. Although I asked Store Manager Scott Sloan to be trained in the use of the forklift, he denied my requests without any explanation. I learned from my female co-workers, Dawn Luna and Cindy Brown, that they too had been denied training on use of the forklift when they worked as stockers. As I could not use the forklift, my ability to perform my tasks was by necessity dependent upon the cooperation of the male employees who had been provided the forklift training. I was not able to do all the tasks that the men in the Receiving Department could do, and I felt I was viewed as not as capable an employee.

6. In 1996, I asked Store Manager Sloan to be promoted to the support manager position for the night Receiving Department. I was qualified for this position because I had already been working there for one year. Store Manager Sloan gave the position to Mike [last name unknown]. Instead of a promotion, Store Manager Sloan moved me to a day receiving position in "directs." This position required me to scan merchandise that came in through the back loading area. It did not involve unloading trucks or stocking merchandise.

7. On my annual evaluation in September 1997, I received another "above standard" ranking and in the comments section, I wrote: "My goal is to move up (Support Team Manager) . . . ." (Attached hereto as Coones Exhibit B is a true and accurate copy of my 1997 performance evaluation.) I also told Store Manager Sloan during our discussion of this evaluation that I wanted to advance with the company. I asked him what I could do to move up but he ignored my question and did not respond. Later, when two support manager positions opened up in the Receiving Department that year, I told Store Manager Sloan that I was interested in these promotions. I was not offered either position even though by now, I had been working in day and night receiving for about two years and was very capable of performing the support manager position. Instead, Store Manager Sloan again promoted two men into these positions, neither of whom, to my knowledge, had any prior experience working in Wal-Mart's receiving departments. One of the men who received the support manager position was Mike [last name unknown] who had worked in the Furniture and Sporting Goods Departments. He was fired after approximately three months in the position of support manager. As best I recall, the first name of the other man who was promoted over me at that time was Rodney. I no longer recall his last name or prior position.

8. In 1998, another night support manager position opened up in the Receiving Department. I again informed Store Manager Sloan that I wanted to apply for the position. Prior to promoting a male into the night support manager position, Store Manager Sloan offered me the position of Department Manager of Lingerie. I told him that I would prefer the support manager position in receiving. He told me that he would prefer me in lingerie and that is the job I received. The Lingerie Department consisted exclusively of female associates and female department managers. With this promotion, I received a $0.50 an hour raise so that my pay rate was $8.50 an hour.

9. On my annual evaluation that same year, I again expressed interest in promotion. In the comments section, I wrote: "I will strive for excellence in my department . . . . I also would like to move up in the Company as a Support Manager and then a[n] Asst. Mgr." (Attached hereto as Coones Exhibit C is a true and accurate copy of my 1998 performance evaluation.) During my meeting with Store Manager Sloan regarding this evaluation, I again asked him what I could do to move up in the company. As before, he just ignored this question.

10. On my annual evaluation the following year, 1999, I continued to express my interest in promotion. I wrote: "Thank you for having given me the chance to exceed and give Wal-Mart my full attention. My goals are to advance in the Wal-Mart Company." (Attached hereto as Coones Exhibit D is a true and accurate copy of my 1999 performance evaluation.) Again, Store Manager Sloan brushed me off when I asked him how I could advance with the company during our meeting regarding this evaluation.

11. Despite my track record of average or above average performance evaluations and written and verbal requests for advancement opportunities, I was never promoted above an hourly department manager position and my pay rate, after four years, remained below $10.00 an hour at $9.50. In October 1999, I left Wal-Mart because I did not feel there was any future for me there.

12. At no point during my employment at Wal-Mart did any manager inform me that Wal-Mart had a Management Training Program or how I could be considered for, or apply to, this program. I was never provided any information about the program in writing and I do not recall the program being posted on any store bulletin boards or discussed in the daily store meetings. Had I known of a Management Training Program, I would have expressed interest in participating. Had there been an application available, I would have applied to join.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of California that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on 4-21-03, 2003, at Butte County.

RITA COONES, DECLARANT

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, EDITH ARANA, DEBORAH GUNTER, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, CLEO PAGE, KAREN WILLIAMSON, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiffs, v. WAL-MART STORES, INC.,	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF MARY CRAWFORD IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Mary Crawford, declare:

1. I am an African-American woman and a current employee of Wal-Mart. I reside in South Carolina.

2. I have worked at various Wal-Mart stores in North Carolina and South Carolina since 1988. I was told that I was ineligible for promotion to Assistant Manager because I was unable to relocate anywhere in the country, but I was then denied promotion to Assistant Manager in favor of a male employee with a similar work history who did not relocate. After I finally got promoted to Assistant Manager, I learned that I earned less than a male Assistant Manager with similar experience. I was retaliated against for using the Open Door Policy and forced to step down to Department Manager. After I was promoted again to Assistant Manager, I started to express interest in promotion to Co-Manager. Despite positive evaluations and open positions in my store, I have not yet been promoted. There are currently male Assistant Managers at my store, who have less or similar experience than I have, who earn higher salaries than I do.

3. I was hired as a Customer Service Manager at a newly opened Wal-Mart store in York, South Carolina, in 1988. On my application, I noted that I had received a certificate in retailing from York Technical College in 1978 and that I had previous retail experience. (True and correct copy attached hereto as Crawford Exhibit A.) After about a year and a half, I was promoted to Department Manager. Starting in 1989, I began expressing my interest in the Management Training Program. On my 1989 evaluation, I received an above-standard rating and I wrote, "I would like some day to be a dept. manager and later an assistant manager." (True and correct copy attached hereto as Crawford Exhibit B.) On my 1990 evaluation, I wrote, "I would like to . . . in the future go into the management training program." (True and correct copy attached hereto as Crawford Exhibit C.)

4. When I first expressed interest in an Assistant Manager position, District Manager Millard Hare told me that I would be required to relocate to other areas of the country. I told him that I was unable to move my residence at that time because I did not want my seven school-age children to have to change schools.

5. In 1991, a Resident Assistant Manager position became available at the York store. I had never previously been informed about the Resident Assistant Manager program, nor had I seen any written information about the program at the store, even though my managers knew I was both interested in management and unable to relocate. The position was not posted. I expressed my interest in the position to District Manager Hare, who told me that he had already selected a male employee, Clarence (Gordon) Welchel, for the position. When I asked Mr. Hare why Mr. Welchel was getting the position instead of me, Mr. Hare told me that Mr. Welchel deserved the position because he was the "head of his household." Mr. Hare told me that I did not "need" the position because I was a married woman.

6. Mr. Welchel only lasted in the position for about a month or two, after which he was demoted to Support Manager. After Mr. Welchel was demoted, I again expressed my interest in the position to District Manager Hare, who told me that the store was no longer going to have a Resident Assistant Manager. Mr. Hare did not explain why the position was being eliminated. I was not given an opportunity to apply. The elimination of the Resident Assistant Manager position from the York store made it seem like a position that Wal-Mart would use when it suited, rather than a formal company program.

7. I continued to express my interest in management positions. On my 1992 evaluation, on which I received an above-standard rating and a commendation for how well I managed the Cashiers, I wrote, "I hope that getting the [Cashier and Customer Service areas] running right . . . will help me get into the management program." On the same evaluation, Assistant Manager Troy Blackman wrote, "Mary is very capable of [illegible] management work. . . . I believe she is ready for management." (True and correct copy attached hereto as Crawford Exhibit D.)

8. In approximately 1992, I told our new District Manager, Richard Hinkebein, that I was seeking a promotion to Assistant Manager. Like Mr. Hare, Mr. Hinkebein told me I was not promotable because I could not relocate. Mr. Hinkebein did not discuss with me any other options and did not offer me a position as Resident Assistant Manager. He did not explain why there was no longer a Resident Assistant Manager position in the store.

9. Between 1991 and 1994, there were at least four open Assistant Manager positions at the York store. I was never encouraged to apply for any of those positions, nor were any of the positions posted. I was not told what I needed to do to become eligible for an Assistant Manager position.

10. In 1994, I was finally promoted to Assistant Manager at the York store, with the support of Store Manager Leonard (Keith) Parker. The position was not posted, and I was not interviewed for the position. I was not required to relocate. I was promoted directly to Assistant Manager and was not given any training through the Management Training Program. After I was promoted, male Assistant Manager Rickey Gainey told me that he earned a higher salary than I did. He had been promoted to Assistant Manager about a year before I was, after going through the Management Training Program.

11. In approximately 1995, a female Cashier at the York store told me that Store Manager John Locklear was sexually harassing her. As an Assistant Manager, I understood that I was required to take action on her complaint. I informed District Manager Michael Gillespie of the Cashier's complaint. I did this with some hesitation, as I had observed that District Manager Gillespie was a personal friend of Mr. Locklear. After another female employee also lodged a sexual harassment complaint against Mr. Locklear, Mr. Locklear was demoted and transferred out of the York store.

12. After Mr. Locklear was demoted, Mr. Gillespie began to harass and intimidate me on the job. It felt as though he was blaming me for Mr. Locklear's demotion. Although I had always received good evaluations and had no coachings as an Assistant Manager, Mr. Gillespie began to criticize my performance and blame me for errors in departments that were not my responsibility as Assistant Manager. I used the Open Door to discuss this with Mr. Gillespie, and let him know that his treatment of me was unfair and unjustified. Mr. Gillespie responded, "What are you going to do about it?" I took his comment to mean that he was going to continue harassing me in retaliation for reporting Mr. Locklear's behavior, and I felt that there was, in fact, not much I could do about Mr. Gillespie's treatment of me. I had already seen how male managers supported one another. In the face of Mr. Gillespie's direct threat to retaliate against me if I used the Open Door regarding Mr. Gillespie's behavior, I decided that I would probably lose my job if I used the Open Door again. Shortly after this conversation, I reluctantly requested and received a demotion to Department Manager. At the time I was separated from my husband and raising my children on one paycheck. I could not afford to lose my job.

13. Store Manager Parker, who had supported my original promotion to Assistant Manager, had transferred to a Wal-Mart store in Rock Hill, South Carolina. Mr. Parker found out that I had stepped down to a Department Manager position at the York store, and he offered me a Support Manager position in Rock Hill in June 1997. I accepted the transfer and promotion. Four months later, I was promoted back to Assistant Manager and transferred to a store in Charlotte, North Carolina.

14. At that point, I still intended to make a career in management at Wal-Mart. I identified my next step as promotion to Co-Manager, and I began to express interest in that position. In my nine years at Wal-Mart, I had never seen any written information about requirements for the job of Co-Manager, nor had I seen information about an application process. District Manager Hinkebein had told me that I would only be promoted to Co-Manager if I first worked as an Assistant Manager at a Supercenter. The Charlotte store was not a Supercenter. For that reason, I repeatedly requested a transfer to a larger store starting in about 1997. In 1998 my request was granted, and I transferred as Assistant Manager back to the Rock Hill, South Carolina store.

15. On each of my annual evaluations since 1998, I have written that my goal is to become a Co-Manager. (True and correct copies of 1999 and 2000 evaluations attached as Crawford Exhibits E and F.) Since 1998, there have been at least four openings for Co-Manager in the Rock Hill store. None of those positions were posted. Despite my positive evaluations and lack of disciplinary action, I was not interviewed for or offered any of those Co-Manager positions. In the four years I have worked at the Rock Hill Wal-Mart, this store has had six Co-Managers, only one of whom was a woman.

16. In approximately 2001, I used the "Management Career Selection" ("MCS") computer system at Wal-Mart to apply for an available Co-Manager position at a store in Columbia, South Carolina. The computer system blocked my application and reported that I was "not eligible" to apply for that position, but it did not give any further details about how to become eligible or why I was ineligible. After that experience, the "MCS" system seemed useless to me and I have not used it since. I have still not seen any written information on the requirements for promotion to Co-Manager.

17. For some time I have been aware of Wal-Mart's Rising Star program, whereby upper-level managers identify "highly promotable" employees who then receive priority for promotion. In 2002, Store Manager Chad Guest told me he was going to recommend me to District Manager Bob Davis for the Rising Star program. However, when I later reminded Mr. Guest that we needed to complete paperwork in order to add my name to the Rising Star program, Mr. Guest rescinded his promise. Mr. Guest told me that I was not performing well enough to qualify for the Rising Star program, even though I have consistently received positive evaluations. After Mr. Guest told me he would recommend me, I looked up the qualifications for the Rising Star program on Wal-Mart's internal computer system. The requirements included a certain level of evaluation rating and a certain level of sales. I know that I met the evaluation criteria, and District Manager Davis had recently complimented my sales performance to Co-Manager Dorsey Thomas from the York store. As far as I know, I have yet to be nominated as a Rising Star.

18. I have learned that at least three male Assistant Managers at the Rock Hill Wal-Mart, who have similar or less experience than I have, earn higher salaries than I do. I have been an Assistant Manager for seven years and my base monthly salary is about $3,200. Peter Espina has only been as Assistant Manager for about three years and his salary is higher than mine. Ronald Glock has only been an Assistant Manager for about one year and his salary is higher than mine. Dennis Smith, who recently transferred out of the Rock Hill store, has only been an Assistant Manager for about three years and his salary is higher than mine. I have been given no explanation for these pay inequities and know of no legitimate reason that these men should be paid more than me for doing the same job.

19. In my 15 years at Wal-Mart, I have received 17 evaluations, more than half of them with ratings of above standard or exceeds expectations. I have not received any formal discipline since 1994, when I was an hourly employee.

20. I am currently attending classes in child care at York Technical College. I have lost hope that Wal-Mart will ever promote me to Co-Manager, despite my qualifications and my loyalty to the company.

21. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and the State of South Carolina that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 10 (month and day), 2003, at Clover, S.C. (city and state).

I, Trudy Crom, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I began working at a Wal-Mart Store in Frisco, Colorado in 1990 in the snack bar making $6.25 an hour working full-time. Almost immediately, I expressed an interest in entering the management training program by speaking with any members of management with whom I came into contact. This included Store Manager Dennis Dean, District Manager Bill Moore, Assistant Managers Brian Wood and Michelle Koch, and Department Manager of Menswear Bonnie Larson. I also expressed my interest in writing in at least two evaluations while in the Frisco, Colorado Wal-Mart. In my 1990 evaluation, I wrote that I was interested in learning as much as I could in order to "move up the la[dd]er to ass[istant] manager." Attached hereto as Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of my 90-day Associate Evaluation, dated October 12, 1990. In my next evaluation, I wrote that "I would like to learn to do the Service Desk + Layaway [and] learn more about CSM job, so I can advance more in the store." Attached hereto as Exhibit B is a true and correct copy of my 6-month Evaluation, dated March 12, 1991.

3. In 1993, I still had not been promoted. I wrote a letter to Don Soderquist at Wal-Mart Headquarters in Bentonville, Arkansas about my frustrations regarding my promotional opportunities and lack of management support. I also expressed concern that, with job openings not being posted, I was not being given a fair chance to apply for positions. Attached hereto as Exhibit C is a true and correct copy of my letter to Don Soderquist dated July 22, 1993. Shortly thereafter, Store Manager Dean told me that the District Manager Buddy Caldwell was going to come into the store to speak with me about the letter. I never saw him in the store that day and he never discussed the letter with me.

4. Soon after, I began experiencing constant criticism from Store Manager Dennis Dean and Assistant Manager Cory Best. Both of them would walk around my department and berate me. On more than one occasion, Mr. Best humiliated me in front of customers and co-workers by loudly criticizing my department on the sales floor. Nothing like this had happened before I sent the letter. I repeatedly attempted to use the open door about the abusive conduct by speaking with District Manager Jim Mohan, Assistant Manager Brian Wood, and Softlines Department Managers Sharon Grove and Tracy Parmley but they were unresponsive. None of them agreed to do anything about the harassment that I was experiencing and none seemed to take it seriously. I found this extremely discouraging. In March 1996, after suffering through three years of constant harassment with no end in sight, I agreed to a $.75 pay cut, down to $9.25 an hour, in order to transfer to the Fort Collins, Colorado Wal-Mart Store as a Stocker.

5. Over the next three years at the Fort Collins, Colorado Wal-Mart as a Stocker and as the Department Manager of Shoes, I spoke regularly with Store Managers Bob Longnecker, Ed Hohlt, and Lonnie Hirth, District Manager Jim Mohan, Assistant Managers Jack Gunn and Rick Wilms, and the District Manager of Shoes and Jewelry Noel Mundy about my interest in the management training program. I spoke with them individually and during my evaluations. I also wrote in all of my evaluations that my goal was to advance in my career at Wal-Mart and to enter the management training program. In my 1997 annual evaluation, I wrote in the "Associate Comments/Goal Setting" section, "My goals in the company are to advance. I want to move up to the training program as an Assistant Manager of Division 1 . . ." Attached hereto as Exhibit D is a true and correct copy of my Annual Associate Evaluation dated September 12, 1996.

6. In 1997, I requested a meeting with District Manager Mr. Mohan about my Wal-Mart career goals. I again articulated my interest in becoming an Assistant Manager. Mr. Mohan asked if I would be willing to relocate and I told him I would. Even after the meeting and agreeing to relocate, I did not get into the management training program for another two years. In my 1997 annual evaluation, I wrote, "My goals are to try and go into management and hopefully do a real[ly] good job." Attached hereto as Exhibit E is a true and correct copy of my Annual Associate Evaluation dated August 12, 1997.

7. In 1998, I continued to inquire about promotional opportunities. I also continued to learn as much as I could about different departments in the hope that I would increase my chances of promotion. In my 1998 annual evaluation I wrote in the "Associate Comments/Goal Setting" section that "I hope that with all the cross training that I've been doing, it will help me some day soon get to my goal as a[n] Assistant Manager." Attached hereto as Exhibit F is a true and correct copy of my Annual Associate Evaluation dated August 12, 1998.

8. In 1999, I was told by Mr. Mohan and Store Manager Jon Ball that I could enter the management training program but, because relocation was required, I had to transfer to the Loveland, Colorado Wal-Mart Store. I accepted. Once my training was over, I was required to transfer to the Lafayette, Colorado Wal-Mart Store in order to become an Assistant Manager. I personally observed that Ted Vasquez, with whom I had been an hourly employee in the Fort Collins store, never had to relocate for management training or to become an Assistant Manager. Mr. Vasquez remained as a management trainee and Assistant Manager in the Fort Collins, Colorado Wal-Mart.

9. In addition, even with persistent inquiries and meetings with management expressing my interest, it took me nine years to get into the management training program. I know of at least one male, Mark Zens, with whom I worked in the Fort Collins Wal-Mart, who got into the management training program within five years of beginning his employment with Wal-Mart. He also became a Co-Manager in less time than it took me to even get into the training program.

10. In 2000, while I was Assistant Manager in Loveland, Colorado, I received what I believed to be an unfair coaching and subsequent demotion. In my 10 years with Wal-Mart, I had never received a coaching or any type of disciplinary action. All my evaluations as an Assistant Manager were rated "Exceeds Expectations." I believed I had followed management direction and that the situation was handled poorly by Store Manager John Murray and acting Store Manager John Engle. In June 2000, while Store Manager John Murray was away on vacation, he had given written instructions to all the assistant managers to perform coachings for those associates who worked overtime. After noticing that several associates had worked over 40 hours, I discussed the matter with acting Store Manager John Engle. Mr. Engle instructed me to give these associates coachings. After doing so, several associates complained to District Manager Mohan and myself about the coachings. I spoke with acting Store Manager Engle again and he reassured me that as long as I was consistent, the coachings should remain. When Mr. Mohan confronted both myself and acting Store Manager Engle about the coachings, Mr. Engle denied giving me instructions to give coachings to the associates. I tried to discuss the matter with Store Manager Murray when he returned from vacation but he refused to listen. It was at this time I received my first and only coaching. I felt I had been undermined and totally unsupported by management. I used the open door by speaking with Regional Vice President Buddy Caldwell (he had since been promoted) about my concerns. He told me he would look into it but he never got back to me. I then wrote and sent a certified five-page letter to Don Soderquist at Wal-Mart headquarters in Bentonville, Arkansas explaining what had happened and expressing my concerns. I never heard back from anyone. Attached hereto as Exhibit G is a true and correct copy of the letter that I sent to Don Soderquist in 2000.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Colorado that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on March 24, 2003, at Pierce, Colorado.

I, Darlene Crowder, declare:

1. I am a woman and a former Wal-Mart employee.

2. I began working at Wal-Mart in July 1991. Prior to working at Wal-Mart, I had managed a Rite-Aid drug store for approximately two years. I also worked at the Ramada Inn for one year where I had managerial responsibilities.

3. Even though I had previously worked as a manager of a retail store, Wal-Mart hired me to work as an hourly employee at a Wal-Mart store in London, Kentucky. From approximately 1991 until 1999, I held various hourly positions, including sales associate, cashier, department manager and support manager. It took me eight years to get promoted to a salaried management position at Wal-Mart.

4. I repeatedly told Wal-Mart managers that I was interested in becoming a manager. At my hiring interview in 1991, I stated that I wanted to work in management. Early on in my career with Wal-Mart, I asked Assistant Manager Johnnie Flatt if he thought that I had the potential to be a manager. Mr. Flatt agreed that I did.

5. While I was an hourly employee, I always worked very hard and performed my job well. I was never disciplined. On my performance evaluations, I was consistently rated "above standard," "exceeds requirements," or "outstanding." I took on additional responsibilities, including writing the store's newsletter and serving on the safety team. In 1995, I was asked to assume the duties of an Assistant Manager assigned to the overnight shift for about three or four months when an Assistant Manager was on maternity leave. I was given a fifty cent per hour raise for assuming the Assistant Manager duties, bringing my wage to $7.50 per hour, but I was not paid a salary as other Assistant Managers were. I believed that my hard work and commitment to Wal-Mart's success would enable me to advance.

6. In approximately June 1995, I received an annual evaluation. At that time, I was working as a support manager, an hourly position. Assistant Manager Larry Holland wrote on the evaluation that I had worked hard to prepare myself for promotion and that I had the ability to go as far in Wal-Mart as I wanted. A true and correct copy of this evaluation is attached hereto as Crowder Exhibit A. The next steps would be the management training program and then an Assistant Manager position.

7. In early 1997, the support manager position was eliminated from the London store where I worked. Instead of promoting me into the management training program at that time, Wal-Mart demoted me to a department manager position. I was not told by my managers why I was not being promoted.

8. In late 1997, Store Manager Larry Ryan asked me whether I wanted to be promoted into management. I answered that I was very interested, but that I could not relocate my home because my mother, who lives in area, had been diagnosed with ovarian cancer. I was not promoted to the management training program until two years later, in 1999.

9. I am aware of three male employees -- Allen Otis, Steve Keeton, and Jimmy Lewis -- who completed the management training program and were assigned to stores which were located in places where I was able to work. In approximately 1992, Allen Otis completed the management training program in the London Wal-Mart store and became an Assistant Manager in the same store. In approximately 1994, Steve Keeton completed the management training program and was assigned to a Wal-Mart store in Williamsburg, Kentucky as an Assistant Manager. In approximately 1998, the personnel manager at the London store, Jimmy Lewis, was promoted into the management training program, and subsequently continued to work in the London store as an Assistant Manager on the overnight shift. That was the position that I had held temporarily in 1995 while an Assistant Manager was on maternity leave.

10. I never saw a posting or application for any of the positions described in the preceding paragraph. I did not know the positions existed until I heard that they were filled by the male employees whom I identified in the preceding paragraph. There may have been other openings for Assistant Managers within commuting distance of my home of which I was not aware. If I had been permitted to apply for those positions, I would have done so. I did not know what I could do to get promoted other than wait for an invitation.

11. From August 1999 until December 2001, I worked as an Assistant Manager for Wal-Mart. I was assigned to stores in Berea, Manchester, and Corbin, Kentucky. I also worked out of the District Manager's office where I trouble-shot on difficult stores. As an Assistant Manager, I was never disciplined and was always rated "exceeds expectations" on my annual evaluations.

12. Upon becoming an Assistant Manager, I began aspiring to become a Store Manager. In February 2000, I received my first annual evaluation as an Assistant Manager. I was rated "exceeds expectations." I wrote on that evaluation that I wanted to become a Store Manager. A true and correct copy of that evaluation is attached hereto as Crowder Exhibit B. On at least one occasion after receiving that evaluation, I was told by a Wal-Mart manager that I had to be willing to relocate my home in order to be promoted to a Store Manager position. Because I understood Wal-Mart's relocation policy to prohibit my promotion, I became discouraged about becoming a Store Manager, even though there were about seven Wal-Mart stores within commuting distance of my home.

13. In approximately June 2000, I was assigned to the Manchester, Kentucky Wal-Mart store. When the Store Manager, Marvin Bauman, took a leave of absence for approximately two weeks, I filled in as Acting Store Manager. I did not receive any additional compensation for assuming this responsibility. While I was Acting Store Manager, Regional Vice President Bill Dilaha visited the store. I later learned from District Manager Steve Falcon that Mr. Dilaha was extremely impressed with the store's condition.

14. While I was an Assistant Manager, I was designated a "Rising Star." I was never told how this designation would benefit me or how it would enable me to advance my career with Wal-Mart. When I worked in the district office, I saw a list of the Rising Star Assistant Managers in our district. Clark Susong and John Burton, both males, were on that list. Mr. Susong and Mr. Burton attended Wal-Mart's annual meetings in Texas. I was not invited to attend these meetings.

15. In approximately November 2001, District Manager Matt Belcher asked me to transfer laterally from the Wal-Mart store in Manchester to the Wal-Mart store in Corbin. I had reservations because the Corbin Store Manager, Brian Kitchen, had a reputation for disliking women. I agreed to transfer, despite my reservations, because I wanted to be a team player.

16. Wal-Mart stores receive what is known as a "UPI" rating. The UPI rating measures employee morale. A low UPI indicates high employee morale and, conversely, a high UPI indicates poor employee morale. At the time that I was transferred, the Manchester store had a UPI of approximately 8, while the Corbin store had a UPI of approximately 23, which is considered very high.

17. The Corbin store had a Store Manager, two Co-Managers, and approximately five Assistant Managers. With the exception of me, all of these managers were male. I replaced a female manager named Tiffany Gray. I suspected that I was transferred to the Corbin store to serve as a token female manager.

18. I was treated differently than the male Assistant Managers in the Corbin store. I frequently was required to oversee the front-end, in addition to my other areas of responsibility. I often had to respond to most of the customer calls. I often noticed the male Assistant Managers sitting around the office not working, when I was very busy. I did not feel that the male managers treated me as their equal.

19. Because of the discriminatory conditions that I experienced in the Corbin Wal-Mart store, on December 23, 2001, I resigned from Wal-Mart. After I resigned, I spoke with District Manager Matt Belcher. Mr. Belcher offered to demote me to an hourly position. He did not offer to place me in another Wal-Mart store as a salaried manager.

20. I am currently an Assistant Manager at Big Lots, another retail store. I would be interested in returning to work for Wal-Mart if I were guaranteed that I would be treated fairly, without discrimination, and with equal opportunities to advance.

21. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Kentucky that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 17, 2003, at Somerset, KY (city and state).

I, Laurie DeWall, declare:

1. I am a woman and a former employee of Wal-Mart.

2. I worked at a Wal-Mart store in Watertown, South Dakota, from July 2, 1990, to August 18, 2001. I worked in the Watertown store both as an hourly employee and later as a Resident Assistant Manager. I had no difficulty managing employees with whom I previously had worked as an hourly employee.

3. As detailed below, I received less thorough training than the male Assistant Managers I trained and worked with, resulting in lower evaluation ratings and lower annual pay increases than the male Assistant Managers received. Two male Assistant Managers in the Watertown store made more money than I did, both as trainees and as Assistant Managers, even though I had substantially more experience as a Wal-Mart employee and as an Assistant Manager than they had.

4. I started at Wal-Mart as a Cashier in 1990. In 1992, I was selected by an Assistant Manager to train as a Customer Service Manager in recognition of my excellent performance as a Cashier. The position of Customer Service Manager was not posted, and I do not remember being interviewed for the promotion. My promotion to Customer Service Manager sparked my interest in management positions at Wal-Mart. I wrote on my 1992 annual evaluation, "I am interested in how more [store] areas work together and why." (True and correct copy attached hereto as DeWall Exhibit A.) In 1994, I applied for promotion to Head Customer Service Manager. The position was posted, and I was chosen for the position after an interview with an Assistant Manager. In 1995, I was selected by Store Manager Charlene Walls for promotion to Support Manager, an hourly supervisory position. That position was not posted, and I was not interviewed.

5. During the years I worked as an hourly employee, I received eight merit raises, in addition to my annual pay increases. Store Manager Charlene Walls recognized that I was an asset to the company and in 1997 she wrote on my evaluation that I was ready for the Management Training Program. (True and correct copy attached hereto as DeWall Exhibit B.) I had never seen a written description of the Management Training Program, and I had falsely assumed that the Management Training Program required a college degree, which I did not have. Store Manager Walls explained to me that a college degree was not a requirement.

6. Store Manager Walls also told me about the Resident Manager Program, whereby I could be an Assistant Manager in the Watertown store, rather than relocating to another area. Watertown has been my home since 1975. My family and I have many ties there, including my husband's job as Deputy County Sheriff. After I learned about the Resident Manager Program, I was eager to be a manager at Wal-Mart. I interviewed with Store Manager Walls and District Manager Pam Casey in 1998, and I entered the Management Training Program in June or July 1998.

7. I was not allowed to do my training at the Watertown store. Instead, I was assigned to a store in Brookings, South Dakota, which is about an hour's drive from my house. I was not trained in the merchandising aspects of being an Assistant Manager. I was only trained in office procedures. I did not request to not be trained in merchandising. The lack of training I received in merchandising is reflected in my "Management Training Final Performance Appraisal Form," which states "no training in merchandising – only offices." (True and correct copy attached hereto as DeWall Exhibit C.)

8. I went back to the Watertown store as an Assistant Manager in August 1998. In early 2000, Ben Hoffmann was promoted from Management Trainee to Assistant Manager at Watertown. Mr. Hoffmann had worked as an hourly employee and as a Management Trainee at the Brookings store, which I know because he worked there as an hourly employee when I was a Management Trainee in Brookings. Mr. Hoffmann was allowed to train for management in the same store where he had been an hourly employee. In contrast, I was required to commute two hours every day to do my training in Brookings. I did not receive any extra compensation for the time I spent traveling.

9. I have learned that Mr. Hoffmann earned a higher salary as an Assistant Manager, even though he had less experience as a Wal-Mart employee and as an Assistant Manager than I had. In about March 2001, I had two and a half years' experience as an Assistant Manager, and my monthly salary was approximately $2,800. At the same time, with only one year's experience as an Assistant Manager, Mr. Hoffmann's monthly salary was approximately $2,900. (See Affidavit of Attorney Brad Seligman, filed herewith.)

10. I was an Assistant Manager at Watertown for three years. I spent 30 of those 36 months on the overnight shift. I did not receive any extra compensation or "shift differential" for working an overnight shift. No male Assistant Manager who I worked with during those three years spent as many months on the overnight shift as I did. Because I rarely worked day shifts, I was denied training that the male Assistant Managers received. Specifically, I was denied training in merchandising responsibilities, supervising Department Managers, and other duties of a day Assistant Manager. I was criticized on my annual evaluations for not knowing the duties of a day Assistant Manager – including the "Store Within A Store" program – but it was impossible to learn those duties on the night shift. (True and correct copies of two relevant performance evaluations attached hereto as DeWall Exhibits D and E.) When I complained to Store Manager Scott Ferguson about my schedule, he told me he was not going to make any changes. My lengthy assignment to overnight shifts led me to believe that I was not being groomed for a long-term management position at Wal-Mart, in contrast to the male Assistant Managers with whom I worked, who received more thorough training than I did.

11. In 2001, Store Manager Ferguson formally disciplined me for keeping three associates at work for an extra two hours each to cover for two employees who had called in sick. I believed the write-up was unfair. I used the "Open Door" and spoke to District Manager Steve Hanselman, who instructed Store Manager Ferguson to retract the write-up. After I complained to District Manager Hanselman, Store Manager Ferguson retaliated against me by threatening to take away my status as a Resident Assistant Manager and transfer me to Sioux Falls, South Dakota, which is almost a two-hour drive from my home. Store Manager Ferguson's threat to transfer me to Sioux Falls made it seem like the position of Resident Assistant Manager existed at the whim of management and was not an official Wal-Mart program.

12. After Store Manager Ferguson retaliated against me for using the Open Door with District Manager Hanselman, I never used the Open Door Policy again, even though I was frustrated by the length of time I had been assigned to the night shift. I eventually left Wal-Mart in August 2001, out of frustration over my schedule and my inability to get the training necessary to get higher evaluation ratings and higher pay raises.

13. After leaving Wal-Mart I got a job at First Premier Bank Card. I have received two promotions, and I am currently a top-level customer service associate.

14. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of South Dakota that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on 4-4 (month and day), 2003, at Watertown, S.D. (city and state).

I, Anna Dobbs, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I began working for a Wal-Mart Store in 1979 in Aberdeen, Mississippi as a sales associate in the Fabric Department making about $3.00 an hour. I was 20 years old and this was my first full-time job. I hoped to have a long-term career at Wal-Mart and always had the goal of advancing into management. I was department manager of Health and Beauty Aids in the Aberdeen Wal-Mart from approximately 1981 to 1992.

3. In 1992, I voluntarily transferred to the Amory, Mississippi Wal-Mart Supercenter because I thought this experience would be better for advancement in my career at Wal-Mart. Store Manager Bobby Shumpert told me I was responsible for the duties of both support manager and department manager of Health and Beauty Aids.

4. After I transferred to the Amory Supercenter in 1992, I began speaking with both Store Manager Shumpert and District Manager Eddie Williams about my interest in moving into management training. Mr. Williams told me that I would be required to relocate to Philadelphia, Mississippi to complete the training. I observed that Wanda Watkins was sent to Alabama for management training and, like myself, had a great deal of difficulty transferring back to the Amory or Tupelo stores even where positions became available.

5. I also know of several male employees who worked in the Amory Supercenter and were allowed to complete their management training and remain as assistant managers in the same store. Keith Sanders, Chuck Holcomb, and Carl Hayward all trained in the Amory Supercenter and remained there as assistant managers.

6. In 1995, 16 years after I started my career with Wal-Mart, District Manager Williams allowed me to enter the management training program because I agreed to relocate to Philadelphia, Mississippi. I left my 14 year old son and 74 year old mother behind in Amory in order to relocate to Philadelphia, Mississippi for management training. When I began the training program, Mr. Williams agreed to pay me a salary of $23,000. When I told him that that was less than what I made as a department manager with overtime, he offered me $24,500. I accepted. After I completed the program, I found out that the starting salary for an assistant manager trainee at that time was $27,500. I had always been told that I could be fired for discussing salary issues so I was afraid to tell anyone that I had been significantly underpaid.

7. When I entered the management training program in 1995, Mr. Williams assured me that, after training, I would be allowed to return to a Wal-Mart store that was closer to my teenage son and elderly mother. Six months later, when my training period was ending, assistant manager positions opened in two separate Tupelo, Mississippi stores, both of which would have been closer to my family. I asked Mr. Williams to be transferred to either store but he placed males Cornelius Thomas, Jeff Miller, and Joe Carter as the assistant managers in those stores. Jeff Miller was hired off the street to fill one of these assistant manager positions.

8. I remained as an assistant manager in the Philadelphia, Mississippi Wal-Mart for almost two more years. In 1997, I was finally allowed to transfer to one of the Tupelo Wal-Mart Stores that was closer but still 50 miles away from my family. I continued to ask Store Manager Howard Brandon and District Manager Williams about returning to the Amory, Mississippi Wal-Mart. At one point, Mr. Williams told me that if I didn't stop asking, he would ship me so far away that I would never get home. I was surprised by the forcefulness of this statement, especially since previous to my entering the management training program, Mr. Williams seemed supportive of my desire to work in a location that was close to my family. This statement intimidated me from asking for a while but finally, in 1998, three years after entering the management training program, I was allowed to transfer to the Amory, Mississippi Wal-Mart Store as an assistant manager. Within nine months, however, Mr. Williams transferred me again to another Tupelo, Mississippi Wal-Mart Supercenter. Based on Mr. Williams' previous attitude about my transfers, I did not believe I had a choice but to accept this transfer.

9. I had originally been very interested in pursuing a store management position and throughout my time as an assistant manager in Philadelphia and Tupelo, I was often sent to other stores in Alabama in order to help them straighten stockrooms and set up stores for perpetual inventory. When we were severely shorthanded, I consistently worked 60-70 hours a week overnights unloading pallets off of trucks. My performance evaluations also reflected my hard work and I regularly received exceptional reviews. I always believed this was an indication that I was doing an excellent job and was headed in the right direction for advancement into store management. Even so, Mr. Williams continued to verbally criticize my performance and often told me I should "just resign."

10. I finally realized that, without District Manager Williams' support, even after 20 years of hard work and commitment, I would never be given the opportunity to advance in my career at Wal-Mart. As a result, I decided to retire from Wal-Mart in 1999 and obtain work elsewhere.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Mississippi that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on March 26, 2003, at Aberdeen, Mississippi.

DECLARATION OF JULIE DONOVAN IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Julie Donovan, do hereby declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein. I am female.

2. I was employed by Wal-Mart in the Home Office from August 1996 until November 1997 as a Senior Buyer.

3. I graduated from Marymount University college with a Bachelor's degree in Fashion Merchandising in 1990. Prior to my employment with Wal-Mart I was in the executive training program at Macy's in New York and was later employed by Jamesway, in New Jersey, and Office Depot in Florida.

4. In August 1996, while working at Wal-Mart's Home Office in Bentonville, AR I was told by Ray Hobbs, Sr. Vice President and General Merchandise Manager, that he was surprised that I, as a woman, was in such a high position at Wal-Mart, and that it would be better if I were at home raising a family.

5. During that same time frame I was told by Mr. Hobbs, that I did not play well with the "boys" in the company. Specifically, I was told that because I did not hunt, fish, or do other typically-male activities, that I probably would not advance any further with Wal-Mart.

6. I met with Mr Hobbs for my performance evaluation in approximately October 1997. We were talking about the next position I could seek to advance my career and he said I should not worry about that, because "you aren't a part of the boy's club, and you should raise a family and stay in the kitchen" instead of seeking to advance my career.

7. I traveled to Kansas City twice for company-wide managers' meetings. I observed that approximately 85% of the managers present were men. When I attended these meetings, there were no other women from the department attending who I could share a hotel room with, and thus I had my own hotel room. Rather than recognizing that there were simply too few women in positions at my level, Kaman Wood, a buyer, made comments to the effect that I was receiving preferential treatment because I was a woman.

8. In order for me to engage other managers or upper level officials in conversation, the discussion generally had to be centered around hunting or sports-related topics to gain their respect. At one Kansas City managers' meeting I had to base my presentation on Monday Night Football to ensure my credibility with the other male managers.

9. I made informal comments to my supervisor Vice President and Divisional Merchandise Manager, Bill Long, about how I was being treated. He told me to shrug it off and that I needed to "have a thick skin." I also discussed my situation with Bill May, a buyer who is now a Vice President at Wal-Mart, and he told me the same thing as Mr. Long.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and of the State of New Jersey, that the foregoing is true and correct. I signed this on April 17 , 2003 in Mahwah, New Jersey.

I, Betty Dukes, declare:

1. I am a current employee at the Wal-Mart store in Pittsburg, California. I am 53 years old and have worked for Wal-Mart for almost nine years. I am paid $8.44 an hour. I am an African-American woman and a named plaintiff in this case.

2. Prior to my employment at Wal-Mart, I had many years of experience in the retail field. I had also been very active in my church. I had never been discharged from any position and, prior to my experience at Wal-Mart as detailed below, I had never been disciplined at any job.

3. I was hired by Wal-Mart in May 1994 and paid $5.00 an hour. Within the first 30 days of my employment, I asked Store Manager Rick Pace how I could advance in my career at Wal-Mart. Mr. Pace responded only by telling me to finish my first 90 days of employment. I received a good 90 day performance evaluation and a raise to $5.25 an hour. Mr. Pace never provided to me any information about how to progress in my career.

4. Within my first year of employment, I received a promotion to full-time status and a merit pay raise to $5.50 an hour.

5. In April 1996, I asked Assistant Manager Mike Lancaster to consider me for a promotion to Customer Service Manager ("CSM"), which I believed would be the first step into management. He told me he would speak with Store Manager Raps. He later replied that I would not receive a promotion at that time. He was vague, and did not tell me what I needed to do in order to receive a promotion. In the latter part of 1996, I asked Store Manager Raps to consider giving me more responsibility or assignments on the sales floor. I reminded Ms. Raps that I had experience at previous jobs as a head cashier, and that I was interested in promotion. She responded by saying that she would take my input into consideration, but took no action.

6. There were no postings of promotional opportunities for the first few years of my employment at Wal-Mart. Instead, I could rely only on word of mouth and observation. There was no application process to complete to apply for these positions. The only way I knew to express interest in promotion was to talk with management, and I continued to do this. I repeatedly asked Store Manager Raps, Assistant Manager Lancaster, and CSM Jan [last name unknown] to consider me for promotion to CSM or to give me experience on the sales floor. Because I was assigned as a front lane cashier, I was often unaware of opportunities in other parts of the store until the positions were already filled. It was difficult to express interest in a particular position, but I made my desire for promotion well known. I saw no information about management training. No one ever provided any information to me about management training.

7. By June 1997, open positions were sometimes posted. I signed up to be considered for several positions, but did not receive a promotion. I spoke about promotional opportunities with Assistant Manager Chuck Thomas when he gave me my 1997 performance evaluation. In June 1997, I was promoted to Customer Service Manager. This position had not been posted.

8. In approximately September or October 1997, Leilani (Lonnie) Barrett was promoted to Head CSM without the position being posted and without the opportunity for me to apply or interview for the job.

9. Soon after her promotion, Head CSM Barrett and Store Manager Ken Cagle began to discriminate against me by treating me more harshly than they treated other employees. I tried to use the Open Door policy without success. Head CSM Barrett retaliated against me in February 1998 with a written disciplinary coaching, claiming I returned late from breaks. Male employees returned late from breaks and lunch, and even failed to clock out for their breaks and were not disciplined. I am unaware of any male employee receiving a coaching for this infraction.

10. Six weeks later, in March 1998, I received another retaliatory coaching. This time, I was accused of having a cashier cover my lunch break, a common occurrence at the Pittsburg store. I used the Open Door again without success.

11. As a result of these coachings, my eligibility for promotion was limited. Wal-Mart policy prohibits promotion of employees who have received a coaching within the last year. Consequently, as a result of the retaliatory coachings, I was ineligible for promotion from February 1998 until April 1999.

12. In July 1999, I expressed interest in receiving a promotion to Department Manager. I had successfully fulfilled the role of Customer Service Manager for two years. I asked Store Manager Cagle to provide me with the training I needed to be a Department Manager. He provided no guidance or encouragement to me and gave me no indication what I needed to do to receive a promotion. My request for training and promotion was ignored.

13. In August 1999, I was again disciplined when I was accused of violating company policy. I was given another coaching and demoted from Customer Service Manager to cashier. My pay rate was decreased by $0.37 an hour. I was directed by Store Manager Cagle and Assistant Manager Joe Oquelly to take my lunch break and return to work as a cashier. I have never witnessed a similar public humiliation of a male employee. Again, by disciplining me for what was a common practice in the store, I was made ineligible for promotion for a year. I am not aware of any male employees who have been disciplined for similar transactions. As a result of this discriminatory treatment. I filed a charge on or about June 1, 2000 with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, attached hereto as Dukes Exhibit A. I received a notice of my Right to Sue on or about June 15, 2000, attached hereto as Dukes Exhibit B.

14. During the next twelve months, when I was ineligible for promotion due to the wrongful coaching, I was unable to apply for several positions in which I had interest. I missed the opportunity to become a Support Manager or Manager of the Domestics/Furniture Department. The latter position was filled by Joseph Topasna.

15. When I was once again eligible for promotion in August 2000, I watched as positions were filled without being posted. Three men, Richard Morales, Joseph Topasna, and Robert (Aaron) Mendez, were promoted to Support Manager in the fall of 2000. I did not have the opportunity to express my interest or apply for these positions, as they were not posted. I was not interviewed for any of these promotional opportunities. In addition, several department manager positions also were available during this time period. A male employee, Will Martines, became Department Manager for Tire and Lube Express. This position was not posted.

16. Because of the way I had been treated, and the treatment I witnessed of other female employees, and the long pattern I had observed of positions being given to male employees selected by management before any applications were even sought, I believed there was no point in going through the motion of applying for a promotion. I had made my goals and aspirations for promotion clear from my first weeks of employment, and yet, after years of hard work, I was still a cashier. Attached hereto as Dukes Exhibit C is a true and correct copy of the charges I filed in May, 2001 with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Attached hereto as Dukes Exhibits D is the Notice of Right to Sue which I received from the EEOC.

17. I remained a cashier until July 2001 when, due to work-related physical injuries, I was reassigned to the position of Greeter. I am currently a Cashier/Greeter.

18. In January 2003, for the first time there was an opportunity to sign up to express interest in joining the Management Training Program. I learned of this procedure only from my counsel in this case. I later learned that the application process for this opportunity was mentioned briefly in meetings conducted at the store, but not all employees were told of these meetings, including me. The information about this process was never posted. This was the first time in my nine years at Wal-Mart that there was any chance to apply for management training. There were only a few days in which applications could be submitted. I attempted to sign up for the program on the intranet system. However, my application was rejected. One of the questions in the application inquired of my availability. From the commencement of my employment, I have been unable to work on Sundays due to my strongly held religious beliefs. My application for the Management Training Program was automatically rejected when I had to truthfully respond that there was a limit on my availability. I remain interested in management training.

19. Although I have worked at this store for nine years, I am paid less then $9.00 an hour. I have recently learned of a male employee, Carl Kirkland, who was hired to be a greeter in the fall of 2002 in the Pittsburg store. He was paid more than me, despite his lesser seniority. Another male, Isidro Francisco, hired in 1996, became a greeter in 2000 and is also paid a higher hourly rate than me. Attached hereto as Dukes Exhibit E is a true and correct copy of the charge I filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

20. I decided to become a named plaintiff in this action because I have been unfairly denied promotional opportunities and equal pay. My primary goal is to ensure that the employment practices at Wal-Mart which hinder the progress of women wishing to enter management be changed, to ensure fair and equitable treatment of female employees, and to ensure women receive equal pay. I understand the responsibilities of a named plaintiff and I am prepared to fulfill my duties to the women in the class.

21. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in this Declaration, and if called as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and the State of California that the foregoing is true and correct.

This declaration was signed by me on April 17, 2003 in Pittsburg, California.

I, Diane Durfey, declare:

1. I was an Assistant Manager at a Wal-Mart Store in Utah. I quit in August 2000 because it became apparent I would not be promoted. I reached this conclusion because I experienced a belittling working environment directed at women and I lost respect for the management of Wal-Mart.

2. I was graduated from Brigham Young University in December 1998 with a degree in Business Administration. Before finishing my degree, I had obtained an Associates of Arts degree from a community college and had worked full-time as an office manager for a podiatrist and in the office and production department of a publishing company. I had also spent 18 months in Ecuador. Soon after receiving my Bachelors of Art degree, I saw at the career services center at Brigham Young University that Wal-Mart wished to interview recent graduates for managerial positions. I had observed the growth of Wal-Mart in Utah, and was aware that the company was expanding overseas. I believed that a company of that size would present tremendous opportunities for me. I was at the beginning of my professional career and had no reason, at that point, to doubt that I could have a long and successful career with Wal-Mart. I signed up for an interview.

3. I interviewed with Oneil Clark, a Regional Personnel Manager, for the position of management trainee. In this March 1999 interview, Mr. Clark asked me if I was relocatable. I responded by telling him I had no geographical limitations at all and, in fact, would be interested in working in the International Division. Mr. Clark made a note of my response to this question concerning my ability to relocate. (Attached hereto as Durfey Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of the Interview notes produced by Defendant at my deposition.)

4. I received a confirming letter, which set forth the terms of my employment as a Manager Trainee. (Attached hereto as Durfey Exhibit B is a true and correct copy of this letter.) Upon receipt, I telephoned to negotiate the starting salary of $27,500.00 but was unsuccessful at negotiating a higher rate. I was told that the salary was set by Home Office in Bentonville, Arkansas. I accepted the job and was sent to Shelton, Washington for training. I spent approximately 17 weeks in Washington in the Management Training Program.

5. Upon completing my training in August 1999, I was assigned as an Assistant Manager at the Wal-Mart Store in American Fork, Utah and remained there until I quit. The practices and procedures I learned in Washington were applicable in Utah and I needed no additional training to work in Utah. The handbook used in the Shelton, Washington store was the same as the handbook used in Utah. The reports that the stores made to Home Office were of the same type. The guidelines, reports, and policies sent by Home Office to the stores were the same. The videos shown to new employees, the Computer Based Learning ("CBL") modules, and the orientation procedure were the same in Utah as I had experienced in Washington, as they were all created in Bentonville, Arkansas. The set-up of the store, the reporting chain of command, the personnel policies, the merchandising practices, and the day-to-day operations were all similar in Washington and Utah. Both of the stores used the same computer systems, and I was able to access the same reports, guidelines, and policies on the computer in Utah that I had in Washington.

6. After I was in the Utah store for approximately six or seven weeks, a male Assistant Manager, Matt Garrett, was assigned to the same store. He had commenced his training six or seven weeks after I had begun my training, and this was his first assignment a: Assistant Manager. Although I had the six or seven weeks of additional experience, Matt Garrett was paid more than I was. I learned this when another Assistant Manager, Holly Gibby, saw written confirmation of our salaries and told me.

7. It became apparent that Matt Garrett was being groomed for rapid promotion and I was not. He was rotated into the Night Receiving Assistant Manager, which was widely seen as a stepping-stone to imminent promotion. I complained to Store Manager Mark Weatherhogg, as did Holly Gibby and other Assistant Managers. I was then assigned to help Mr. Garrett in the receiving department, as there was a lot of extra work to do, including a new back room set up and an upcoming inventory audit. When Mr. Garrett rotated out of that position, I was able to run the position entirely on my own but was not allowed this opportunity. Another male Assistant Manager, Jeff, was put in to help me although there was no longer a lot of extra work. Unlike Mr. Garrett, I was not given the opportunity to shine in that position and show what I could do.

8. I observed gender stereotyping in assignments throughout the store. Women were not placed in some departments, including sporting goods, garden, and hardware. Women were not assigned as cart pushers. Women were assigned to the office, and to fabrics and cashiering. This gender segregation was widely acknowledged throughout the store, and was the subject of several conversations among the female office personnel.

9. Store Manager Mark Weatherhogg toured the store daily with one or more Assistant Managers. Upon one occasion, in approximately July 2000, as I and Assistant Manager Marjorie Fonnesbeck toured with him, he started yelling at us. When we arrived in the Infants Department, Mr. Weatherhogg got even angrier, and screamed at the female hourly Infants Department Manager, Julie Weber. He pulled approximately six pieces of furniture down from the shelves, throwing them onto the floor. Ms. Weber walked out of the store. Several associates witnessed this and appeared very upset. More than one associate called the District Manager, Jim Curtis, who sent Mr. Weatherhogg home for the day. District Manager Curtis also directed Ms. Fonnesbeck and me to conduct an investigation of the incident. Assigning this task of investigation put Ms. Fonnesbeck and me in very difficult positions, as we were being asked to review and report on the actions of our direct supervisor. I felt this assignment was an attempt to intimidate us and send us a message that we were not to report on the bad actions of our Store Manager. When I approached Mr. Weatherhogg to tell him that employees were walking out and were very upset, he placed the blame on the Assistant Managers for provoking him. I never observed or learned of any time when Mr. Weatherhogg yelled at male Assistant Managers or male Department Managers.

10. Upon many occasions, I went to Store Manager Weatherhogg to discuss a number of concerns, including my career. In many of these discussions, Mr. Weatherhogg told me that "retail is tough" and that it might not be "appropriate" for women. Mr. Weatherhogg said this to me on more than one occasion. I discussed this with female Assistant Managers Marjorie Fonnesbeck and Holly Gibby who told me that Mr. Weatherhogg said the same thing to them. This attitude of Store Manager Weatherhogg was so well known, and the favoritism he displayed to male associates was so apparent that it became almost a joke for my fellow Assistant Managers to refer to Wal-Mart as a "good 'ole boys' club." I recall specifically Store Manager Mark Weatherhogg making this comment at lunch on more than one occasion.

11. I became very concerned about my career opportunities, having seen a less experienced man, Assistant Manager Matt Garrett, receive a greater salary and more managerial grooming, observing the biased behavior of my supervisor, and having my Store Manager express doubts that I, as a woman, should even be in this field of employment. I tried to use the Open Door, contacting District Manager Jim Curtis, but received no response. Wal-Mart's Sundown Rule requires that all phone messages be returned the same day received, so the lack of response was significant to me. I understood that the district manager was so uninterested in talking to me that he was willing to violate this basic rule of Wal-Mart policy and culture. I wrote a note to the President, Lee Scott, and again received no response. I called the legal department and yet again received no response. I telephoned and e-mailed the Store Manager I had trained with in Washington, Greg Sullivan, but received only a pep talk.

12. I believed that I could not get promoted, in light of the attitudes I had observed. I found that no help was available for me through the Open Door. The working conditions were belittling and I had no respect for the management. I quit on August 31, 2000. I conducted my own exit interview, finding myself to be rehirable. No member of Wal-Mart management made any effort to persuade me to stay.

13. I had intended to make my career at Wal-Mart. Given a fair opportunity, I anticipated becoming a Store Manager and perhaps joining the International Division. Instead, I experienced discrimination and hostility towards me because I am a woman. But for the discrimination, the behavior of my managers, and the lack of response from upper management to my concerns. I believe I would have stayed at Wal-Mart.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in this Declaration and, if called to testify as a witness, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and of the State of Utah that the foregoing is true and correct.

This declaration was signed by me on April 9, 2003 at Orem, Utah.

I, Micki Earwood, declare:

1. I am a 32 year old female and live in Springfield, Ohio.

2. During my employment at Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., ("Wal-Mart") I encountered discrimination based upon my gender with regard to promotions. I also observed discrimination against other women at Wal-Mart with regard to pay. I reported the observed pay disparity to management and was terminated in retaliation for reporting discrimination.

3. I was employed at Wal-Mart from January 12, 1989, until September 28, 2000. I initially was employed in the Urbana, Ohio Wal Mart Store and remained in that store until the end of 1992. I worked for a short period of time in the Mentor, Ohio

Store and then transferred to the Bellfontaine, Ohio Store. I transferred back to the Urbana, Ohio Store from the Bellfountaine, Ohio Store and remained there until my termination on September 28, 2000.

4. Throughout my career at Wal-Mart, I worked in numerous departments as an associate and as a Department Manager. I was an associate in the Receiving, Housewares and Beauty Aides Departments. I was a Department Manager in Electronics, Housewares, Hardware, Household Chemicals and Furniture, and Food. I also served as a Support Manager and I was the Personnel Manager at the Urbana Store at the time of termination in September 2000.

5. I performed well in all my positions at Wal-Mart. With one exception only, my evaluations were either meets standards, exceeds standards, or outstanding. At the time of my termination at Wal-Mart, I was making $12.62 per hour.

6. On many of my evaluations, I expressed an interest in progressing into management with the company. I also orally informed my store managers throughout my employment that I wanted to progress into management.

7. In the Summer 1998, I spoke with my District Manager, Cindy Range, who asked me if I was interested in the Management Training Program. I told Ms. Range that I was very much interested in the Management Training Program and we agreed to speak again.

8. Ms. Range and I spoke again shortly thereafter and she asked me if I was willing to transfer to either Illinois, Michigan or New York in order to be in the Management Training Program. I told her that I was willing to transfer and I would prefer to transfer to New York. Ms. Range told me that she would get back to me regarding the Management Training Program.

9. During the Summer and throughout the Fall of 1998, Ms. Range never got back in touch with me despite my numerous calls to her office. I spoke with her assistant and asked him if she would meet with me the next time she was in my store. I never heard back from her or her assistant concerning this request. I talked to my Store Manager, Jim Phelps, about Ms. Range's failure to get back to me regarding the promotion to the Management Training Program on numerous occasions. Mr. Phelps repeatedly told me he could not help me in this regard. I asked him if he could speak with Ms. Range about this issue since he meets with her every week and he refused. Mr. Phelps informed me that he had nothing to do with promotions and he would not help me in any way.

10. I know that Mr. Phelps could have helped me in this regard if he had chosen to as I had observed him help men at my store get into the Management Training Program. Mr. Phelps helped Phillip Roher, Ben Perry, and Tony Walters get into the Management Training Program during the same time frame that he was denying me any assistance.

11. I also observed Mr. Phelps fail to assist other women in my store who wanted to get into the Management Training Program. I know that Glenna Buuck tried to transfer to another district so she could be promoted and Mr. Phelps refused to permit her transfer thereby denying her the promotional opportunity. To my knowledge, Mr. Phelps never interfered in any male's transfers.

12. Angie Hart was a college student working at the Urbana, Ohio Wal-Mart who wanted to become involved in the Intern Program but Mr. Phelps would not assist her. Ms. Hart found it necessary to move from the Urbana Store into another district so she could get into the Intern Program.

13. At the time that Mr. Phelps was interfering in Ms. Buuck's transfer and refusing Ms. Hart's request to be in the Intern Program, our District Manager was Mike Fetrow (Ms. Range's successor). Mr. Fetrow also refused to allow Ms. Hart into the Intern Program and both Mr. Phelps and Mr. Fetrow permitted Ben Perry, a male, to be placed in the Intern Program in the Urbana, Ohio Store.

14. While I was at the store, I personally observed Mr. Phelps constantly treat male employees better than he treated female employees. When women came into the personnel office to speak with him, he would make them beg for any request that they needed granted. Mr. Phelps was condescending towards the women that approached him and he would rarely would look women in the eye. Mr. Phelps always made it more difficult for women to voice complaints or to obtain pay raises to which they were entitled. Mr. Phelps would always put off women and delay acting on their requests.

15. After I was denied the opportunity to be in the Management Training Program, I remained as a Support Manager. I was then transferred to Food as a Department Manager. After that position, I learned that the Personnel Manager position was open and I applied for that job. I had previously expressed my interest in the Personnel Manager position to Mr. Phelps as well as previous managers before him and I felt that this was another track that I could be promoted from into management. Virtually everyone in the store knew I wanted to be the Personnel Manager so when the position was posted, I was the only applicant. I became the Personnel Manager on August 5, 1999, and remained in that position until I was terminated in September 2000.

16. As Personnel Manager, I did all the new hiring for new associates. I also did all of the scheduling for the entire store with the exception of Special Divisions. I was also in charge of posting hourly job openings. However, I was not in charge of posting any job openings for management positions. To my knowledge, none of the management training positions or assistant manager positions were posted while I was employed at Wal-Mart. As Personnel Manager, I also was privy to payroll information regarding all of the employees of the store where I worked. I understood that the payroll information was confidential and I never disclosed the information I obtained while viewing the payroll to anyone other than upper level management when I reported pay inequalities that I observed.

17. During the Summer of 2000, I called Mr. Fetrow, my District Manager to report that Mr. Phelps was awarding men raises that were outside the guidelines and that he was not giving women comparable raises. I gave Mr. Fetrow specific examples. Mr. Fetrow never responded to my phone calls regarding this issue, so I contacted Don Swann, Regional Vice President. Mr. Swann told me that Mr. Fetrow was a very busy man and that I should just give him another chance to try and work it out and fix this situation. When Mr. Fetrow eventually returned my call, I mentioned the pay disparity issue to him. Mr. Fetrow told me that he would be in the store the very next day and would discuss this issue with me. When Mr. Fetrow came into the store the next day he ignored me and did not speak to me regarding the pay disparity issue.

18. Some of the specific instances of unequal pay that I reported to Mr. Fetrow were, Roger Hart receiving a $1.00 per hour raise when he was only making $7.00 per hour which was far in excess of the 5% pay increase policy at Wal-Mart. While I was Personnel Manager, I did not observe any women receive a raise of $1.00 per hour. I also reported Kevin Sanderson receiving raises of the same magnitude of Roger Hart and the fact that women never received those types of raises. I also reported the fact that Jerry Lewis received a raise every 90 days from Mr. Phelps for total raises of over $3.00 per hour in less than 1 ½ years. I personally observed Mr. Phelps tell many woman who were requesting raises that he could never give more than a 5% raise.

19. I observed another example of unequal treatment of women with respect to pay and promotions. Robert (Pat) Bing, a male associate, and Shelley Engle, were both promoted on the same day and were told they would be receiving their raises for the promotion when the pay review occurred in 60 days. Robert (Pat) Bing was given a raise and Shelley Engle was not given a raise.

20. On another occasion, Mr. Phelps ordered me to post a support manager position and to include in the posting that applicants would be required to work nights and weekends. Mr. Phelps then stated, "so they can't have kids." I believed that this was a form of illegal discrimination. I was also personally offended by this comment since I was a single mother and had worked as a support manager while my daughter was three years old. I reported this incident regarding Mr. Phelps to both Mr. Fetrow and Mr. Swann. To my knowledge, nothing was ever done by upper management with regard to this particular complaint.

21. On September 15, 2000, Mr. Fetrow and I were supposed to meet regarding the issues I had raised. Mr. Fetrow came into the store, but he did not initiate a meeting. Mr. Fetrow then came into the store on September 16, 2000, where, again, I was supposed to meet with him regarding the issues I had raised. Instead, at the end of the day (2 hours after I was regularly scheduled to leave work that day), I was put into a room behind closed doors with three males, Mr. Fetrow, Mr. Phelps and Anthony Detillio of loss prevention. I was informed in that meeting by Mr. Fetrow that I was being investigated because I allegedly had a tape recorder at work and was allegedly taping conversations of management. I told him that I did have a tape recorder but did not know where it was, and that I had not taped any conversations at work. Mr. Fetrow told me that I was being placed on paid leave while I was being investigated. I was called back to work approximately ten days later and was told I was being terminated. I believe I was investigated and terminated in retaliation for having reported my Store Manager, Jim Phelps, to his superiors for his discrimination against women.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Ohio that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 11, 2003 at Springfield, Ohio.

NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

I, Penny Elkins, declare:

1. I am a 42 year old female living in Rio Rancho, New Mexico. I worked at four different Wal-Mart stores in Albuquerque, New Mexico, and one in Santa Fe, New Mexico, from September 1, 1993, until I resigned on November 13, 1999, to escape the discriminatory atmosphere fostered at Wal-Mart and directed toward its female employees.

2. I have been subjected to gender discrimination by Wal-Mart with regard to my compensation and work assignments. I have also experienced retaliation from Wal-Mart because of my use of the Open Door Policy.

3. I started working at Wal-Mart as a Sales Associate in the Electronics Department in 1993 and was working as a Support Manager within a year. In June, 1996, I asked Scott Dragoo, the Store Manager, to be placed into the Management Training Program. My request was accepted, and I completed the Management Training Program in only three months, approximately half the typical time period allotted for training, in the fall of 1996. I then worked as an Assistant Manager until I resigned from Wal-Mart.

4. Although it was obvious from the day I started working at Wal-Mart that the atmosphere was sexually charged, with male management and hourly employees openly making sexually-related remarks about female customers and females in general, I did not encounter gender discrimination directed toward me personally until after I completed the Management Training Program in late 1996.

5. In January, 1997, I moved to another store in Albuquerque and started working there as an Assistant Manager. Within one month, Jim Gray, the Store Manager, assigned me to work as an Assistant Manager for Night Receiving, even though two male Assistant Managers, David Brown and Bill Burroughs, were next in line for assignment to Night Receiving. I ended up working in the undesirable Night Receiving position for approximately six months, which is far longer than most male Assistant Managers were required to work in Night Receiving. I asked Mr. Gray, the Store Manager, and Peter Abbott, the District Manager, numerous times to be transferred from Night Receiving, but they significantly delayed my return to a day schedule because they were accommodating a male Assistant Manager's desire to spend time with his children in the evenings. Even though I complained to Mr. Gray and Mr. Abbott that I was raising four children at the time and wanted to spend time with them in the evenings, Wal-Mart unfairly prolonged the duration of my Night Receiving assignment.

6. I also began to realize that a number of male Assistant Managers that completed the Management Training Program with me, and even after me, made a higher salary than me. For example, Gavin Pearlman, who completed the Management Training Program with me, made more money than me as an Assistant Manager. In addition, I know Mehran "Danny" Hakhamian, an Assistant Manager who completed the Management Training Program after me, made more money than I did when he became an Assistant Manager.

7. In February or March, 1997, I asked Rick Adams, the Store Manager, for a merit raise because I had done a good job in cleaning up the night receiving area. Mr. Adams denied my request and told me that Assistant Managers never received merit raises. In the summer of 1999, however, I know that Todd Hildan, a male Assistant Manager, received a significant merit increase because he had cleaned up the night receiving area. When I visited the personnel office for a matter concerning my employment, I inadvertently saw Mr. Hildan's personnel records, which were laying in plain sight on a desk and which showed this merit increase. It became very clear to me that Wal-Mart paid me a lower salary than my male Assistant Manager counterparts and discriminatorily denied me merit raises because I am a woman.

8. In early 1999, I transferred to another Wal-Mart store in Albuquerque. Not long after working in this store, Peter Abbott, the District Manager, approached me and insisted that I transfer to the Santa Fe, New Mexico, store. I resisted this move and told Mr. Abbott that such a move would decrease the time I could spend with my children in Albuquerque and it would be difficult for me to commute daily from Albuquerque to Santa Fe because our family only had one reliable car that my husband and I both used. Mr. Abbott became hostile and threatened to demote me from my Assistant Manager position if I did not transfer to the Santa Fe store. I was concerned about this threat and used the Open Door Policy to contact the Regional Manager and explain my situation. The situation was resolved, and I was able to stay at the Albuquerque store. Mr. Abbott, however, held a grudge against me and retaliated against me, as described later in this Declaration.

9. In the summer of 1999, George Wagner, the Store Manager, and Peter Abbott, the District Manager, ordered me and Mary Louise Linton, a female Assistant Manager, along with a male Assistant Manager Trainee, to work nights at the Santa Fe, New Mexico, store for approximately one month. We were told our task was to rip up old carpeting in order to set up the Ladies Department at the store. Even though neither I nor Ms. Linton were in charge of the Ladies Department in the Albuquerque store, Wal-Mart chose us instead of any of the male Albuquerque Assistant Managers to perform this bottom-of-the-barrel work. During my month of working nights at the Santa Fe store, I lived in a hotel in Santa Fe and rarely was able to reunite with my family due to my night schedule and the long drive from Santa Fe to my home in Albuquerque. I felt this assignment was directed by Mr. Abbott in retaliation for using the Open Door Policy.

10. Soon after I returned from my assignment at the Santa Fe store to the Albuquerque store, I received unjustified discipline or coaching from George Wagner, the Store Manager. Peter Abbott, the District Manager, had ordered Mr. Wagner to give me this coaching due to the poor shape of my department in the Albuquerque store. Since I had been on assignment at the Santa Fe store for one month, it had been impossible for me to properly service my department at the Albuquerque store. I believe that Mr. Abbott ordered this disciplinary coaching as retaliation for my previous actions in going over his head and using the Open Door Policy when he threatened to demote me for refusing to transfer to the Santa Fe store. Not only was this coaching retaliatory, it was discriminatory because male Assistant Managers rarely received coachings due to the poor status and mis-management of their departments. By receiving this coaching, I was not eligible for promotion for a year. After receiving this coaching, I used the Open Door Policy to complain to the Regional Personnel Manager, Debbie Moody, to no avail.

11. In August, 1999, Wal-Mart selected me to attend the year-end, week-long meeting in Dallas, Texas. All of the Wal-Mart Home Office executives were there, as well as Store Managers, Co-Managers and top Assistant Managers, including me, that were considered "Rising Stars." During one of the first events, I observed the Home Office executive team sitting in chairs on a stage. There appeared to be approximately 50 executives on stage, but I could only see one woman among them. When Thomas Coughlin, a Wal-Mart Executive Vice-President, gave his speech, he even acknowledged that there were very few women executives and "promised" that Wal-Mart would address gender issues in the near future.

12. In November, 1999, I received an offer to work as an Assistant Manager at SteinMart, a discount retailer, in Albuquerque. I accepted the job at SteinMart and resigned from Wal-Mart, even though I took a $6,000 per year pay decrease. SteinMart told me in my interview that within a year I would be managing my own store. When I compared this opportunity to the gender discrimination directed toward me at Wal-Mart, it was an easy decision for me to abandon the higher Wal-Mart salary and six years of seniority I had accrued. During my exit interview process, I met with Larry [last name unknown], the new District Manager, and told him I would stay at Wal-Mart if he promised that I would be promoted to a Co-Manager position, which I was qualified for, within two years. Larry [last name unknown] would not make that promise. In contrast to Wal-Mart, SteinMart promoted me to the General Manager position at its Albuquerque store in approximately January, 2001.

13. If Wal-Mart could provide me the assurance that I would be given the chance to compete with males on an even footing for pay and promotional opportunities, I would consider returning to employment at Wal-Mart.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of New Mexico that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 16, 2003, at Albuquerque, New Mexico.

I, Shirley Ervine, declare:

1. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in this Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

2. I was employed by Wal-Mart, Inc. at Store No. 2099 in Paso Robles, California from August 8, 1994 through September 11, 2001. I am female.

3. At the time of my application to Wal-Mart for employment, I had significant retail management experience running garden centers. On my application and during my initial interviews, I expressly requested work in the garden center. I was told that a male had already been hired as head of the garden department so that this position was not available to me.

4. After I was hired, Wal-Mart initially assigned me to the fabric department. During the seven years I worked at the Paso Robles store, the fabric department was comprised exclusively of female associates and there was never a male department manager.

5. My initial rate of pay was $6.00 an hour. After my 90-day review, I was given a 25 cent raise so that I was now earning $6.25 an hour. During that first year, I was moved from the fabric department to the toy department to the garden department. In May 1995, I was given a merit raise of 25 cents for my excellent performance in the garden department. In July 1995, I received an "above standard" rating on my first annual evaluation and was given a 40 cent raise. This brought my pay rate to $6.90 an hour.

6. While I was working in the garden department, I learned through the grapevine that the department manager, Steve Romo, was being moved out. The garden department manager was the position that I had first applied for. I still wanted it very much so I took my resume to Assistant Manager Michael Denham and told him that I was interested in the position. The job was not posted and I did not know any other way to make my interest in the position known.

7. Despite having given my resume to Assistant Manager Denham and telling him expressly that I wanted the position and despite my excellent performance in the garden department, I was never interviewed for the job. Instead it was given to Troy Clark, a newly hired male associate who appeared to be about 25 years old. At the time, I had more than five years previous experience working in garden centers, including two years as Assistant Manager at Pacific Home Improvement, three years as a sales associate for Pacific Coast Garden Center, seasonal work with Tree Man, and approximately one year as a cashier at the Miramar Naval Air Station, which required knowledge of the various plants and garden products sold.

8. In approximately September 1995, Assistant Manager Debbie Smith informed me that the department manager position was open in the pets department and asked me if I wanted the position. The job was not posted. I did not formally apply for the position or interview with anyone. I just told Assistant Manager Smith that I wanted the position and that is how I became department manager over the pet department. I received a 60 cent raise so that my hourly rate as a department manager was $7.50.

9. In approximately May 1996, Store Manager Mike Martin asked me if I would be department manager over the garden department after the current manager moved out of that position. The job was not posted and I did not formally apply for the position or interview with anyone. I just told Store Manager Martin that I would accept the position and that is how I finally became department manager in the garden department. The Associate Commendation Form approving this move states "Shirley is being given another challenge of taking on dept. 16 because of the hard work you (sic) have done. Thank you. I appreciate it." (True and accurate copy attached as Ervine Exhibit A) I received a 50 cent raise with this move which brought my hourly rate to $8.00

10. One of my responsibilities as the garden department manager was selling soil, bark and statuary. This merchandise arrived by truck on pallets and needed to be unloaded in a corral. This often required the use of a forklift. During my employment at Wal-Mart, I observed many men being trained to drive the forklift, including but not limited to Assistant Manager John Gatlin, associates Marvin Lee and Harry Balsom, and associates Abel [last name unknown], Billy [last name unknown] and OJ [last name unknown] who were overnight stockers. When I asked Store Manager Nick Sigala to allow me to be trained on the forklift, he refused.

11. After Store Manager Sigala denied me training to operate the forklift, I sought and obtained operator safety certification on my own from the company that serviced Wal-Mart's forklift, Graylift. (True and accurate copy attached as Ervine Exhibit B.) When I gave a copy of my Certificate of Achievement to Store Manager Sigala, he threw it on the desk and told me to leave his office. Throughout the time I ran the garden center, Store Manager Sigala continued to deny me training on, and use of, the forklift. As a result, I was forced to find a male associate to unload the pallets of soil, bark, and statuary from the delivery trucks whenever the delivery trucks did not provide that service. During the seven years I was employed at the Paso Robles store, I only observed one female associate operate the forklift and she was the Overnight Assistant Manager.

12. During the time I was garden department manager, the Home Office in Bentonville recognized the Paso Robles garden center as No. 1 in the Company for sales of Rubbermaid Sheds and awarded the garden center $500. On January 26, 1998, Divisional

Vice President Kendall Schwindt sent me a letter of congratulation, informing me that I had been selected to represent my district in the company-wide Lawn and Garden Seminar in Kansas City, Missouri. (True and accurate copy attached as Ervine Exhibit C.) At this end-of-the-year meeting, the Paso Robles garden center was listed as No. 1 in the Company for sales of Murray Log Splitters. I found it ironic that my Divisional Vice President considered me qualified enough to represent my district at a nation-wide company seminar while my Store Manager did not think me capable of operating a forklift.

13. In July 1996 and July 1997, I received "above standard" performance evaluations as garden department manager. In July 1998, I was ranked as "standard." However, despite my consistently good performance during these three years and the superior ranking of the Paso Robles garden center when I was the department manager, I received only one merit raise for 25 cents an hour and what I considered to be only meager annual raises: 40 cents, 43 cents, and 37 cents, respectively. After four years with Wal-Mart, my pay rate was still under $10 an hour at $9.55.

14. In approximately April or May 1999, TLE Manager Jill Sinclair asked me if I was interested in becoming a support manager in the Tire Lube Express center. This is an hourly position. I applied for this position on the computer. I interviewed with TLE Manager Sinclair and she later informed me that I received the position plus a 50 cent raise, which brought my hourly rate to $10.05.

15. During the two years I worked in the TLE center, I was ranked either "above standard" or "meets expectations" on my evaluations but the annual raises I received were still less than I felt I deserved based on my performance: only 50 cents and 44 cents, respectively. I also received two merit raises, one for 25 cents and the other for 35 cents. After six years with Wal-Mart my pay rate was $11.59 an hour.

16. The TLE support manager position is the highest position I held with Wal-Mart and the last time anyone "tapped" me for promotion.

17. None of my store managers ever talked to me about Wal-Mart's Management Training Program or offered me any other promotions. There was nothing posted anywhere in the store that informed interested employees on how to apply for management training or management opportunities. The Management Training Program was not discussed at the daily store meetings I attended. I never saw any application or was told how to apply for the Management Training Program or any other management opportunity.

18. When I first became a Wal-Mart employee, I had retail management experience and I was interested in management opportunities at Wal-Mart. I was excited about making a career with a company as successful as Wal-Mart, a company in which I owned stock. However, after observing the number of assistant managers and management trainees assigned to the Paso Robles store and the frequency with which they transferred to other stores, I learned that Wal-Mart required its store level managers to relocate. Because I owned a home, had three children and a husband, I was not able to relocate.

19. When a female management trainee who was visiting our store asked me how high in the Company I was planning on going, I told her a support manager position because they did not have to move. This woman did not refute my understanding of the relocation requirement and she definitely did not inform me that Wal-Mart had a "resident assistant manager" program that provides for the training and promotion of assistant managers within the same store.

20. I did not learn about the "resident assistant manager" program until sometime in 2001, the last year of my employment with Wal-Mart. I learned about the program through the grapevine, not by having observed an Assistant Manager become an Assistant Manager through the resident assistant manager program. By then, I had become so disillusioned by the way I had been treated and the lack of opportunities for women at Wal-Mart that I decided there was no future for me there.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of California that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on March 11, 2003, 2003, at Atascadero Ca.

Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ

DECLARATION OF GINA ESPINOZA-PRICE IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Gina Espinoza-Price, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I was employed by Wal-Mart, Inc. from November 1990 through April 1997. I worked as a sales associate, Personnel Manager, and overseeing operations for Wal-Mart's One-Hour Photo Division in Wal-Mart stores in California, Arkansas, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Canada and Mexico. I am female.

3. I supervised census-interviewers for Imperial County, California during the 1990 United States census count before working for Wal-Mart. I applied for a position with Wal-Mart after reading an article about Sam Walton in Fortune magazine. I was impressed with Mr. Walton's "Our people make the difference" motto. After finishing the article I thought that Wal-Mart sounded like a wonderful place to work.

4. In November 1990, I was hired by Wal-Mart as an hourly associate in the Hardware Department of a Wal-Mart store in El Centro, California. I applied for a Hardware Department Manager position but a man, David Caudillo, was given that job.

5. In February 1991, Co-Manager John Sablan asked me if I would be interested in a Personnel Manager position. The position was not posted. Later that day, I met with Co-Manager Sablan and Store Manager Phil Lopez. They told me that they were impressed with my work and offered me the position without interviewing me. I accepted the position because I was interested in moving up within Wal-Mart.

6. In February 1992, Store Manager Norman Banwarth told me that Photo District Manager Matt Tankersley was looking for candidates for a salaried Photo Lab Department Manager position for the El Centro store. The position was not posted. Store Manager Banwarth told me that he had recommended me for the position and if I wanted, I could meet with Photo District Manager Tankersley to talk about it. Several days later, Mr. Tankersley and I had an informal meeting in the snack bar of the El Centro store. In that meeting he offered me the position, which I accepted. Belen [last name unknown], a female photo lab technician, told me that she did not understand why the position was not posted because she would have applied for the position had she known about it.

7. In February 1992, I went to Bentonville, Arkansas for training on Wal-Mart One-Hour Photo Division policies, management procedures and equipment operation. When I arrived at the Home Office for a meeting, I saw a list of Wal-Mart senior management on a wall in the main hallway. Of approximately fifty names, I can recall only one name that appeared to be a woman's. I remember thinking, "I'll change that." My goal was to one day be listed on that wall.

8. I was willing to transfer to any Wal-Mart location in the United States, Canada, or Mexico if it meant that I would continue to receive promotions. In February 1992, while I was at the Wal-Mart Home Office for training, I was given a form to complete which asked where in the United States I was willing to transfer. I checked the boxes next to every region in the country to indicate that I was willing to move anywhere in the United States if it would help advance my career with Wal-Mart.

9. By summer 1992, I was helping Wal-Mart set up One-Hour Photo Departments in new stores across California. In the training I received at Wal-Mart's Home Office and from Wal-Mart manuals, I was taught that Wal-Mart polices and practices were to be applied consistently in every Wal-Mart store. Additionally, I was trained that the policies and procedures for matters such as hiring, employee training, operations of the photo lab equipment, opening and closing departments, cash registers, and customer service were to follow the same guidelines in every Wal-Mart store.

10. In May 1993, Photo District Manager Matt Tankersley told me that he was recommending me for an open Photo Division District Manager position. The position was not posted. I was interviewed for the position in Indiana by a Regional Manager and Customer Service Manager Diane Ault. The next week I was offered the position, which I accepted.

11. In July 1993, I moved to Lansing, Michigan to begin working as a Photo Division District Manager for the District comprising Michigan and northern Indiana. I was also responsible for a Wal-Mart Specialty Division Distribution Center located in Lansing, Michigan.

12. Initially I was given a Specialty Distribution Center operations manual by my assistant Ms. Miller. I found that this manual did not provide me with sufficient guidance for operating a Wal-Mart Distribution Center. Over time, I developed written guidelines for managing Wal-Mart Specialty Distribution Centers and rewrote the manual. I sent the rewritten manual to Mike Johnson, District Head of Wal-Mart Distribution and Safety, whose offices were in Bentonville, Arkansas. He told me that the manual was very good and sent a memo to all of the One-hour Photo District Managers stating that they should call me if they had questions about Specialty Distribution Center operations. At the annual meeting of all of the photo District and Regional Managers in Fayetteville, Arkansas in the Spring of 1994, Mr. Johnson asked me to stand up and speak about Specialty Division Distribution Center operations.

13. In fall 1993, the Director of Wal-Mart's One-hour Photo Operations, David Rogers, sent me to Pennsylvania, to train One-hour Photo District Manager David Scott, in the Specialty Distribution Center operations that I had, in part, developed.

14. In approximately October 1993, Regional Photo Manager Joe Lisuzzo told me that Wal-Mart was placing me on a transition team in Canada to convert Woolco stores to Wal-Mart stores. I was the only woman in a team of five. I did not apply for this position and it was not posted. This assignment was to be completed in addition to my tasks as Photo District Manager of Michigan and northern Indiana. I accepted the assignment. I knew that it would be difficult to supervise Wal-Mart stores and a Distribution Center in the United States while helping to establish new stores in Canada. I wanted to be promoted by Wal-Mart and I thought that by performing difficult tasks and traveling extensively Wal-Mart would see that I was a hard-worker and that I was committed to the Company. At the time, I aspired to be Regional Photo Manager.

tunity to express interest in the position. After the conference call ended, I called Director of One-hour Photo Operations David Rogers and asked why the open Regional Photo Manager position had not been posted. Mr. Rogers did not answer this question but stated that Wal-Mart needed me in Chicago. I then asked if any one besides Mr. Scott had interviewed for the position. Mr. Rogers did not respond. I felt that I was not considered for this position because I am a woman. I believe that I was much more experienced that Mr. Scott. I had gained personnel experience while working as a Personnel Manager. I had worked for Wal-Mart for a longer period of time than Mr. Scott. I had even trained Mr. Scott in the fall 1993 on Specialty Distribution Center operations. I believe that since I had created most of the Specialty Distribution Center operations that were beginning to be used more and more consistently in Wal-Mart Specialty Distribution Centers across the United States and Canada, I was an excellent candidate for this position. Because of my qualifications, I thought that I should have had at least an opportunity to interview for the Regional Photo Manager position.

17. In approximately October 1994, Clay Usseleton, Regional Photo Manager, asked me to come to Bentonville, Arkansas to interview for an open Regional Photo Manager position in California. I understood that I was being considered for this position because I had complained about not being interviewed for the last open Regional Photo Manager position. After arriving at Wal-Mart's Home Office, I met with Director of One-hour Photo Operations Rogers and Photo Personnel Manager Barbara Kulwicki. During the interview, Mr. Rogers began to describe the position as an international position that would involve opening stores in Mexico. This puzzled me because I thought that the position I was interviewing for was in California. Mr. Rogers told me that the California position had already been filled. I begrudgingly accepted the District Manager position in Mexico because it would allow me to live in San Diego, California, two hours from my family. Also, I believed that if I declined the position, I would not be considered for other promotions. After leaving the meeting, I called Mr. Ussleton. Mr. Uffleton told me that the Regional Photo Manager position in California had been given to a man, Jeff Gwartney who had been hired by Wal-Mart approximately two years earlier as a photo lab manager and promoted to a District Photo Manager position approximately one year later. I had been with Wal-Mart for four years. I believe I was not considered for this position because I am a woman.

19. Male Photo Division Management behaved in ways that demeaned and belittled women and minorities. In fall 1996, there was a Photo District Manager meeting in Valencia, California. Wal-Mart had just hired a second female Photo District Manager for the western region, Linda Palmer. During dinner, Jeff Gwartney introduced all of the District Managers to Ms. Palmer using nicknames for the minorities and women. I was introduced as Gina, "the little Mexican princess." I was very offended by Mr. Gwartney's comment and left the dinner early. Throughout the meeting, men made sexual statements and jokes that I thought were very offensive. For example, a flyer with an offensive joke about women being stupid was left on my belongings. In February 1997, during an evaluation, I complained to One-hour Photo Divisional Manager Joe Lisuzzo about harassment based on gender at the previous Photo District Manager meeting. He replied that he would take care of it. I knew from trainings on Wal-Mart's sex harassment policy given by Wal-Mart Legal Department employee Canetta Ivy that company policy mandates that when someone complains of sexual harassment, an investigation must begin within twenty-four hours. Therefore, I expected to be interviewed as a part of an investigation. I was never called. A couple of weeks later, in March 1997, I saw Mr. Lisuzzo at a meeting. I asked him if he had been conducting an investigation of my sexual harassment complaint. He replied that it was being taken care of. I was never aware of any action taken in response to my complaint. Six weeks after complaining about sexual harassment, I was terminated.

20. In March 1997, Director of Photo Operations, David Rogers, called and told me that I was being placed in the position of International Liaison of the Photo Division. The position was not posted and I was offered the position without having to interview for it.

21. Wal-Mart terminated me in April 1997, falsely claiming that I had interfered with a loss prevention investigation. On April 1, 1997, I received a phone call from Stephanie Agnew, a Photo Center Manager in a Lakeside, California Wal-Mart store. Ms. Agnew had been contacted by loss prevention for taking prints from the store without paying for them. Ms. Agnew told me that she had been testing the photo equipment by developing some of her film with it, a procedure that was often used to check machines. When she was leaving the store, Ms. Agnew had said, she was unable to find the store manager so she was unable to notify him that she was taking prints without paying. I told her that she should have told someone that she was taking the prints. I then called Regional Photo Coordinator Jeff Gwartney and told him what had happened. I was on vacation and I notified him so that he could begin an investigation of the incident. Later that week, I returned to my home store in San Diego, California to find Ms. Agnew working there. Ms. Agnew normally works in the Lakeside, California store. She told me that Mr. Gwartney had told her to work in the San Diego store. I was surprised that Ms. Agnew had not been suspended because Wal-Mart policy is that anytime there is an investigation for a breach of integrity, the employee under investigation is to be suspended. I called Mr. Gwartney to ask if the investigation was finished and he told me it was not. I then asked why Ms. Agnew had not been suspended and he directed me to suspend her, which I promptly did. Mr. Gwartney assured me that he would handle the investigation. On April 11, 1997, Mr. Gwartney called me into his office and told me that I was being terminated for lack of integrity because I interfered with a loss prevention investigation. The reason given by Wal-Mart for my termination is false and contradictory to my actions, as my actions initiated and facilitated the investigation.

22. For the six and one-half years that I worked for Wal-Mart, I was an extremely valuable asset to the company. I created operations for Wal-Mart's Specialty Division Distribution Centers that would eventually be used around the country. I played a key role in establishing the One-hour Photo Centers in new Wal-Mart stores throughout the United States, Canada, and Mexico. All of my performance evaluations rated my performance level at least "exceeds expectations." (Attached hereto is a true and accurate copy of 1997 Management Performance Appraisal as Espinoza-Price Exhibit A.) I believe that I was terminated for complaining about sexual harassment, and because I am a woman who wanted to be promoted within Wal-Mart. I believe that Mr. Gwartney, who terminated me, was especially resentful of my promotions and my use of the Open Door. When I was promoted to International Liaison for the Photo Division, I called to ask him a question about how I would divide my time between supervising San Diego and international stores. He was silent for a few moments and then stated that no one asked him if I should be promoted to this position. His reaction led me to believe that he resented my promotion and did not want to see a woman who had complained of his sexist conduct promoted.

23. I would be willing to consider returning to Wal-Mart if I could be assured that policies that afford equal opportunities for women to advance in the Company would be fairly enforced.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of America that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 17, 2003, at San Diego, CA.

I, Brenda Evans, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I started working at Wal-Mart, Inc. in 1986 as a cashier at the Jackson, Mississippi Sam's Club. In 1992, I was promoted to Cashier Operations Supervisor ("COS"), and promoted again in 1998 to Front End Area Manager. I became Receiving Area Manager in 2000. During my sixteen years at Wal-Mart, I always worked at the Jackson, Mississippi store.

3. In mid-1997, I along with various other women, including Patricia Barnes, and Dorothy Greer, complained to our General Manager, Travis Malone, that only men were being promoted to store management positions, such as area and assistant manager positions. We met with Mr. Malone for about ten minutes, asking him about why only men were being promoted, and all he said in response was that at the last Club where he worked, the women had also talked to him about the same problem. He had no other response and did not do anything else about our complaints. The Home Office in Bentonville, Arkansas, became aware of our concerns, because soon thereafter, the Home Office sent representatives to our store to discuss giving more women promotions. The group from Bentonville was at our store for two days, and talked with a number of the women employees, including myself, about promotion opportunities. It was only after all this that I received a promotion to salaried management.

4. After I become Front End Area Manager in 1998, I often asked my General Manager, John Woodall, about advancement opportunities. I had told him repeatedly that I wanted to become an Assistant Manager, and he responded by saying that first I would have to learn both receiving and merchandising as an area manager. In 2000, after working as an area manager for two years, and after working with the company for fourteen years, I was asked to go to receiving and become an area manager there. The person who replaced me at the front end was named Robert Cathey, a male who had been hired as the receiving manager at the Jackson store one year earlier, in 1999. I had known that I would be moved to receiving, because Mr. Cathey had previously told me that he wanted to "switch positions" so that he could gain "front end experience." When I left the front end in 2000, I was making about $25,000 per year. Soon thereafter, Mr. Cathey told me he was making about $35,000 a year as the Front End Area Manager. When I complained about this to Mr. Woodall, he laughed and denied that the pay disparity was true. Several months later, in about June, 2000, Mr. Cathey became a merchandizing area manager. Later, in April of 2002, right before I left Sam's, it was announced at a Monday morning meeting that Mr. Cathey was to become a business manager/assistant manager.

5. In 2002, after two years as Receiving Area Manager, I indicated to the new General Manager, Silvario Rodriguez, that I wanted to take the next step on my way to becoming an assistant manger and learn merchandising. Mr. Rodriguez responded by telling me to "keep up the good work." Mr. Rodriquez never expressed any intention to promote me. In fact, soon thereafter, Mr. Rodriguez asked me to move back to the front end, and told me that he wanted to do this in order to make room for Pelmer Alston, a male, who needed to learn receiving. Since I had already worked as a Front End Area Manager for more than a year, I did not believe this move was beneficial to my career. I was ready for a promotion to Assistant Manager, or to move into a merchandizing position. It was apparent that Mr. Rodriguez was not supportive of my career and that he would eagerly move me aside to benefit the career of a male employee. I refused to go back to this position. Upset and discouraged at being passed over again, I resigned.

6. I have worked at the front end of Sam's Club for fourteen years. During that entire time, I have seen that virtually all cashiers at Sam's are women. Other parts of the store, such as the grocery department, were virtually all men.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and of the State of Mississippi that the foregoing is true and correct. I signed this Declaration on April 19, 2003 in Jackson, Mississippi.

NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, EDITH ARANA, DEBORAH GUNTER, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, CLEO PAGE, KAREN WILLIAMSON, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiffs, v. WAL-MART STORES, INC. Defendant.	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF DEDRA FARMER IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Dedra Farmer, declare:

1. I am a 32 year old female and live in Lawrence, Kansas.

2. During my employment at Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., I encountered discrimination based upon my gender with regard to compensation and promotions.

3. I worked at Wal-Mart from November 10, 1989 through December 31, 2002. My first job at Wal-Mart was as an associate in both the automotive and sporting goods departments. Throughout my tenure at Wal-Mart I was an associate in hardware, a sales associate in TLE (Tire Lube Express), a Department Manager of TLE, a TLE Manager, and a Department 1 (food) Manager. My starting pay in 1989 was approximately $4.45 an hour and I was making $14.55 an hour when my employment ended at Wal-Mart on December 31, 2002. During my tenure at Wal-Mart I received a standard evaluation during the first year of my employment as an associate. Thereafter, I always received exceeds expectations or above standard evaluations while I was an associate. During the period of time I was a manager I always received 3.0 or above ratings.

4. I began to experience discrimination because of my sex once I became an associate in Division 6, which is also known as TLE. TLE is a division of Wal-Mart that performs basic oil changes, tire replacements, tire repairs, installs batteries, headlights, wiper blades and provides other minor automobile services to Wal-Mart customers. TLE also sells tires, batteries, oil, oil filters, air filters, head lights, replacement bulbs and automobile accessories.

5. I enjoyed working in TLE as I always had an interest in automobiles and their maintenance and repair, probably, in part, because my father was an automobile mechanic. I found the physical nature of the job invigorating and the seasonal changes in the work exciting. Once I started working in TLE, I intended to make advancement through the TLE Division my career with the ultimate goal of moving to the top level of TLE Division Management.

6. The TLE Division of Wal-Mart was male dominated. I worked in the TLE Division in the Manhattan, Bonner Springs, and Lawrence, Kansas stores. In each of those stores, the hourly associates were 90-95% males.

7. When I became a TLE manager, I was the only female TLE manager in my district. While I was a TLE manager there was one additional female who was made a manager. I attended a training program for TLE managers. Less than 10% of the TLE managers at this school were female.

8. Soon after I became an associate in TLE, I decided that I wanted to be a TLE manager and I expressed that desire to my TLE Manager and my District Manager on numerous occasions. I first began showing an interest in becoming a TLE Manager in 1993 and for the next several years I witnessed male associates with less experience and less time with Wal-Mart being promoted into the TLE Management Training Program over me. I witnessed male associates being put into the training program who did not even know how to order supplies. I observed that 90-95% of the male associates who were put into the TLE Management Program were promoted from inside my store. These individuals were Jim Macmillan, Mike Mussleman, Frank Brown, Bob Zerskey, Will Gold and an individual named Bob who was from the Division 1 side of my store. These individuals were all placed in the Management Training Program either by my TLE Managers, Don Dennison and Mike Thompson, or my District Manager, Dave Runyon. I believe these individuals were placed in the Management Training Program over me because they were men and I am a woman. During the same time frame that these men were placed in the program, I received exceeds expectation evaluations, I was dedicated to Wal-Mart and I had expressed a desire to get into the program. Whenever I sought management's recommendations for the program, they would simply come up with some suggestion as to areas that I needed to improve in order to get into the program. These suggestions were vague and had no real basis in fact.

9. I complained of discrimination to a Shoes and Jewelry Regional Manger, Nancy [last name unknown], in 1996. I went to her to complain of discrimination with respect to my promotions because I had no success following my own chain of command. Prior to going to Nancy, I had previously requested entry into the Management Training Program from Don Dennison, my TLE Manager, and his successor, Mike Thompson, and Dave Runyon, my District Manager. A woman that I knew at Wal-Mart had suggested that I speak with Nancy even though she was a Shoes and Jewelry Regional Manager because she might be willing to listen to my complaint. Within 48-hours after having discussed my discrimination claim with Nancy, I was called into a meeting with Dave Runyon and Mike Thompson in which they told me they would never discriminate against women. Nevertheless, Mr. Runyon told me that he still was not going to promote me into the training program as he did not believe I was ready for the program. I asked him to simply give me a chance as I felt I was ready and he refused. He did indicate that he would let me interview with another District Manager in Kansas City and I agreed to do so. I met with the TLE District Manager in Kansas City, Paul, and the interview went well. During the interview, Paul asked me if I was willing to relocate to be a TLE Manager, and I told him I would relocate anywhere other than North and South Dakota. The interview with Paul occurred in July 1996, but I was not notified that I was admitted into the Management Training Program for TLE until October 1996.

10. Upon being admitted to the Management Training Program, I was informed by Mr. Runyon that I was being transferred to the Lawrence, Kansas store for training. I expressed my displeasure in having to move my residence just for the training program and was told by Mr. Runyon that I could not train in my home store. I knew this was not a valid reason for me being sent to Lawrence as I had observed other men being trained in their home stores. Nevertheless, I did relocate to Lawrence, Kansas for the training program.

11. After I completed my training, I was assigned to the store in Bonner Springs, Kansas. I was aware of the condition of this store because I had previously been sent to the store to help "clean it up" as the TLE Department was in bad shape due to an incompetent TLE Manager who had been running the store. I was aware that the store was an old, small, understaffed and a low volume store and that it was not a store that you could ever be promoted from, because it did not do the volume necessary for one to progress in the company. I informed Dave Runyon of all of my concerns about the Bonner Springs store and told him that I did not feel that it was fair to send me to this low volume store. Mr. Runyon told me that I would only have to stay in this store for a short period of time. I was aware that, at the same time that I was being placed in this low volume store, other TLE trainees, all of whom were men, were being placed in high volume stores. The effect of being in a higher volume store is that the TLE Manager's bonus is based on the profit of his department which is always higher in a store with higher volume sales. Consequently, the new TLE Managers in the higher volume stores, at the time I was placed at the Bonner Springs store, all men, were making more money than me for doing the same or similar work. I felt that this was another form of discrimination that I experienced at Wal-Mart. The individuals that I know who were placed into high volume stores on their first assignments as managers were James Scott, Jim McMillan, David McMillan, Rusty Goodmiller, Jared Budreau and Todd [last name unknown].

12. I requested a transfer from my District Manager, Dave Runyon, from the Bonner Springs store on numerous occasions. Time and time again my transfers were denied by Mr. Runyon while other male TLE trainees were placed in more profitable stores.

13. I was denied transfers to the Manhattan, Kansas and the Ottawa, Kansas stores. I learned of the openings at the Ottawa store and requested of my District Manger, Dave Runyon, a transfer to that store. Mr. Runyon's only response was "we'll see." The next time I inquired about the position it had already been filled and I was never even considered for this position. I asked Mr. Runyon why I was not considered and he indicated that I had not spent twelve months in the Bonner Springs store which was a requirement before transfer to another store. I know this was not a valid reason because the individual who was placed in the Ottawa store, Jared, only managed that store for three to four months before he was sent to manage the Junction City store which was an even higher volume store. I believe this is another form of discrimination as men were not held to these so-called "rules" when it came to their promotions while these "rules" were used against me, a woman, when I tried to improve my position in the company.

14. I also asked Mr. Runyon if I could transfer to the Manhattan, Kansas store when I learned of an opening in that store. The Manhattan store was also a higher volume store than the Bonner Springs store.

Mr. Runyon denied my request to transfer to that store claiming that I could not be a manager in that store because that was my original home store. However, I know that this was also an invalid reason as the individual that was placed in the Manhattan store as TLE Manager came from the Photo Department of the Manhattan Store. His name was Rusty Goodmiller.

15. In 1999, I became aware of the fact that the Lawrence, Kansas store, a high volume store, was terminating its TLE Manager and I requested a transfer to that store as TLE manager. The TLE Manager position was given to James Scott, a trainee with much less experience and competence in the TLE division than me. I know that he was given this position without interviewing for the job and that, in fact, this position was never posted and was only given to James Scott on the recommendation of the TLE Manager who was just fired. I believe that this was another form of discrimination exercised against me as I had been in the Bonner Springs store for the appropriate amount of time to train, I had improved the Bonner Springs store, and I was well qualified to run a large volume store, yet it was given to a less qualified male.

16. While I was a TLE Manager I was aware that the bonus potential was less in the Bonner Springs store than in the larger volume stores and I expressed my concern in that regard to my direct supervisor, Dave Runyon. My concern proved to be justified as it became clear to me while I was TLE Manager in the Bonner Springs store that the other TLE managers in my district, who were all in higher volume stores, were receiving larger bonuses than I was receiving. The Lawrence, Kansas store was one of the highest volume stores in the district and the TLE Manager in that store would necessarily receive a higher bonus and have a better opportunity to be promoted up the TLE ladder.

17. After I was turned down for the transfer to the Lawrence store I determined that it was in my best interest to resign as a TLE Manager. I discussed this with Dave Runyon before doing so and again expressed my concern over the lack of promotional opportunities and the lower pay I would be receiving so long as I remained at the Bonner Springs store. No one at Wal-Mart offered me any alternatives to remaining at the Bonner Springs store, so I resigned as TLE Manager and transferred to the Lawrence, Kansas store as an associate.

18. I also believe that I was discriminated against in the way I was treated by upper management while I was a TLE Manager. The District Manager, Dave Runyon, and the Regional Manager, George Alderman, would frequently socialize with the male TLE Managers and would exclude me from the group. It was the practice of the Regional Manager, George Alderman, to take the TLE trainee and the TLE Manager to lunch when he was visiting the store where the TLE Manager worked. I observed Mr. Alderman engage in this practice in previous stores where I worked. The only time that I noticed that he did not take the TLE Manager to lunch when he visited a store was when I was the TLE Manager. I believe the different treatment I received from my District and Regional Managers was because I am a woman.

19. When I went to the Lawrence, Kansas store I was made the Department Manager for TLE and assisted James Scott, the TLE Manager. I essentially ran the entire TLE Department for Mr. Scott. I chose to transfer out of that department due to my lack of desire to run the department for the TLE Manager. Mr. Scott was upset when I transferred departments as he was concerned that he would be unable to run the TLE Department without my assistance. Within several weeks after I moved out of the TLE area, Mr. Scott resigned. I was transferred to foods as a Department Manager and remained in that position until my employment at Wal-Mart ended. I continued to receive exceeds expectations on all my performance appraisals after I transferred to the Lawrence, Kansas store.

20. Apart from my own experience, I did observe other women at Wal-Mart being paid less than men with either similar or less experience. As an example, Louise Rails has been with Wal-Mart for over eight years and is still only making between $8.00-9.00 per hour. Louise Rails has never received a merit raise in her eight years even though she is a dedicated employee who is well respected for her work. Dennis Lowe, a man that worked for Wal-Mart with less experience than Louise Rails, received two merit raises in one year for a lateral move.

21. I raised the gender gap pay issue with Wal-Mart's CEO Lee Scott by sending him two e-mails, one on August 30, 2000, a copy of which is attached hereto as Exhibit 1, and the other on February 12, 2001, a copy of which is attached hereto as Exhibit 2. These e-mails raised several issues regarding the work environment at Wal-Mart as well as the equal pay for women issue. In response to my August 30, 2000 e-mail, Wal-Mart sent Brad Shaffner and Mel Stos to my store to discuss with me and Alis McKenna the issues raised in the e-mail. Eventually Wal-Mart largely resolved the issues other than discrimination raised in the e-mail. Mr. Shaffner and Mr. Stos told Alix and I that they were going to run spreadsheets to analyze the gender pay gap and that they would get back to us after they ran the spreadsheets. One of the reasons I sent the February 12, 2001 e-mail to Mr. Scott was to follow up on Wal-Mart's promise to run spreadsheets on the gender pay gap issue since we had heard nothing on this issue since our meeting with Mr. Shaffner and Mr. Stos. No one at Wal-Mart has ever responded to our inquiry in the February 12, 2001 e-mail about the gender pay gap analysis. Wal-Mart never showed us any spreadsheets or even advised us if the spreadsheets were ever run or analyzed.

22. While employed at the Lawrence store there were approximately 25-35 department managers. Only four to six of the department managers were men and the remainder were women. There were approximately six assistant managers at the Lawrence, Kansas store and only one of those managers was a female.

23. On December 31, 2002, I was terminated from my employment at Wal-Mart. Originally I was told that I was being terminated because I "stole" time from Wal-Mart by taking too many breaks and that my breaks were too long. Later, when it became apparent that this was not true, Wal-Mart came up with a different justification, equally untrue. I believe that I was actually terminated in retaliation for my long standing complaints regarding the presence of sexual discrimination at Wal-Mart. I have complained of sexual discrimination since 1996 when I was being denied promotion opportunities. I continued to complain of sexual discrimination when I was placed in the Bonner Springs store, when I joined this case as a class member (I was deposed in the case by Wal-Mart on August 30, 2002), and most recently when I supported a female employee of Wal-Mart who was making a sexual harassment complaint against Wal-Mart.

24. My support of the sexual harassment complainant was known to Wal-Mart management because the complainant informed the Store Manager that I was either a witness to the sexual harassment or that I had experienced sexual harassment from the same manager she claimed had harassed her. I did advise this particular female associate to use the Open Door policy when her complaints were not taken seriously by the Store Manager. She followed my advice and ultimately the District Manager investigated the complaint and terminated the male associate. It was after the upper management investigation of the sexual harassment complaints that the Store Manager fired me on December 31, 2002. I used the Open Door policy to appeal the firing to the home office. The Home Office told me that they were going to take the matter seriously, investigate and meet with me. They later informed me that they were going to affirm the termination and explained I was terminated for clocking-in early, not for taking too many breaks. I had never been coached or warned about the alleged clocking-in too early behavior and I was not given an opportunity to confront management about the new alleged basis for my termination.

25. I received numerous commendations throughout my career with Wal-Mart and never received a single coaching during the thirteen years that I worked for Wal-Mart. Different reasons being given at different times for my termination, my long standing complaints about sexual discrimination, the timing of the termination in conjunction with my assistance to the female associate complaining of sexual harassment and my participation as a class member in this case, cause me to believe that I was terminated in retaliation for expressing my feelings about sexual discrimination at Wal-Mart.

26. After I stepped down as TLE Manager, I was approached on occasion by another female TLE Manager, Ann McCune, as to whether or not I would be interested in re-entering the TLE Management training program and I indicated to her that, as long as the discrimination against women in the workplace was occurring with respect to females progressing in management I would not be interested in being in the management training program. However, I told her that if Wal-Mart did change its discriminatory policies than I would be interested in being placed back in the management training program in Wal-Mart.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Kansas that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 7, 2003 at Lawrence, Kansas.

I, JENNIFER FURTADO, declare:

1. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in this Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

2. I was employed by Wal-Mart, Inc. from January 4, 1992 through March 5, 1999 at three different stores in New Hampshire and two different stores in New Mexico. I am female.

3. Wal-Mart was my first full-time job after graduating from high school. Although I started out as a cashier, I worked my way up to Department Manager, Support Manager and then into the Management Training Program. I was never promoted to an Assistant Manager position.

4. During my employment with Wal-Mart, I was never disciplined and my performance evaluations were always at least "standard" and most often "above standard" and "outstanding." On four separate occasions, I received "Great Job" Awards for "exceeding [Wal-Mart's] expectations above and beyond." (Attached as Furtado Exhibit A is a true and accurate copy of my January 1999 award.)

5. During the first six years of my employment, I was working mostly full-time while attending university full time as well. In May 1998, I obtained my Bachelor of Arts degree from the University of New Hampshire. At no time did any of the many different Store Managers I worked for inform me about Wal-Mart's First In Line Program. I later learned that this program allowed junior and seniors who were Wal-Mart associates to train as Company managers as a part of their educational program. Upon graduation, they would be " first in line" for an Assistant Manager position without having to go through Wal-Mart's internal Management Training Program.

6. During my first six years at Wal-Mart, I worked at stores in Derry, Somersworth, an Portsmouth, New Hampshire and in Albuquerque, New Mexico. I observed that both the operational and personnel policies and practices in each of these stores were the same. In addition to these four stores, I was often sent to other stores that were opening in New Hampshire as part of a "set up" team to ensure that the new stores were operating consistent with Wal-Mart policies and practices. Each store was linked directly to corporate headquarters in Bentonville, Arkansas through computers. The computers allowed store management to receive daily recap reports from Bentonville that highlighted any problems areas that needed to be addressed. The Store Manager would review information from these reports with us each morning.

7. After graduation, I requested a transfer to New Mexico where I was employed again in the same Albuquerque store and also in the Belen store. The Belen store operated similarly to each of the other stores I had worked in. The same personnel policies and practices were in effect and it was linked to Bentonville through computers.

8. During the more than seven years I was employed by Wal-Mart, none of the jobs or promotions I attained were posted. Instead, I got the positions by expressing interest in them to a department or assistant manager after learning from other employees or personal observations that someone had quit, been fired or transferred. Sometimes I was preselected for promotion without even asking. For example, I was promoted from a stocker position to Department Manager in the Boys Department at the Derry store when Assistant Manager Michelle [last name unknown] asked me if I wanted the job and I accepted. I was promoted from a sales associate position to Department Manager in the Girls Department in the Albuquerque store when Assistant Manager Patty Hudson told me they were splitting that department off from the Infant Department and asked me if I wanted the job.

9. I began to seriously explore a management career with Wal-Mart when I spent my junior year as an exchange student at the University of New Mexico. Although no one ever informed me about the First In Line Program, I knew that Wal-Mart had a Management Training Program from talking with Management Trainees who had been assigned to my stores, both in New Hampshire and New Mexico. While I was working in the Albuquerque store, I told Assistant Manager Patty Hudson that I was interested in the program. I also had several conversations with District Manager Peter Abbott about entering the Management Training Program. He told me that I should apply for it when I finished school. He also indicated to me that he thought I would be able to move through the program rapidly because I had so much experience. At the end of the school year, District Manager Abbott had to approve my request to transfer back to New Hampshire. On the form, he wrote, "This associate is an outstanding person[.] [D]oes a great job. Thanks." (Attached hereto as Furtado Exhibit B is a true and accurate copy of the Transfer Notice.)

10. When I graduated from the University of New Hampshire in May 1998, I decided to return to New Mexico to join the Management Training Program there. I called my former Store Manager from Albuquerque, Ken Estes, who informed me that Peter Abbott was no longer the District Manager. However, he offered to talk to the new District Manager, Larry Wilcockson, on my behalf. My transfer was approved in June 1998 and several weeks after returning to the Albuquerque store that I had originally worked in, I met with Mr. Wilcockson at his office in the Belen store. We discussed the Management Training Program. Shortly thereafter, in approximately July 1998, I reported to the Belen store to begin the program.

11. One of my co-trainees at the Belen store was Mike Estrada. Mr. Estrada was already in the Management Training Program when I arrived. Mr. Estrada's training period was very short and he was promoted to an Assistant Manager position in the Belen store while I was still a trainee.

12. Part of my management training included helping the Albuquerque store where I was originally assigned move to a new building and re-open as a Supercenter. Although District Manager Wilcockson had told me initially that I would be responsible for the receiving area of the new Supercenter, I ended up "setting up" the Apparel Department while Assistant Manager Mike Maholic took over the receiving area. By the time the new Albuquerque Supercenter opened, I felt ready for promotion. All I lacked was training in the Receiving Department.

13. At the time it opened, the Albuquerque Supercenter was still in need of one Assistant Manager so I talked to Store Manager Estes about filling that opening after I completed the training program. Mr. Estes, the Set-Up Managers and the other Assistant Managers would joke with me an tell me to take off my "trainee" badge since I was already an Assistant Manager. Finally, I asked District Manager Wilcockson how much longer my training program would take and if he knew what store I would be going to. Mr. Wilcockson named several stores, including Espanola, which was a 3 to 4 hour roundtrip commute from my home.

14. In subsequent discussions with District Manager Wilcockson, I tried to convince him to assign me to the Albuquerque Supercenter. He told me that trainees were not allowed to become Assistant Managers in the same store they trained in. I did not believe this to be true since I was aware that my former co-trainee, Mike Estrada, had trained and been promoted to an Assistant Manager in the same store. Nonetheless, I told Mr. Wilcockson that while I was willing to change stores, my circumstances had changed, that my husband had a job in Albuquerque paying more money than I was making, and that it did not make sense for us to relocate two hours away to Espanola. Mr. Wilcockson was very displeased with my unwillingness to relocate outside of the Albuquerque area.

15. Even though Store Manager Estes told me that he wanted to keep me as an Assistant Manager in the Albuquerque Supercenter, he said that the decision where I would be placed was within the control of the District Manager. At no point in time did he or District Manager Wilcockson inform me about Wal-Mart's Resident Assistant Manager program. This program allows associates to train for management and promote to an Assistant Manager position in the same store. Eventually, District Manager Wilcockson assigned a male, Robert Phillips, to the open Assistant Manager position in the Albuquerque Supercenter. Mr. Phillips, who had recently been hired from outside the Company and who was not required to complete the Management Training Program, was allowed to promote to an Assistant Manager position within the same store where he was currently working, just as Mike Estrada had been allowed to do.

16. Over the next few months, District Manager Wilcockson continued to be vague regarding when I would be promoted and to where. By now, I had been in management training for approximately sixteen to eighteen weeks. During this same time period, Wal-Mart realigned some of the Albuquerque stores into another district headed by Peter Abbott. I asked Mr. Wilcockson to talk to Mr. Abbott, my former District Manager, to see whether he had any stores I could be assigned to. I was never offered an Assistant Manager position by District Manager Wilcockson or District Manager Abbott.

17. Although there were at least seven other Wal-Mart stores within a reasonable commute from my home, I was not able to determine whether there were any Assistant Manager openings in these stores because Wal-Mart does not post or advertise the Assistant Manager position in any manner. Management trainees are not allowed to "apply" for an Assistant Manager position after they complete the program. Instead, they must wait until the District Manager hand-selects them for placement. District Manager Wilcockson's refusal to allow me to relocate to another store in the Albuquerque area convinced me that I had no future with Wal-Mart.

18. In November 1998, after I had completed approximately twenty weeks of management training, I finally decided to talk to District Manager Wilcockson about stepping down from the Management Trainee Program. His only response was to tell me that I would lose my salary and GAP [geographic adjustment payment]. This confirmed my understanding that he had no intention of promoting me unless I agreed to relocate to the Espanola store. I subsequently asked Store Manager Estes to find an hourly position for me within his store.

19. After I was in the Management Training Program, I was taking graduate business courses at the University of New Mexico. One class, entitled "Organizational Behaviors and Diversity Awareness," required me to do a research project on the glass ceiling phenomenon. I decided to research whether gender balance existed in upper management at Wal-Mart. To do this, I reviewed the Company's lists of Store Managers for each of the forty-one states for which data was available on the computer as well as its lists of District Managers, Regional Managers and Regional Vice Presidents. After printing out these lists, I counted the number of men and women on each list.

20. When I started this project, I thought that women were being held back at Wal-Mart by only one District Manager: Larry Wilcockson. After reviewing the data, however, I realized that the lack of female managers at Wal-Mart was a wide-spread Company problem, and not an isolated event. For instance, I counted only 286 female Store Managers compared to the 1742 male Store Managers, or 14% female. And the numbers were significantly worse the higher up the corporate ladder I investigated. At the Regional Manager level, I counted only two females out of 29, or 7%. I made pie charts to demonstrate the result of my research and gave an oral presentation to my class. (Attached hereto as Furtado Exhibit C are true and accurate copies of some of my data, pie charts and oral presentation for the glass ceiling project.) This research, combined with my own experience of being unable to advance at Wal-Mart, led me to leave the Company in March 1999.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Massachusetts that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 23, 2003, at 6:36 p.m.

I, Anita Galentine, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I was hired to work for Wal-Mart at a Supercenter in Dublin, Ohio in May 2001. At the time I applied, I already had 20 years of retail and hotel managerial experience. Despite my past experience, I was hired as a Cashier making about $8.00 an hour. I asked about available management positions but they told me they only had cashier positions. They did not mention anything about the management training program or the possibility of advancing into management.

3. A few months later, still in 2001, I transferred voluntarily to a Wal-Mart Store in Cartersville, Georgia as a Sales Associate. Almost immediately, I expressed an interest in the management training program. I spoke directly with Assistant Manager Mark Hamby and Assistant Manager Keith [last name unknown]. I spoke with them informally on the sales floor, as well as individually in their offices. Mr. Hamby told me that he would be harder on me than anyone else. While he did not explain himself, I felt that he expected me to work extra hard to prove myself to him.

4. I could not locate any written information about the process of applying for management training. I was very goal-oriented and really wanted to find out more about moving into management. Later in 2001, I spoke with District Manager Rudy Sims and Regional Manager Tony Samples about moving up into management training. I spoke with them both informally on the sales floor and in separate meetings. Neither of them was very responsive and I did not feel they were taking my requests seriously. I reminded both of them of my 20 years of prior retail and management experience but they remained uninterested. I also spoke with Store Manager Fred Whitmer about my interest in advancing into management training. He told me I had to move to Inventory Control in order to learn the layout of the store. He immediately moved me into the position of Inventory Control Specialist. I was not interested in this position and did not receive a raise but I felt I had no choice if I wanted to move into the management training program. I never saw any men required to work in Inventory Control prior to entering the management training program. I did observe a male Grocery Manager named Ira [last name unknown], who went directly into the management training program, without working in Inventory Control. In addition, a male Produce employee [name unknown] was allowed to enter the management training program without going through Inventory Control.

5. In the Fall 2001, Co-Manager Paul Davis began to subject me to a series of his own "tests" claiming they would demonstrate whether I was ready for management training. Because Wal-Mart did not provide any information about the process or requirements for admission to the management training program, I had no way of knowing whether these "trials" were, in fact, part of the process. For example, I was repeatedly ordered to re-set modulars and would often spend 14-15 hours at a time doing so. I was not paid overtime for these extra hours and, in fact, was specifically told that overtime was not allowed. Each time, Mr. Davis determined that I had completed the task incorrectly and forced me to take a day off from work without pay. I felt that these seemingly endless "trials" were intended to discourage me from pursuing a management position. In my observation, none of the other employees in my department, even those who had expressed an interest in management training (all males), were required to undergo these demeaning tests. I continued to stay late and work on my days off in the hope that I might be promoted to the management training program. It never happened.

6. When I left in December 2001, I was still an Inventory Control Specialist making $8.84 an hour. Despite my commitment and hard work, no one in management every completed a performance evaluation for me. I had received no coachings and continued to remain a diligent employee. On December 19, 2001, Mr. Davis terminated me for eating a $1.59 popcorn chicken in the workplace before paying for it. I regularly observed male employees doing the same thing for which they were never disciplined. I feel that I was terminated because I was very vocal and persistent in my interest in advancing into management training.

7. I am now employed with the State of Georgia as a Clerk II with the Department of Transportation.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Georgia that the foregoing is true and correct.

DECLARATION OF CATHERINE GORBA IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Catherine Gorba, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I am female and a college graduate. I had eight years of retail management experience prior to working for Wal-Mart Stores. From 1990 to1998, I was a cashier for Sheetz and a Store Manager for Sunoco and Barber Oil Co., where I was responsible for personnel, profitability, ordering, and finances.

3. On May 26, 1998, entered Wal-Mart's Manager Training Program at the Indiana, Pennsylvania store. I remained in Indiana until October 1998, when I finished the Manager Training Program and received a promotion to Assistant Manager of the Ebensburg, Pennsylvania Wal-Mart. I remained in the Ebensburg store until I resigned from Wal-Mart Stores on September 8, 2000.

4. I participated in the Manager Training Program with three other associates, two of whom were female, the other male. The two female management trainees and I had, on occasion, discussed our salaries. We affirmed that we were all earning the same amount. However, Lynn [last name unknown], one of the female trainees, showed both the other female trainee and myself the salary of the male manager trainee, Steve Dumm, on Wal-Mart's payroll computer system. I was shocked to learn that Mr. Dumm was earning considerably more than the two other female associates and myself. My pay rate as an assistant manager was $29,500, compared to the $32,000 Mr. Dumm was earning. Lynn, who like myself was earning $29,500, shared a similar background with Mr. Dumm. They both had worked at the same grocery store prior to entering Wal-Mart's Manager Training Program.

5. While participating in the Manager Training Program at the Indiana store, I was present at a manager meeting when my District Manager, David Rulli, stated that he was getting grief for not meeting his quota for female managers. His comment was consistent with his attitude toward me later in my employment. It was as if I had been hired as a token female rather than a college graduate with eight years of retail experience.

6. After I began working at the Ebensburg store in 1998, two male Assistant Manager Trainees, Bill Cogan and Larry McDermott, bragged to me their starting salaries were high. Mr. McDermott's pay rate was $35,000, which was considerably higher than my salary.

7. In mid-1999, I was present when Vicki Stahal, Department Manager of Lawn and Garden, told acting Store Manager of the Ebensburg store, Jim Linsenbigler, about her interest in entering the Manager Training Program. I heard Mr. Linsenbigler tell her that she was not ready for training and that they should discuss it again at a later date. Mr. Linsenbigler confided in me a few weeks later that Ms. Stahal, who was several months pregnant at the time, would have too many responsibilities at home and he was skeptical that she could handle the rigors of a management position. In contrast, during that same time, I heard Mr. Linsenbigler publicly encourage a male hourly Associate, Duane [last name unknown], to pursue management opportunities. Mr. Linsenbigler often would discuss at manager meetings those he wished to see advance in the company. Dan [last name unknown], Department Manager of Electronics, as well as Jay [last name unknown], former Department Manager of Sporting Goods and current Assistant Manager, were also enthusiastically discussed by Mr. Linsenbigler at manager meetings. Throughout my tenure at Wal-Mart, I never saw Mr. Linsenbigler approach any equally qualified and interested female employees regarding promotion opportunities.

8. In March 1999, my Store Manager, Sandy Hill, changed my schedule so that I worked from 5:00 p.m. until 3:00 a.m. three days a week and from 3:00 p.m. until 2:00 a.m. two days a week. Ms. Hill and I agreed that because my daughter is diabetic and I needed to be with her overnight, it was acceptable for me to work through my lunch break so that I could leave my shift an hour early on the days I was to work until 3:00 a.m.. I accepted this change in my schedule, despite the fact that I did not know why I was placed on a shift that was unique for an Assistant Manager. However, after working this shift for a few months, I grew concerned that I was not learning enough about the different areas of the store, which was slowing my promotability at Wal-Mart.

9. In July 1999, Mr. Linsenbigler took me aside and told me that I had no business working for Wal-Mart because I had a sick child at home. He questioned my ability to give 100 percent to Wal-Mart because my family needed me. He then stated, "Wal-Mart does not deserve to have someone like you working for them. Wal-Mart needs someone who can dedicate all her time and energy to the store." I was shocked and offended at his comment because I never had missed a day of work due to my daughter's condition.

10. Also in July 1999, I asked Mr. Linsenbigler for a day off from work so I could accompany my husband to the doctor. Despite my explanation of my husband's condition, Mr. Linsenbigler denied my request for the day off. When male Assistant Manager, Steve Dumm, asked Mr. Linsenbigler for extended time off to care for his wife during her pregnancy, Mr. Linsenbigler approved Mr. Dumm's time away from work. Furthermore, Mr. Linsenbigler, himself, had taken several days off from work to care for his ill mother.

11. As a result of these three concerns, I decided to use the Open Door. I approached my District Manager, Mr. Rulli, in July 1999. I told him my concerns regarding my schedule, the comment made by Mr. Linsenbigler about my need to care for my family, and my denial of a day off to accompany my husband to the doctor. He responded that we could talk in greater detail later that day. When I returned at the requested time, I was surprised to see Mr. Linsenbigler at the meeting as well as Mr. Rulli's assistant, Barb [last name unknown], since I thought that my use of the Open Door meant our conversation would be kept confidential. Mr. Rulli told me at the meeting that I was to be pulled off the hybrid daytime and overnight shift that I had been working. He said that I would be informed later as to whether I would be required to work an overnight or daytime shift. Mr. Rulli did, however, agree that Mr. Linsenbigler should have granted my day off to accompany my husband to the doctor.

12. After several days had passed, Mr. Linsenbigler told me that I had to work an overnight shift from 10:00 p.m. until 7:30 or 8:00 a.m. Because of my daughter's condition, I could not work such a schedule. Furthermore, because of the retaliation I experienced for using the Open Door, I thought it futile to attempt to negotiate a new schedule. I instead took a voluntary demotion to Department Manager of Lingerie the following week to ensure that I only would be scheduled for daytime shifts. Despite my desire to continue to pursue management opportunities, I remained Department Manager until I left Wal-Mart Stores the following year.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Pennsylvania that the foregoing is true and correct.

I, Earnestine Gordon, declare:

1. I am female and a current employee of Wal-Mart. I am African American and reside in Pittsburg, California

2. I have worked at the Wal-Mart store in Pittsburg, California, since 1992. I have worked both in Division 1, which is the main division, and in Division 6, which is the Tire and Lube Express (TLE) division. I was denied a raise when I was promoted to TLE Support Manager in 1998. I was denied information that would have allowed me to compete for a TLE Manager position, which I am very interested in and qualified for.

3. I was hired in 1992 as a Cashier in Division 1 for the winter holiday season. In March 1993, I was promoted to permanent status. From 1992 to 1994, I worked in Division 1 as a Cashier, at the Courtesy Desk, and in Lay-Away. None of these positions were posted, and I was not interviewed. I was selected for each assignment by a manager.

4. In 1994, a Division 1 Customer Service Manager position became available. The position was not posted, but I knew it was available because the employee who held the position had left. Assistant Manager Ricky Robinson gave me the promotion without an interview. As a Customer Service Manager, I trained and supervised Cashiers, handled customer complaints, and kept all customer service departments stocked with necessary supplies.

5. In 1995, I was asked by Store Manager Rick Pace to return to the Courtesy Desk because the area was understaffed. I agreed, but I was unhappy to lose my supervisory duties. I started looking for a position elsewhere in the store.

6. I saw a position for TLE Cashier posted near the time clock. Even though the position was not an hourly supervisory job, I was interested because it paid more money. I was also interested in working in the TLE Division because it is a smaller division and I believed I would have more opportunities to prove myself and gain promotions. I applied for the Cashier position and was hired in approximately May 1995 after an interview with TLE Manager Matt Steigert. Shortly after I took the TLE Cashier position, the new TLE Manager, Scott Thomas, promoted me to Perpetual Inventory Specialist. I had not applied for the position. I held that position until approximately 1998, when my job title changed to TLE Department Manager. Although my job title changed, my job duties did not change substantially.

7. In approximately March 1998, TLE Manager Marco Campbell promoted me to TLE Support Manager. The position was not posted, and I was not interviewed. Although my job duties increased substantially, as described below, I did not receive a raise when I was promoted, and TLE Manager Campbell described the change as a lateral move.

8. As TLE Support Manager, my responsibilities included running daily computer reports, calculating time and service charges for automobile technicians, handling customer complaints, directing associates to the appropriate manager for specific issues, scheduling associates for work, and performing the duties of the TLE manager in his or her absence.

9. Early in my career at Wal-Mart, I became interested in a management position with the company. In 1993, I wrote on my annual performance appraisal that my goal was to "become a manager of a department and go on from there." (True and correct copy attached hereto as Gordon Exhibit A.) After several years of merit raises, promotions, and "outstanding" performance evaluations, I knew that I had proved myself as a valued Wal-Mart employee and I believed I could win further promotions. On my annual performance appraisal for 1998, I commented that I wanted to "learn more about the duties of TLE Manager." (True and correct copy attached hereto as Gordon Exhibit B.)

10. I never saw any written information about the job of TLE Manager. I never learned of a way to apply directly for the job of TLE Manager. I expressed interest in the TLE Manager position to three different TLE Managers during 1998 to 2002: Martin Vandenberg, Marie Perkins, and Michelle Notah. In response to my inquiries, all three managers told me that TLE Managers are required to relocate for training and placement. When I told each manager that my family responsibilities prevent me from relocating out of the Pittsburg area, each manager told me that the door to TLE management was closed.

11. No TLE Manager ever informed me of the Resident Manager Program, which I would have been interested in pursuing. I live with and care for my grandson, my mother, and my infirm husband, and my son and daughter frequently live with me as well. These responsibilities make it impossible for me to move away from the Pittsburg area. If I had been informed of the Resident Manager Program, I would have been very interested in pursuing a Manager job. If applications were available, I would have applied.

12. Since 1998, when I was promoted to TLE Support Manager, the TLE Department has had five new TLE Managers. I have never been encouraged to apply for any of the TLE Manager positions, even though I have received many "outstanding" and "exceeds expectations" evaluations and I have frequently performed the duties of the TLE Manager when he or she was away.

13. Wal-Mart had a short open application process for the Management Training Program in January 2003. Because I am currently the only morning Cashier in the TLE Department, I am not able to attend the morning meetings, where the application period was announced. If had known about the application period, I would have applied for a resident management training position.

14. On February 14,2002, I was demoted to TLE Sales Associate because I was not available to work on Sundays because I attend church. My availability had never previously been a problem in the TLE Department. I currently remain a TLE Sales Associate.

15. I work in the same store as named plaintiff Betty Dukes. I have never heard other employees criticize Ms. Dukes' work performance. I have never had any complaints about Ms. Dukes' work performance.

16. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and the State of California that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 7 (month and day), 2003, at Pittsburg, California (city and state).

NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, CLEO PAGE, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, DEBORAH GUNTER, KAREN WILLIAMSON AND EDITH ARANA, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiff, vs. WAL-MART STORES, INC., Defendant	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF DEBORAH GUNTER IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, DEBORAH GUNTER, declare:

1. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in this Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

2. I was first employed by Wal-Mart, Inc. during the 1993 winter holiday season as a seasonal employee in Texas. I had previously met Sam Walton in Dallas and was very impressed with him and his Company. My full-time career with Wal-Mart began several years later in Southern California. I was employed from April 2, 1996 through August 25, 1999 at three different stores in Riverside, Perris, and Lake Elsinore, California. I am female. I had more than twenty years' experience working in retail, including supervisory and management experience, prior to working for Wal-Mart. During the three years I worked at Wal-Mart, I was repeatedly denied training and management opportunities. I never obtained a department manager or support manager position, much less my goal of becoming a company leader.

3. I first learned about this lawsuit after watching a television news program during which a named plaintiff and her attorney were interviewed regarding Wal-Mart's employment practices. Everything she said about Wal-Mart was so similar to what I had experienced that I called the news station to get the number of the attorney who was suing the company. I wanted to do whatever I could to support a lawsuit that would end gender discrimination in promotion and pay and open up advancement opportunities for women at Wal-Mart. I became a named plaintiff myself because I too was unfairly denied promotional opportunities, training, and equal pay during my three years with the company. I want to change Wal-Mart's corporate culture and employment practices so that women have the same opportunity to advance with the company as men currently do. Through this lawsuit, I seek to hold Wal-Mart accountable for providing women with equal access to the training and mentoring necessary for promotion into the more desirable, higher paying positions; equal opportunity for promotion into store, district and regional level management positions; and equal pay for their work. I understand the responsibilities of a named plaintiff and class representative. I am prepared to fulfill my duties to the women in the class so that they achieve fair and equitable treatment. I am willing to return to Wal-

Mart if this lawsuit results in equal opportunities for women to advance in the company so long as Wal-Mart also ends its on-going retaliation against me and other women who have complained about its gender discriminatory practices.

4. My first job with Wal-Mart was in 1993 as a cashier on the Express Lane during the winter holiday season in Waxahachie, Texas. I was hired as a seasonal employee and worked approximately four months from October 1993 through January 1994. I worked under a female Store Manager, Wendy [last name unknown], and two female Assistant Managers, whose names I no longer remember. I was impressed that the store was run by three female managers and formed the impression that women could advance at Wal-Mart.

5. In approximately March 1996, I submitted a written application for employment with Wal-Mart. At that time, I was going to school and I had been working a variety of jobs through a temporary service. I had also earned my Certification as a Pharmacy Technician but had been unable to find work in this field. I decided to apply to Wal-Mart because I wanted a permanent job with a company that would offer stability and promotional opportunities. Wal-Mart also had a pharmacy.

6. The Personnel Manager of the Riverside store called me regarding an open position in the Photo Lab. I had three years of training in photography so I thought this might be an interesting opportunity. I was hired as a cashier in the Photo Lab after interviewing with the Photo Department Manager, Milford Pyles. I started out part-time on April 2, 1996 at the rate of $5.50 an hour. Wal-Mart defines full-time status as working twenty-eight hours a week. In July 1996, I received a "standard" ninety-day evaluation and a 30-cent raise, which brought my pay rate to $5.80 an hour.

7. I was excited to begin my career at Wal-Mart. I learned everything I could about the Photo Lab and soon was able handle all aspects of photo processing. This proved to be a liability rather than an asset as I found myself working 12-hour shifts without a single break. I would complain to Mr. Pyles but staffing of the Photo Lab, especially on the weekends, continued to be a problem. I did not receive overtime pay when I worked these long shifts because I was still on part-time status.

8. On one of my shifts in October 1996, I began having chest pains. I asked Department Manager Pyles if I could be released from work to go to the hospital. Mr. Pyles refused to let me go because there were only two of us working the department that day. When I finished my shift, I went straight to the hospital where I was admitted and given nitroglycerin. My doctor then placed me on the medication Ativan and a two month medical leave. When I returned, I requested a transfer to a different department. I was interested in a nighttime stocking position because this would leave me free to continue my education during the days.

9. While I was working in the Photo Lab, I repeatedly asked Mr. Pyles and other Assistant Managers at the Riverside store for training on the Telzon machine, a hand-held computer that scans Wal-Mart merchandise for pricing and inventory purposes. It indicates what products have been reordered, which ones are discontinued, and what an automatic turnaround time will be from the warehouse. I wanted this training because I thought it would help me advance in the company. My requests for Telzon training were denied. Eventually, I taught myself how to use the Telzon.

10. In February 1997, I was transferred to a stocker position on the night shift after interviewing with the Overnight Manager, Steve Martin. Mr. Martin told me that he had observed my work and he felt that I would be an asset to his shift. My hours during the winter were from 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. and during the summer from 12 a.m. to 8 a.m. In April 1997, I received my first annual evaluation. I was again ranked "standard" and received another 30-cent raise. I was then earning $6.10 an hour.

11. While working the nigh shift, I learned through the grapevine that male stockers were being paid more than female stockers. I also observed that men were most frequently assigned to the receiver position, which pays more than the stocker position. For example, a male co-worker on the night shift, David Williams, told me he was being paid $8.50 an hour. This was more $2.00 more an hour than I was being paid.

12. During the two years I worked on the overnight shift, Mr. Martin encouraged me to apply for Department Manager positions. He knew I wanted to excel with the company and he had told me that the way to get into management was by first becoming a Department Manager or a Support Manager.

13. I had also talked to District Manager Nick Fiello about my desire to become a manager and run a store some day. District Manager Fiello would joke with me during his store tours and once told me that maybe I would end up working in Bentonville, which is where Wal-Mart's corporate headquarters is located. He also told me that I needed to become a Department Manager first and then bid on openings for higher positions as they became available.

14. While I was at the Riverside store, I applied three times for a Department Manager position in the Pets Department. I was very qualified for this position because I had been breeding and raising show dogs since I was a young woman. I had also worked in a pet store in approximately 1983. The first time I applied for the position, it was not posted. Overnight Manager Martin told me that it was becoming available and that it would be a perfect opportunity for me to begin my management training. I went to the Assistant Manager over the Pets Department, John [last name unknown] to express my interest in the position. He interviewed me and indicated that he was impressed with my experience. I did not receive the position. The second and third time that the Pets Department position became available, it was not posted either. I only learned it would be available when I heard from other associates that the current manager was stepping down.

15. At that time, there was no formal application process at the Riverside store. An employee applied by telling a specific manager that you were interested in the position. Despite having told Assistant Manager John [last name unknown] each time the job opened that I was interested and that I had many years experience breeding and raising animals as well as managing businesses, I was passed over three times; twice in favor of men, including Brandon Rapallo and another male whose name I have forgotten. None of these managers remained in the position for very long. Each time I was denied the position, I complained to Overnight Manager Martin and Store Manager Tracey O'Neal. Although Mr. Martin supported me, Store Manager O'Neal simply told me that all applicants had been given a fair opportunity and that more experienced employees were selected. I believe the short length of time these candidates served in the position indicated their lack of experience and qualifications.

16. In March 1998, I received my yearly evaluation. I received a "standard" ranking. None of the Riverside associates received a raise that year because in February 1998, Store Manager O'Neal informed us that he would be implementing a store-wide cost of living adjustment. As a result, my pay rate was increased 30 cents to $6.40 an hour.

17. In May 1998, I requested a transfer to the Perris store. I was interested in moving closer to my home and returning to the day shift. I was also still interested in moving up in the company and feeling that there was no place for me to move to in the Riverside store. I told Mr. Martin that I would be willing to go to any of the nearby stores: Fontana, Moreno Valley, Perris. He said he would keep his eyes open for a position for me and later told me there were openings available in the TLE Specialty Division. I told him I was interested in the TLE and later the TLE Managers from both the Perris and Moreno Valley stores contacted me. Both Managers offered me a position in their TLE Departments. I accepted the position at the Perris store because it was closer to my home and because I knew the TLE Manager, John McCann, who had trained the year before at the Riverside store. Mr. McCann offered me a customer service/cashier position on the day shift at $7.00 an hour. My hours were 7 a.m. to 3:30 p.m.

18. When I began working in the TLE area of the Perris store, there was no Support Manager on the day shift. I quickly learned my own duties and those of a Support Manager as well. I learned what the specific duties of a Support Manager were from the TLE Night Support Manager, Beverly [last name unknown], and from TLE Manager McCann. These duties included setting up the register, counting the money, writing up orders, checking inventory and placing orders on the computers, assisting the TLE District Manager during store visits and TLE meetings, and servicing the customers. At some point, I asked Mr. McCann about whether there would be a day shift Support Manager position and expressed interest in it. He told me that he was trying to get a day Support Manager position and that I could fill it whenever TLE District Manager Mickey Anderson authorized it.

19. During the summer of 1998, TLE Manager McCann made some sexually explicit comments to me that upset me very much. I complained to Store Manager Kathy Bishop who initially was furious at Mr. McCann. However, during the meeting she arranged between TLE Manager McCann, TLE District Manager Mickey Anderson, her, and me, Mr. Anderson brushed off my claim of sexual harassment as a "misunderstanding." No disciplinary action was taken against TLE Manager McCann.

20. During the fall of 1998, TLE Manager McCann asked me to train a male associate, Dwayne Stockman, regarding the Support Manager's duties. I told Mr. McCann that I had been performing these duties for months without the job title or the pay increase. Mr. McCann again told me he would give me the position when it became available but that he still wanted me to train Mr. Stockman so that I would have a back up.

21. I proceeded to train Mr. Stockman on writing orders, opening and closing the register, using the computer, and researching inventory. Shortly after that, Mr. Stockman was made the Support Manager on the TLE day shift rather than me. Instead, my hours were cut.

22. Some time later, Mr. Stockman was transferred to TLE Support Manager on the night shift and TLE Manager McCann asked me to train another male associate, Jason Devoe, for the Support Manager position. I reminded both TLE Manager McCann and TLE District Manager Anderson that I had been told that I would be given the Support Manager position. They both reassured me that I would be given the position but that they could not rely on me to be there "24/7" so that I needed to train a back-up assistant. I again did as I was asked and trained Mr. Devoe how to be a TLE Support Manager. Shortly thereafter, I was again denied the Support Manager position when Mr. Devoe was promoted into the job and my hours were cut.

23. Upon being denied the position a second time, I complained to Store Manager Kathy Bishop who told me that I needed to go back to TLE Manager McCann and TLE District Manager Anderson. When I asked Mr. McCann when I would be given the Support Manager position and a pay raise, he told me for the first time that I was not fully qualified for the position. This really angered me because I had asked Mr. McCann for additional training on the computer several times and he had always told me that he was too busy to train me.

24. In March 1999, I received a "standard" evaluation and a 4% raise that brought my hourly rate to $7.50. By now, working conditions in the TLE area of the Perris store had become very unbearable to me. Although Mr. McCann had not made any more sexually offensive comments to me, he had denied me training, denied me two promotions to a Support Manager position, cut my hours, and generally made me feel like there was no future for me in the Perris TLE. I felt I had no choice but to transfer stores again.

25. Fortunately, there was a TLE Management Trainee in the Perris store, Doug Clark, who had witnessed what I was going through and who asked me if I wanted to work in his TLE department once he finished his training. We discussed this several times before he was promoted to TLE Manager at the Lake Elsinore store. Once he transferred, I asked Mr. Clark again whether he was still willing to have me work in his department. He responded positively but said he needed about thirty days to get to know his new store and staff before he would transfer me in.

26. In May 1999, my transfer to the Lake Elsinore TLE Department went through. The Perris TLE Manager, John McCann, told me to my face that he was glad to get rid of me. At the Lake Elsinore store, I worked the swing shift, 3 p.m. to 9 p.m. In addition to the duties I had performed at the Perris store, I was now responsible for replenishing the floor before I went home. This meant walking the floor and refilling any oils or chemicals that were low. Aside from this duty associated with the swing shift, the TLE Department at the Lake Elsinore store operated exactly like the TLE Department at the Perris store. Indeed, the policies and practices were the same at all four of the Wal-Mart stores I worked: Waxahachie, Texas and Riverside, Perris and Lake Elsinore, California.

27. On June 8, 1999, I was coached for failing to turn in a moneybag the prior evening. I believe this coaching was unfair. On June 7, I was on my way to turn the moneybag in when Assistant Manager Jim [last name unknown] ordered me back to the department to assist a customer. I hid the moneybag in a safe, concealed place under the register and attended to the customer. While I was assisting that customer, several more customers came in and I served them as well before clocking at the end of my shift. I did not remember the moneybag until the next morning when TLE Manager Clark questioned me about it. I apologized for forgetting to turn the moneybag in but no money was missing and it was an honest mistake. Mr. Clark said that he still had to write me up for the incident because TLE District Manager Anderson had ordered him to. This statement caused me concern and made me wonder if Mr. Anderson would continue to retaliate against me for having complained about TLE Manager McCann's sexual harassment of me and his refusal to promote me to the Support Manager position at the Perris store.

28. In approximately late July or August 1999, TLE Manager Clark asked me to train a male associate named "Pai" [last name unknown], of Asian heritage, on the TLE register and regarding other Support Manager duties. Mr. Clark informed me that "Pai" would be closing the TLE area on the nights when I was not working. I trained "Pai" as requested and then my hours were cut, just as had happened after I trained Dwayne Stockman and Justin Devoe at the Perris store. I was furious and began complaining to Mr. Clark and other Assistant Managers at the Lake Elsinore store that I could not support myself on such reduced hours. In addition to losing wages, my benefits were also at risk of being cut if I did not work enough hours to qualify for coverage.

29. In mid-August 1999, I told TLE Manager Clark that he either had to give me my hours back or I would have to resign. I also called District Manager Anderson to request a meeting with him regarding my hours. At first TLE Manager Clark told me that District Manager Anderson would meet with me. Several days later, TLE Manager Clark informed me that District Manager Anderson was not going to meet with me and that my hours were not going to increase. He also had $800 in cash for me for my exit pay and an exit interview form for me to sign.

30. I believe I was terminated because I complained repeatedly to management when I was passed over for promotions in favor of men who were no more, or less, qualified than me and because I complained when I was sexually harassed by TLE Manager John McCann.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of California that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April ,23 2003, at Perris, California.

I, Sheila Hall, declare:

1. I am a female, former Wal-Mart employee who began working at the Conway, Arkansas store in March 1994, while I was attending school at the University of Central Arkansas. My first position was in the Deli. During the summer, I transferred to the Columbia, Missouri store, where I worked at the Snack Bar. When I returned to school, I once again worked at the Deli in the Conway store. I transferred to Automotive briefly at the beginning of 1995, and moved to Toys in the summer of 1995.

2. The Toy Department was located next to the Hardware Department. I was often required to cover for Hardware when employees took lunches and breaks, and when they were called to the front end to work as cashiers. For several months, I asked Support Manager Russ Roden if I could transfer from the Toy Department to the Hardware Department. I preferred working in Hardware, and I did not want to work in two different departments. My request was repeatedly denied. I was told by Mr. Roden, "We need you in toys . . . you're a girl, why do you want to be in Hardware?" Assistant Managers Joe Austin and Mark Tinney also made similar remarks when I discussed the transfer with them.

3. In the three or four months I spent repeatedly requesting to be transferred, several male employees with no previous Hardware experience, and less Wal-Mart experience than I had, were hired instead of me as sales associates in Hardware. Corey Kellybrew and Phillip Garrett were hired into the position I had been requesting for months.

4. Finally, exasperated by Mr. Roden's refusal to transfer me into the Hardware Department, I confronted him and said, "Just because I don't have a penis between my legs, doesn't mean I can't do the job." He moved me into the Hardware Department in February 1997. I did not work with any other women in the Hardware Department.

5. In the Hardware Department, I faced routine comments directed at my gender and my ability to work in Hardware. A male co-employee, Jeff Eskola, alluded to Hardware being a "man's job," and that women should not be doing a man's job. I used the "Open Door" policy and spoke to Store Manager Denny Ashley about Mr. Eskola's comments, and was basically told to "quit whining." After I complained, male co-workers snubbed me, and I was given more difficult tasks. This treatment lasted for several weeks. I chose not to use the "open door" policy with the Home Office in Bentonville, because I did not believe it would do any good, and I did not want any more retaliation.

6. In the spring of 1997, I went out of town with a male co-employee named Joel Dean. We both called in and informed our Assistant Manager, Paul Dehart, that we would not return in time for our next scheduled work day. Upon our return, Mr. Dehart met separately with both Mr. Dean and me. I was given a coaching for the incident, but Mr. Dean was not.

7. I received an "above-standard" rating on every annual evaluation given to me between 1994 and 1999, except for one. I received a "standard" rating on the only evaluations that was not "above standard." Assistant Manager Paul Dehart gave me a merit raise in 1996.

8. I was aware of men who had less experience at Wal-Mart, but were paid more than me. For example, Jo Jo Riggs started in 1996, but was paid significantly more than me. I know this because Mr. Riggs bragged about how much he made. Nick Engi, who started in 1995 was also paid more than me. On several occasions as late as 1999, Support Manager Mark Tinney said to me, "If you would wear lower cut shirts, you would probably get more pay." Mr. Tinney was eventually fired for sexual harassment after many years with Wal-Mart. He made these comments in front of other Managers, so I did not complain at the time because the managers knew and no one responded. I did not want to risk future retaliation.

9. In 1997, I finished school, and received my Bachelor's Degree in Communications from the University of Central Arkansas. I told my male Department Manager, Chris Harrison, Assistant Managers Evelyn Dean and John Nichols, and Store Manager Denny Ashley, that I wanted to be a manager. Mr. Harrison and Mr. Nichols told me to talk to Mr. Ashley. Ms. Dean told me that Mr. Ashley "would never go for it."

10. When I approached Store Manager Ashley and asked him if I could join the Management Training Program, he laughed at me and said he did not think that I was the type of person who would work out well in management. When I asked what, specifically, I could do to increase my chances of becoming a manager, Mr. Ashley told me that I would have to get his recommendation to enter the Management Training Program, and that would not happen. Even though I had worked at Wal-Mart almost five years and had an excellent employment record, as reflected in my many "above standard" evaluations, Mr. Ashley told me I needed more experience.

11. In 1998, I was recruited by Lowe's Home Improvement store, which is a competitor of Wal-Mart. I commented at a grass roots meeting that Wal-Mart's competitors were paying significantly more, and Store Manager Ashley, said, "The way I see it, a whore for a quarter is a whore for a quarter." I used the "Open Door" policy and spoke with Evelyn Dean, a female Assistant Manager, about this comment. Shortly thereafter Mr. Ashley called me into his office and asked me if I was going to call the Home Office. In hopes of improved treatment, and for fear of retaliation, I told him that I would not.

12. During my Wal-Mart career, I applied for promotions such as Department Manager and Support Manager at least five times. I was passed over every time. For example, in early 1999, Tony Delaney, an associate from the Lawn and Garden Department, was promoted to Support Manager, the same position for which I had applied.

13. I terminated my employment with Wal-Mart on October 15, 1999, which was the same day I was passed over for the Support Manager position. On this last occasion, a woman, Christy Gunter was promoted instead of me. Ms. Gunter was dating a Support Manager, Tony Delaney at the time of her promotion. Mr. Delaney is a male employee who had been promoted to the very same Support Manager position for which I had applied earlier in 1999. Store Manager Ashely called me at home to ask me why I quit, and to offer me a non-management position at another store. I declined.

14. I had worked at Wal-Mart for more than five years without a promotion, despite my exemplary work history. I quit because, based on my experience, I believed that I would continue to be denied opportunities for advancement in favor of male employees.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Arkansas that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 14, 2003, In the City of Little Rock, State of Arkansas.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, EDITH ARANA, DEBORAH GUNTER, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, CLEO PAGE, KAREN WILLIAMSON, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiffs vs. WAL-MART STORES, INC., Defendant	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF TAMMY HALL IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Tammy Hall, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. While employed by Wal-Mart, I have also used the names Tammy Holloway and Tammy Hill. Prior to my employment with Wal-Mart I worked briefly for a vocational school. I graduated from a vocational technical school in 1984 and received a degree in business education. I was 19 years old when I started working full-time for Wal-Mart in 1986. In June 2001, I resigned from Wal-Mart because I no longer believed that I had the management support to be given a fair opportunity to be promoted to a store manager position.

3. I began work at a Wal-Mart Store in Cullman, Alabama in 1986, setting up the store and then as a cashier making $3.35 an hour. Almost immediately I expressed an interest in advancing in my career at Wal-Mart. In the "Career Goals" section of my six-month evaluation, I wrote that I wanted to "learn more about service desk and layaway and maybe one day be a CSM." Attached hereto as Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of my Associate Evaluation Form dated June 14, 1986. In another evaluation, I wrote that I "would like a chance to become a department manager." Attached hereto as Exhibit B is a true and correct copy of this undated Associate Evaluation Form from the same Cullman, Alabama Wal-Mart (although it is undated, I believe that it covered the 1986 to 1991 time period).

4. Between 1986 and 1991, I held several hourly positions at the Cullman, Alabama Wal-Mart Store, including Courtesy Desk Associate, Customer Service Manager, Department Manager of Foods, Department Manager of Health and Beauty Aids and Cosmetics, and Personnel Manager.

5. In my experience at Wal-Mart, I have heard several comments that I felt indicated negative attitudes towards women in management. While I was personnel manager at the Cullman, Alabama store in approximately 1990 or 1991, I overheard Store Manager David Christian telling another male assistant manager that all women should be "at home with a bun in the oven" and "barefoot and pregnant."

6. Whenever I expressed an interest in advancing in my Wal-Mart career, I was always told that in order to enter into the management training program, I would be required to relocate. I was told that I would have to be willing to go wherever Wal-Mart needed me. Accordingly, as early as 1988, I expressed a willingness to relocate when I wrote that my career goals included "to travel and set up different Wal-Mart stores." Attached hereto as Exhibit C is a true and correct copy of my Associate Evaluation Form dated March 28, 1988. Despite my comments, no one raised with me the possibility of moving into a management position.

7. In 1989, I initiated discussions with Store Manager Gary Martin about moving up into management. I spoke with him during evaluations as well as privately in his office. He told me I needed experience in the Cash Office and on the floor. By the time he told me this, I already had extensive Cash Office and floor experience. In my 1989 evaluation, I re-emphasized my interest by writing that my career goals were "[t]o go as far in the company as I can." Attached hereto as Exhibit D is a true and correct copy of my Associate Evaluation Form dated September 26, 1989.

8. Three years later, in 1992, I still had not been promoted. I spoke with District Manager Bob Sandlin about my interest in management training. He told me that willingness to relocate was a requirement for the management training program. I agreed to relocate. In my 1992 evaluation, I wrote that my career goals included becoming an "Assistant Manager for Wal-Mart." Attached hereto as Exhibit E is a true and correct copy of my Associate Evaluation Form dated March 24, 1992. I also continued to speak with Store Manager Martin about my interest in becoming a management trainee. He remained noncommittal and did not give me any specific information about ways in which I could improve my chances of promotion.

9. In October 1992, Mr. Sandlin told me I could enter the management training program if I relocated to a Wal-Mart Store in Boaz, Alabama. I agreed to relocate to this store and accepted a longer commute because I understood this was the only way I could advance into management.

10. In 1993, after I completed the training program, Personnel Trainer Coleman Taylor offered me an Assistant Manager position in a Wal-Mart Store in Birmingham, Alabama. This was considered a difficult store to manage because it was located in a high-crime area but I understood that I had no choice but to accept the position to which I was assigned. If I did not, I understood that I would not be offered a second chance. I relocated to Birmingham.

11. As early as 1993, I began expressing an interest in advancing into a store manager position. In my 1993 annual evaluation, I wrote that my career goals included "work[ing] toward becoming a store manager." Attached hereto as Exhibit F is a true and correct copy of my Management Performance Appraisal and Commitment to Success dated September 25, 1993.

12. In approximately 1993, when I was an assistant manager in Birmingham, Alabama, I was present during a conversation between Store Manager Dennis Hathaway and an individual [name unknown] out of the Bentonville, Arkansas home office about an Assistant Manager Larry [last name unknown] who had used the open door. I heard Mr. Hathaway laughing about this assistant manager contacting home office and Mr. Hathaway said he would "get [this assistant manager] reigned in." This incident made clear to me that the Open Door Policy was not an option available to me, and, in fact, might make me the subject of ridicule and retaliation.

13. In 1994, I re-emphasized my career aspirations by writing that I wanted "[t]o gain all the knowledge and skills of running the store to help me to further my career in Wal Mart." I also wrote about my specific aspirations "to become a Store Manager. Maybe someday in the near future work in Operations or the People division at home office." In this evaluation, Store Manager Karen Brandenburg wrote, "I would like to see her be one of our future store managers." Attached hereto as Exhibit G is a true and correct copy of my Management Performance Appraisal and Commitment to Success dated February 17, 1994.

14. In 1994, I voluntarily transferred to an assistant manager position in a Wal-Mart in Anchorage, Alaska. Wal-Mart was opening new stores in Alaska and I believed that being involved with this challenge would assist in my efforts to get promoted to a store manager position. This was a lateral move. By moving to Alaska, my husband and I left behind everything that was familiar to us, including close family, friends, and community.

15. While in Alaska, I continued to express an interest in becoming a store manager, as well as in participating in training that may have assisted me in gaining skills to advance in my career. In my 1995 evaluation, I wrote that my "[o]nward goal is to be a store manager—would like to be able to complete leadership classes—MDS classes." Attached hereto as Exhibit H is a true and correct copy of my Store Manager/Assistant Manager Performance Appraisal dated March 1, 1995. In June 1995, two and a half years after becoming an assistant manager, I was finally allowed to take a leadership class in Bentonville, Arkansas that all assistant managers are supposed to complete within six months of becoming an assistant manager. I had spoken to both Store Manager Brandenburg and Store Manager Mark Divis about why I had not been able to take the class but they were unable to explain the delay. While in Anchorage, I also spoke with Store Manager Divis during my evaluations and informally about my interest in moving up in management.

16. Some time between 1995 and 1996, while I was working in the Anchorage, Alaska Wal-Mart, male Assistant Manager Randy Hardy told me, and a room full of other associates, that the only reason that Wal-Mart needed female assistant managers was to ensure that women associates had someone with whom they could discuss their periods. At first, I was taken aback by these comments but I continued to believe that, with hard work, I could prove that I could take on the challenges of a management position. I did not think that complaining about these incidents would do any good because it had already been made clear to me that the Open Door Policy was not something upon which I could rely.

17. In 1997, while working as an overnight assistant manager in the Anchorage store, Store Manager Divis asked me to become operational assistant manager during the day. This meant additional responsibilities over the offices and training. Even though I would be losing the 6% night differential and I would be taking on extra responsibilities, I believed this would be good for my career advancement, so I accepted.

18. While in the Anchorage Wal-Mart, there were several men who were hired from the outside as assistant managers who were paid significantly more than I was but whom I had to train. They were John Halpaus, who was recruited from a Safeway grocery store and whom I trained in 1994, and a male assistant manager [name unknown] who was recruited from a Payless drug store and whom I trained in approximately 1998 or 1999.

19. In my 1997 evaluation, I wrote in the "Associate Comments" section that I wanted "[t]o go to the next level in management." Attached hereto as Exhibit I is a true and correct copy of my Store Manager/Assistant Manager Performance Appraisal dated March 28, 1997.

20. Shortly thereafter, still in 1997, District Manager Mark Divis (he had been promoted from Store Manager) asked me to transfer as an assistant manager to the Wasilla, Alaska Wal-Mart Store. Although I was not interested in the transfer or the longer commute, I agreed to this lateral move because Mr. Divis told me it would be a good challenge and would help my Wal-Mart career.

21. In 1998, Mr. Divis asked me to transfer back to an assistant manager in his Anchorage, Alaska, Wal-Mart. Again, I agreed. While there, I continued to speak with District Manager Divis and later, Store Manager Coleman Taylor (he had been promoted from Personnel Trainer) about my interest in moving up in my Wal-Mart career. This same year, a co-manager position was created in the Wasilla, Alaska Wal-Mart for Assistant Manager James Barnes. He told me that he had been transferred from a Hawaii Wal-Mart because he had "people problems." I was not aware of this opening and was not given an opportunity to apply for it. Within a year, Mr. Barnes was transferred and demoted for what I understood to be the same issues as had arisen in Hawaii.

22. Also, in 1998, I wrote a letter to Stacy [last name unknown], the Regional Personnel Manager over Alaska, Hawaii, and Washington, regarding my career history and career goals with Wal-Mart. Once again, I was very clear about my aspirations to become a store manager and reiterated my willingness to move anywhere to do so. I wrote, "My goal is to become a store manager for this company. I would prefer to remain in Alaska, but [am] willing to relocate elsewhere. This is my next challenge, a challenge [for] which I feel I am ready. To strive to run the store on the beliefs that was founded and instilled in me by Sam Walton . . . I would like to be given the opportunity to run a store like this for the company." Attached hereto as Exhibit J is a true and correct copy of this undated letter written and signed by me.

23. In July 1999, seven years after I had become an assistant manager, District Manager Harvey agreed to promote me to a co-manager position in the Anchorage, Alaska Wal-Mart. Mr. Harvey assured me that that this was only a training position and would last a maximum of 18 months before I would be promoted to store manager. I know of at least three men who were promoted faster than I was. Both Todd Childers and John Halpaus were assistant managers for less time before they were promoted to co-manager positions in an Anchorage Wal-Mart. James Lane was promoted to a store manager position in Ketchikan, Alaska after only a few years as an assistant manager. He was never a co-manager. Randy Hardy was promoted to a co-manager position after a similar amount of time in an assistant manager position but, throughout his time as an assistant manager in both Anchorage Wal-Marts, it was well known that he was violating the fraternization policy by dating an hourly associate whom he supervised. He was a good fishing and hunting buddy of District Manager Harvey and regularly talked about their hunting and fishing trips.

24. I became co-manager upon returning from maternity leave in 1999 after the birth of my son. As a co-manager, I regularly worked 65-70 hours a week. During inventory, it was not unusual for me to work fourteen 12-hour days in a row. While I was an assistant manager, I regularly worked 55-60 hours a week. I invested these long hours at the sacrifice of time spent with my husband and infant son, because I believed that my hard work and dedication would ensure a successful future with Wal-Mart and stability for my family.

25. During my February 2000 evaluation, I received a rating of "exceeds expectations." Despite this excellent rating, I did not receive the usual annual pay increase. I had always been told that Wal-Mart policy forbids discussing salary issues so I was unable to determine the exact reason why I was not given a raise. I assumed that I had reached the maximum I could earn as a co-manager. The following year, I also did not receive a pay increase. In May 2001, I discovered that I, in fact, had not topped out and there was no reason why I had been denied a raise in both 2000 and 2001. I spoke with Regional Vice President Ron Medrano and he agreed to give me a raise retroactive for three months (to my February 2001 evaluation) but not to my February 2000 evaluation. When I asked why I had not received the proper pay increases, Mr. Medrano claimed he was not aware that I was supposed to receive a raise to begin with.

26. In October 2000, I applied for the store manager position in Ketchikan, Alaska. District Manager Harvey asked me to write a detailed letter about the salary that I would need to live on the island. Store Manager Taylor and I worked on the letter together and I submitted it to Mr. Harvey. I never heard anything about the position again except that a male, James Lane, got the position.

27. In 2001, I became acting store manager of the Anchorage, Alaska Wal-Mart because Store Manager Coleman Taylor left. At that time, I had been co-manager for two years. Since I was already completing the responsibilities of the store manager, I asked District Manager Harvey for the store manager title and pay. He told me that it was against company policy to be promoted from within the same store. When I informed him that previous store manager, Coleman Taylor, had been co-manager in the same store, Mr. Harvey did not respond.

28. Shortly after I became acting store manager of the Anchorage Wal-Mart, the store experienced a high shrinkage during inventory. High shrink is when the cost of inventory is higher than the amount that has been set by corporate headquarters for that store. Because I had only been acting store manager for a couple of weeks, I was reassured by the auditors at home office in Bentonville, Arkansas, that this high shrinkage was not my responsibility and would be attributed to Store Manager Taylor.

29. In February 2001, I was approached by District Manager Harvey about applying for the position of district manager of shoes and jewelry in Alaska. At this time, I was frustrated by the lack of management support toward my many efforts to advance in store management positions. I was beginning to believe that I would never be allowed the chance to run a store. When the opportunity arose for me to try a new position, any new position, that would challenge me and help me to prove my capabilities, I seized it. I was not going to receive a raise for this new position and would be receiving the same base pay I had been receiving as a co-manager. After my interview with Regional Manager of Shoes and Jewelry Art Bock in March 2001, he offered me the position and I signed a written contract committing to a two years in the position. Attached hereto as Exhibit K is a true and correct copy of this written contract signed by me on April 3, 2001. As I was preparing for the position, including opening a corporate bank account and receiving a corporate credit card, I was called by Regional Vice President Ron Madreno. He told me that, in order to accommodate the new male Anchorage store manager, Jim Groh, they had offered the district manager of shoes and jewelry position to his wife, Peggy. I told Mr. Madreno that this created a conflict of interest and is against company policy. As District Manager of Shoes and Jewelry, Mrs. Groh would have the ability to influence the inventory and bottom line profits in the Wal-Mart Store that Mr. Groh managed. He ignored me. When I told Mr. Madreno of the contract I had signed and the plans I had been making with home office, he told me that the contract "ain't worth two cents." He said that District Manager Harvey was supposed to have already informed me that the position had been given to the incoming store manager's wife. He then told me he was not giving me the position due to high shrink in the Anchorage Wal-Mart Store. When I reminded him that I had been told that this shrinkage was not my responsibility, he was again unresponsive. Even if I had been responsible for the shrink, which I was not, it should not have interfered with my promotability. I know that when Coleman Taylor was promoted from a co-manager to store manager position in 1996, the store had recently experienced a high shrink. This did not interfere with Mr. Taylor's promotion. Similarly, in 1997, David Shepherd was promoted from co-manager in the Anchorage Wal-Mart to store manager of the Wasilla, Alaska Wal-Mart shortly after the Anchorage store experienced high shrink.

30. I also spoke with District Manager Harvey about my concerns about the district manager of shoes and jewelry position being taken from me. He claimed he was "shocked" and that I had been treated unfairly. I found this somewhat disingenuous, since Mr. Madreno told me Mr. Harvey already knew about the decision and was, in fact, originally slated to tell me about it. I also explained to him that having a husband and wife in these positions was contrary to company policy but he did not seem concerned.

31. When I became a co-manager in 1999, District Manager Harvey had assured me that I would be in this training position for a maximum of 18 months but when I left, I had been co-manager for two and a half years with no end in sight. I know that David Shephard was co-manager of the Anchorage Wal-Mart for only about six months before he was promoted to store manager of the Wasilla Wal-Mart.

32. Throughout my time as an assistant manager, co-manager, and acting store manager, from 1992 to 2001, I never received any coachings. All but three of my evaluations were rated "Above Average" or "Exceeds Expectations." For those few evaluations that were rated "Meets Expectations," I had been told that, although my performance may have exceeded expectations, my evaluation score had been rated exclusively on store inventory, shrink, and stock numbers. During these evaluations, I complained to District Manager David Carmon, District Manager Harvey, Store Manager Divis and Store Manager Taylor that I believed these evaluations were unfair. I told them that a management performance evaluation should rate the manager's performance, not the store's numbers. At one point, District Manager Carmon agreed to complete another evaluation of my performance in six months, rather than a year, so that I could get an evaluation on my actual performance. This never happened.

33. During my Exit Interview, I articulated that I was leaving due to a lack of promotional opportunities. Attached hereto as Exhibit L is a true and correct copy of my Exit Interview dated June 15, 2001.

34. Shortly after I left Wal-Mart in June 2001, I wrote a letter to Wal-Mart CEO Lee Scott chronicling the mistreatment that I had suffered and the problems that I believe Wal-Mart has in retaining good management. Attached hereto as Exhibit M is a true and correct copy of this letter. A few weeks later, Divisional Vice Pres. Kendall Schwindt called me. Despite being in charge of determining who would be placed in district manager positions, he claimed he had no idea that I had been offered the district manager of shoes and jewelry position. He stated that he had had plans to "eventually" promote me to a store manager position. There were no positions available at that time or in the foreseeable future. I asked him why, if I was qualified to run the Anchorage Wal-Mart as acting store manager, was I not qualified to be the store manager and receive the fair compensation and bonuses attached to the title. Mr. Schwindt told me that it was not policy to promote a co-manager to store manager of the same store. When I reminded him that the previous Anchorage Wal-Mart store manager Coleman Taylor had been promoted from co-manager of the same store, he said something vague about "exceptions being made." I could hear that Mr. Schwindt had placed me on speakerphone and I was uncomfortable about who else might be present so I ended the conversation shortly after that. Mr. Schwindt never offered me a store manager position nor even encouraged me to return to my co-manager position.

35. I started working with Wal-Mart when I was 19 years old and spent almost half my life working there. With all the time I had invested, it was the only career I thought I wanted and the only career I thought I would ever have. When I left, I felt like I had to begin my life over again. I am currently employed full-time with Alaska USA Federal Credit Union as an Operations Officer and I remain hopeful that I will be allowed the opportunity to develop my career there.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Alaska that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on March 24th, 2003, at Anchorage, Alaska.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, EDITH ARANA, DEBORAH GUNTER, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, CLEO PAGE, KAREN WILLIAMSON, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiffs, v. WAL-MART STORES, INC. Defendant.	CASE NO. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF RENE HARKINS IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Rene Harkins, declare:

1. I am a 39 year old female living in Old Fort, North Carolina. I worked at Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.'s Sam's Club store in Asheville, North Carolina from June 20, 1998 until June 1, 2002, when I resigned from my job. I have been subjected to gender discrimination by Wal-Mart with regard to promotions. I have also experienced differential treatment from Wal-Mart because of my involvement in this lawsuit.

2. I joined Sam's Club initially as an Associate Cake Decorator in the Bakery Department at a starting wage of $7.50 per hour. After working as a Cake Decorator for approximately one year, I applied for a position as, and was hired for, a Team Leader position in the Bakery Department in approximately June, 1999.

3. In February or March, 2000, I met with David Prince, the Fresh Merchandise Manager, and told him that I was very interested in becoming the Bakery Manager. Mr. Prince responded that I would have to prove myself to get the position. I also told Larry Miller, the Regional Manager, and Elliot Neilan, the Store Manager, of my interest in the Bakery Manager position. Mr. Miller and Mr. Neilan ignored my requests.

4. After working as a Bakery Team Leader for approximately one year, Sam's Club transferred the Bakery Manager to another store. Because there was a vacancy in the Bakery Manager position, Sam's Club assigned me to perform the Bakery Manager's duties as well as the Bakery Team Leader duties in the summer of 2000. Sam's Club did not formally promote me into the Bakery Manager position or even give me a merit raise for the extra work that was required of me. I still only made my hourly wage, which at that point in 2000 was approximately $9.00 per hour.

5. I worked two jobs as the Bakery Team Leader and filling in for the Bakery Manager job without any training for approximately six months. Finally, in the early part of 2001, Tangela Griffin, the Merchandise Manager, trained me for the Bakery Manager position for approximately seven months. Ms. Griffin told me that I would officially become the Bakery Manager and join the salaried management team at Sam's Club. During the seven months that Ms. Griffin trained me for the Bakery Manager position, she repeatedly told me that I was doing a great job and that I would become the Bakery Manager once I had completed the training.

6. To my great surprise, however, in approximately December, 2001 or January, 2002, Sam's Club decided to promote Randy Peek, a male employee who had been working as a Produce Team Leader, into the Bakery Manager position. Mr. Peek had no experience in the Bakery Department and certainly had no experience in bakery management.

7. David Prince, the Fresh Merchandise Manager, and Larry Miller, the Regional Manager, made the decision to promote Mr. Peek over me to the Bakery Manager's job. These men never interviewed me for the Bakery Manager's job, even though they were aware that I was being trained for the position in question and was doing a good job. I consistently received performance reviews and evaluations that were rated four or higher on a one-to-five scale, with five being the highest rating.

8. For about 10 weeks following Mr. Peek's promotion, I was tasked with the humiliating job of training him into the Bakery Manager's position – the job I had been told was going to be mine. I feel that I was not given a fair chance to be promoted to the Bakery Manager job and that Mr. Peek received the job simply because he was a man.

9. I have also been subjected to differential treatment by Sam's Club as a result of my involvement in this lawsuit. In approximately March or April, 2002, I sustained a fracture to my foot that was unrelated to my job, and my doctor placed a walking boot cast on my foot. My doctor gave me a medical release to return to work, but when I showed up for work after receiving medical treatment, Ms. Griffin, the Merchandise Manager, refused to allow me to work until my cast was taken off. Sam's Club treated my foot injury differently than they treated other people's similar injuries – including Donna Justice, a female Receiving Manager, who was allowed to work while using crutches – and a similar injury that I previously sustained. I believe that Sam's Club mis-applied their policies in an effort to further discriminate against me. Moreover, Sam's Club also completely failed to process my disability paperwork for my 2002 foot injury. In fact, to this day I have not received any disability payments for the time Sam's Club refused to allow me to work.

10. I resigned from Sam's Club on June 1, 2002. I had lost hope that I would ever be promoted into a salaried management job at Sam's Club when I saw the company decide to promote Mr. Peek to the Bakery Manager job around me. Since that time, Sam's Club made it clear to me that I was not wanted as an employee and used differential treatment to make my work environment unpleasant.

11. Sam's Club continued to retaliate against me even after I had resigned. Sam's Club repeatedly failed to provide information to my new employer concerning my dates of employment, which resulted in a delay in the commencement of my work at my new job. It was not until I complained to Kevin James, a Wal-Mart Vice-President, that Sam's Club provided this information to my new employer.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of North Carolina that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 1, 2003, at Old Fort, North Carolina.

I, Cecilia Harrison, declare:

1. I am a 41 year old African-American female who lives in Tooele, Utah. I began working for Wal-Mart at the Home Office in 1992. I entered the Management Training Program in 1997 and became an Assistant Manager. Becoming Store Manager of my own Wal-Mart store was my goal at Wal-Mart. I applied for over ten Co-Manager positions, the step between Assistant Manager and Store Manager, but Wal-Mart never promoted me. After four years of observing Wal-Mart promote male Assistant Managers to Co-Managers and observing Wal-Mart recruit males from outside the company for Co-Manager positions, I felt that because I was the wrong gender, Wal-Mart was not going to give me the opportunity to advance past my Assistant Manager position. In 2000, I terminated my employment with Wal-Mart due to the lack of career advancement opportunities for me, as a female.

2. Before I began my employment at Wal-Mart I had over 10 years of experience in the import merchandise field. In 1992, my husband and I relocated to Rogers, Arkansas. I applied for a position at the Wal-Mart home office in Bentonville, Arkansas. I was hired in the import section of the international merchandising department.

3. My first job was in a clerical position. Within a month, Wal-Mart promoted me to an Import Analyst/Customs Coordinator position. In this position I was responsible for reviewing Wal-Mart's importation quotes from its broker and finding any discrepancies or errors within the broker's U.S. Custom's filings.

4. Within six months of beginning my Wal-Mart employment, I recovered for Wal-Mart a large sum in overpaid import taxes. I was rewarded with the "Yes We Can Sam" award and I was soon chosen to work with Wal-Mart executives on Wal-Mart's Foreign Trade Zone logistics team, which entailed that I travel with executives to Buckeye, Arizona and help develop the Foreign Trade Zone's warehouse. I was a member of this team during 1993 and 1994.

5. I received my first annual performance evaluation in September 1993 and was rated as "exceeds expectations." I communicated my career goals with Wal-Mart on the evaluation. I wrote: "Goals: . . . work towards a management position with in Wal-Mart." See Cecilia Harrison's September 1993 Performance Evaluation, a true and correct copy attached hereto as Exhibit A.

6. While at the Home Office I decided to grasp as much knowledge as I could about as many facets of the company as possible, so that I would be attractive to Wal-Mart for a salaried management position. I requested and received a transfer to a Merchandise Assistant position in 1994. In that position, I learned Wal-Mart's company-wide merchandising practices and policies and I assisted Clifford Young, buyer for Department 82, impulse merchandising. I worked on merchandise projects that trickled down to every Wal-Mart store. For example, I fully developed and designed Wal-Mart's Balloon Program, creating the standards for balloon display and sales procedure implemented in all Wal-Mart stores.

7. In 1995 I moved into a Modular Planner position to learn another aspect of Wal-Mart operations. I became Modular Planner for department 82, impulse merchandise. A modular is a store product display area. The smallest detail of each product's layout at each Wal-Mart store is designed and controlled by Modular Planners at the Home Office. As Modular Planner for department 82, I controlled the merchandise layouts for food, checkouts, clip strips, and the tobacco products for the entire chain of Wal-Mart stores.

8. While I was an employee at the Home Office I saw that the Home Office controls every aspect of a store. Guidelines are created in the Home Office, including the guidelines governing merchandise selection and displays, as well as personnel policies.

9. In 1997, after I had been with Wal-Mart almost five years, my husband reported to Georgia for army training. I approached J.R. Campbell, who was the Senior Vice-President over my department, and expressed interest in transferring to a Wal-Mart store. I told Mr. Campbell that I did not want to give up my employment with Wal-Mart and that I wanted to become a member of salaried management on the store level. Mr. Campbell provided me a written recommendation supporting my entry into the Management Training Program.

10. I was accepted into an accelerated Management Training Program at the Martinez, Georgia Wal-Mart store. When I completed the program, I received an "above average" rating on my training program evaluation. While in the Management Training Program, I let Store Manager John Vail and Co-Manager Tom White know that I wanted to work my way into a Co-Manager position and then eventually manage my own store.

11. About the time I finished the Management Training Program my husband was stationed in California. Therefore, I asked to be transferred to an Assistant Manager position in California. I transferred to the Wal-Mart store in Paso Robles, California in September 1997.

12. I informed Paso Robles Store Manager Nick Sigala and District Manager Ron Smoot that I was interested in being promoted in January 1998, during my first annual evaluation as an Assistant Manager. I wrote on my evaluation that I wanted to take the next step, to Co-Manager. See Cecilia Harrison's January 1998 performance evaluation, a true and correct copy hereto attached as Exhibit B.

13. Nick Sigala remained the Store Manager at the Paso Robles store for approximately my first year as Assistant Manager there. During that time Nick Sigala treated female Assistant Managers differently than male Assistant Managers. If a problem occurred at the store he yelled at the female Assistant Managers, which included Lissa Remington, Sherrie Logan and me. However, he never yelled at the male Assistant Managers, Greg French and Kenny Johnson. Mr. Sigala ranted and raved at the females on a daily basis, unless he was asking us to do extra work for him, such as preparing his presentations for district meetings. I never observed him treating the male Assistant Managers rudely. He chose the male Assistant Managers to be his buddies. He golfed with them. He even tried to get Mr. French and Mr. Johnson a transfer to his new store, when he transferred. Store Manager Sigala did not befriend any female Assistant Managers.

14. After two years as Assistant Manager in the Paso Robles store, I transferred to a Wal-Mart in Orem, Utah, because my husband was hired by a company in Utah.

15. Once my family was in Utah, my husband and I had a discussion about my future at Wal-Mart. We talked about how I wanted to become a Wal-Mart Co-Manager and then a Store Manager. My husband had been honorably discharged from the army, so the army no longer dictated our residence. My husband and I agreed that from that point on, where our family lived would be dictated by my career with Wal-Mart. We knew that many promotions were out of state and we were willing to move anywhere.

16. I started working at the Orem Wal-Mart store in March 1999. I was assigned to be Assistant Manager of soft lines and front end. Within six months I was promoted to the Lead Assistant Manager of the store. As Lead Assistant Manager I was charged with the additional responsibility of creating the Assistant Manager schedules and running Store Manager and Co-Manager reports when those managers were busy or unavailable.

17. My Store Manager, John Reynolds, also chose me to be the Orem Wal-Mart's closing Assistant Manager. This means that I was the regularly scheduled Assistant Manager on the 2 p.m. to closing shift. Within six months I made such an impact on the Orem's store operations and the employees' morale, including dramatically improving the store's readiness for the morning crew, that the District Manager, Jim Curtis, requested that I give a presentation to all Utah Store Managers.

18. Throughout my employment in the Orem store, I let District Manager Jim Curtis and Store Manager John Reynolds know I was always looking for the next step in my career, to become a Co-Manager.

19. John Reynolds completed my first evaluation in the Orem Wal-Mart in February of 2000. He rated me as "exceeds expectations." Jim Curtis was present during this evaluation. As I had done consistently during my year at the Orem store, I discussed with Mr. Curtis and Mr. Reynolds my desire to be promoted. I also wrote in the personal goals sections of the evaluation that I wanted to become a Specialty Division Manager or Division 1 Co-Manager. See Cecilia Harrison's February 10, 2000 Management Performance Appraisal, a true and correct copy hereto attached as Exhibit C.

20. I applied for numerous Co-Manager positions while I was in the Orem Wal-Mart. Each position was posted over the Pipeline, Wal-Mart's computerized communication network. Each position listed specific requirements . . . e.g. the store was seeking a Co-Manager with X amount of years as Assistant Manager and X or above on the applicant's last performance evaluation. After applying for a position over the Pipeline, the applicant's District Manager, in my case, Jim Curtis, had to recommend that individual in order to be considered for the Co-Manager position.

21. I read the requirements for each position for which I applied. I always made sure I had the requisite evaluation rating and experience before I applied for the position. In fact, the computer system would not let you proceed if your responses to the application questions indicated you did not meet the posted requirements. Out of the numerous positions for which I applied, I recall that one was in North Carolina, one was in Michigan and one was in Massachusetts. None of the stores I applied at ever responded to my application. Jim Curtis did not recommend me for the Massachusetts position and I am unaware of any positions for which Mr. Curtis did recommend me.

22. I feel that Jim Curtis did not recommend for a Co-Manager position because I am female. Jim Curtis promoted several males out of the Assistant Manager position into Co-Manager positions or provided them the needed recommendation to receive the promotions outside the district. For example, he promoted Assistant Managers Ted Jones and Jeffrey Robbins from the Riverdale store, Mark Pierson from the Layton store and Pat Keen and Craig Williams from my store in Orem.

23. District Manager Jim Curtis also hired males with no prior Wal-Mart history from outside the company straight into Co-Manager positions. I never saw him hire a female into a Co-Manager position who was from outside the company. I also never saw him promote a female Assistant Manager during my employment at Wal-Mart.

24. After two years at the Orem Wal-Mart, approximately in the spring of 2001, I was suddenly, and without notice, transferred to the Taylorsville store. The transfer occurred while I was having surgery on emergency sick leave. I never knew of any male Assistant Managers who were transferred without discussion and without prior notice. I asked John Reynolds why I was transferred to the Taylorsville store. He said he did not know and that he was not given prior notice either.

25. Shortly after I was transferred to the Taylorville store, Jim Curtis' district was restructured. Leonard Falcon became my District Manager.

26. Within about four months of my transfer to the Taylorsville store, I had my first meeting with District Manager Leonard Falcon. I told Mr. Falcon that I was seeking a promotion to Co-Manager. I had recently received another "above-standard" rating, I had a visibly good impact on the Taylorsville store and I was now Lead Closing Assistant Manager in my second store in Utah. Leonard Falcon told me "Well, I just came to the district, I really don't know you, so it will take some time before I could promote you to Co-Manager."

27. At first I tried not to be discouraged by Mr. Falcon's alleged desire to get to know me before he promoted me. I continued to apply for Co-Manager positions for my final months at Wal-Mart. I applied for at least six positions when I was in the Taylorville store. Even though I met the qualifications for the position, I was never contacted or interviewed for any of the Co-Manager positions.

28. I did not understand why I was not receiving job offers or even interview opportunities when I had earned the Lead Assistant Manager position in both of my Utah stores. I felt my career advancement was stifled by Mr. Falcon and was previously stifled by Jim Curtis. I was nothing less than mortified when I saw the constant stream of males receiving promotions instead of me.

29. I am familiar with Wal-Mart's Store Manager and Co-Manager bonus program. Co-Manager's receive profit bonuses which are a percentage of the Store Manager's Store Profit Bonus. The higher the profit, the higher the bonus that Co-Manager receives. The Co-Manager's bonus is typically more that $10,000. While I was at Wal-Mart, Assistant Managers received bonuses on the same scale as hourly associates. The highest bonus an Assistant Manager could receive was double the share of an hourly associate, if that Assistant Manager had an above standard evaluation. I was rated "above standard" and in my case I never received more than a $1,500 bonus from Wal-Mart as an Assistant Manager.

30. By the summer of 2000 I was frustrated at being denied Co-Manager positions and frustrated from watching males from outside the company, as well as male Assistant Managers who had never been recognized for benefiting Wal-Mart as I had, placed in these positions. I had never received any coachings while at Wal-Mart and my performance rating, "exceeds expectations," qualified me for promotions to Co-Manager positions. I decided to terminate my employment.

31. I lined up new employment at Cargo Link International, a customs import company, before I terminated my employment at Wal-Mart so that I would not have a break in employment. I was hired as a part-time employee at Cargo Link International and began working there a couple weeks before my last day at Wal-Mart. Within a month of ending my employment at Wal-Mart, I was working fulltime at Cargo Link International and running my own nail design business on the side.

32. If I could be confident that Wal-Mart would judge me on my merit and not by my gender, I would be willing to return to Wal-Mart as a Co-Manager. I have expressed this to Mr. Falcon and Mr. Curtis since leaving my employment at Wal-Mart.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Utah that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on 1st of April, 2003, at Salt Lake City, UT.

I, Teresa Hawkins, declare:

1. I am female and a former employee of Wal-Mart. I reside in Nevada.

2. I worked as an Assistant Manager Trainee and Assistant Manager at a Wal-Mart store in Las Vegas, Nevada, from January 13, 2001, to September 19, 2001. During my employment at Wal-Mart, I learned that several men working the same job as me, at the same store where I worked, were paid more than I was paid. Also, I was passed over for promotion from Assistant Manager to the salaried position of People Manager in favor of a male employee with less experience in human resource matters.

3. Prior to working at Wal-Mart, I had about seven years of management experience working for two different national home improvement retailers in Nevada and in California. In 2001, my mother had major surgery and I had to leave my job as an Assistant Manager at Lowe's Home Improvement Warehouse in Bakersfield, California, and return to Las Vegas. Upon my return to Las Vegas, I sought a position in management with Wal-Mart.

4. To apply at Wal-Mart, I faxed a cover letter and my resume to Regional Personnel Manager Debbie Moody at the Wal-Mart Home Office in Bentonville, Arkansas. (True and correct copy attached hereto as Hawkins Exhibit A.) Ms. Moody interviewed me in Las Vegas for a position as a Management Trainee. During the interview, Ms. Moody told me that Wal-Mart would soon be adding salaried People Managers to its Supercenters and other high-volume stores. Ms. Moody told me the position was a salaried position for large stores with a lot of employees and/or for stores with "employee morale" problems. I told Ms. Moody that I would be interested in a People Manager position, especially given my previous experience in human resources.

5. I then had a second interview, with District Manager Chuck Salby. Mr. Salby asked me where I saw myself in four years, and I told him I saw myself in a People Manager position. Shortly thereafter, I was offered a position as a Management Trainee, which I accepted.

6. When I started management training, Brenda Belmonte, District Manager Salby's assistant, told me that all Assistant Manager Trainees at the same store earn the same salary. However, I saw payroll records as part of my training in the Personnel Office, and learned that four male management trainees at my store earned substantially higher salaries than I did. Kenneth Narter, Karl Moser, Vincent Santos, and Ronald Tedesko each earned a monthly base salary of about $2,200, compared to my $1,900 monthly salary. Mr. Narter, Mr. Moser, and Mr. Santos all started management training after I did. Mr. Tedesko started management training less than a month before I did.

7. I used the Open Door to complain about my lower rate of pay to Co-Manager James Eble and to Store Manager Bob Knickerbocker, but I never received a satisfactory response. I do not know any legitimate explanation for the difference in our salaries.

8. While I was a Management Trainee, I observed that the male trainees, including Bill Mikesell, Mr. Moser, and Mr. Santos, received more thorough training than I did. Specifically, I was frequently assigned to work in the Personnel Office or with the Cashiers during my training period. However, I observed male Assistant Managers in training sessions with various Assistant Managers or working through their Assistant Manager training manuals. The male Management Trainees received more training in the merchandising aspects of managing a store, which are essential skills for a Store Manager. I, however, received more limited training. I was also given an Assistant Manager training manual, which had spaces for the Store Manager to initial and indicate my progress. However, Mr. Knickerbocker never initialed my training manual. I observed that the training manuals of the men mentioned above were initialed by Store Manager Knickerbocker. I made several appointments with Mr. Knickerbocker to review my training manual, but he never kept an appointment with me to discuss my training.

9. While I was a Management Trainee, I told Store Manager Knickerbocker that I was interested in the People Manager position, which I had originally learned about from Ms. Moody. I told him that my career goal was to move into a human resources management position, and I described to him my previous experience in human resources. Mr. Knickerbocker told me he would discuss the promotion with District Manager Salby. Soon thereafter, I saw Mr. Salby at a meeting and asked him whether Mr. Knickerbocker had conveyed to him my interest in and qualifications for the People Manager position. Mr. Salby told me to schedule a meeting with Mr. Knickerbocker to review in detail my qualifications for the People Manager position, even though Mr. Salby already had my resume, which listed my previous experience in detail. See Hawkins Exhibit A. Mr. Knickerbocker never responded to my requests to schedule such a meeting. During the same period of time, I searched but could not find a written description of the job on Wal-Mart's internal computer system. I also never saw any open People Manager positions posted in the store or on the computer.

10. I was promoted to Night Receiving Manager on about May 5, 2001. Store Manager Knickerbocker told me I was being assigned to the overnight shift because I had extensive experience in human resources and because that shift had "morale problems." I reminded Mr. Knickerbocker of my interest in the position of People Manager, and he told me I had to spend at least six months as a Night Receiving Manager before I could be considered for a People Manager position. I agreed, reluctantly, although I could not see the connection between the responsibilities of a Night Receiving Manager and a People Manager.

11. While I worked as Night Receiving Manager, night shift employees asked me several times to tell Store Manager Knickerbocker that they wanted to use the Open Door policy to speak with him regarding concerns with their working conditions. The Open Door policy states that employees can make complaints to any manager with the knowledge that they will be listened to and that they will not be retaliated against. When I talked to Mr. Knickerbocker on their behalf, on one occasion he told me to tell them he was "too busy." On another occasion, Mr. Knickerbocker told me he was only willing to talk to the employees as a group. I also informed Mr. Knickerbocker after a female employee, Trina Durham, told me that other employees were sexually harassing her. Mr. Knickerbocker told me that he was not going to investigate her complaint.

12. I personally complained to Mr. Knickerbocker while I was Night Receiving Manager because a male stocker named Mo (last name unknown) had continued to sexually harass me despite having been verbally coached by management for harassing me. Mo wrote me sexually explicit notes, followed me around the store, commented on my mode of dress, and waited for me in the parking lot after my shift. Mr. Knickerbocker told me that he would not investigate my complaint and that I should "sit down with him" myself. I also observed that Mr. Knickerbocker refused to investigate when several female Cashiers complained of sexual harassment by Mo.

13. In late May or early June 2001, District Manager Salby announced at an Assistant Managers' meeting that he had selected Assistant Manager Dennis Talley for promotion to a new People Manager position at our store. The People Manager position was not posted, nor was I informed that the position was available. I was astonished that, even though three different managers knew of my interest and qualifications, I was not even given the chance to interview for the People Manager position.

14. The hourly Personnel Manager at our store, Marilyn Wall, later told me that Mr. Talley had no personnel experience. He had previously only worked as a Wal-Mart merchandising manager, whereas I had experience as a human resources manager from my prior employment. I also learned that Mr. Talley never worked six months as Night Receiving Manager, which I had been told was required.

15. I was terminated in September 2001 while on an approved medical leave of absence. I used the Open Door to complain in writing about my termination to District Manager Salby and to Michael Walker in the Bentonville Home Office. I never received a response as to why I had been terminated, which is a violation of the company's Sundown Rule. The Sundown Rule requires managers to respond the same day to any complaint by an employee or customer.

16. I filed a charge of discrimination against Wal-Mart with the State of Nevada Equal Rights Commission in February 2002, charging retaliation and discrimination based on gender and disability. I was later forced to drop the charge because I was in the hospital with a serious illness when the statute of limitations passed.

17. I would consider returning to a management position at Wal-Mart, if I could be sure that my salary would be equal to that of male employees with similar experience working the same job and that my career opportunities would not be limited by gender-based stereotypes.

18. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Nevada that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on 04/13/03 (month and day), 2003, at Las Vegas, NV (city and state).

I, Tina Herndon, declare,

1. I make this declaration on the basis of my personal knowledge and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts in it.

2. I began working at Sam's Club in 1988 as an assistant manager when Sam's Club bought out Price Savers where I had worked as an assistant manager for six months. I came to Price Savers with four years of experience as an assistant manager at K-Mart and a bachelor's degree in marketing from the University of Dayton. I worked at ten Sam's Clubs stores in five states (Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Ohio and North Carolina) until I left the company in April 2001.

3. After four years as Assistant Manager in five clubs (three in Cincinnati, Ohio; Raleigh, North Carolina; and Florence, Kentucky), I was promoted to co-manager and transferred to the Streamwood, Illinois club in November 1991. In May 1992, I was promoted to general manager and transferred to the Merrillville, Indiana club. I consistently received average and above average reviews and had no coachings during that time. Director of Operations Gary Dawes wrote in my March 1993 evaluation, "I am very comfortable with Tina and feel she will continue to grow with her assignment over the next year . . . Tina has excelled in many areas this past year, and has many fine management qualities." Attached hereto as Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of my March 1993 Management Evaluation Form.

4. In 1994, I was transferred to the Gurnee, Illinois club where I worked as General Manager until 1998. I became pregnant in 1998 and soon after I told District Manager Dale Green (male) that I was pregnant, I was coached for store shrinkage. This was the first coaching I had received in ten years with this company. One week before my scheduled pregnancy leave, I was demoted by District Manager Green to assistant manager for "poor organization skills." I had never been coached or spoken to about my organizational skills prior to this demotion. I was replaced by a male, Bob Miller, who had worked with the company for less time than I had and who did not have a marketing degree. When I returned from my leave of absence, I was told I had been relocated to the North Lake, Illinois club.

5. For the next year and a half, I did all that I could to work my way back up to Co-Manager or General Manager. I repeatedly told District Manager

Green that I was interested in promotion. He told me that if I worked hard and improved in certain areas I would be considered for a promotion. I worked hard to improve and my evaluations reflected that I had addressed the problem areas Green had identified. During that time, eight co-manager positions opened. I was never considered for any of the positions and all but one were filled by men. None of the positions were posted. Two of those positions were offered to Brian [Last Name Unknown] and Orences Christian, both of whom had less experience than me with Sam's Club and who did not have marketing degrees. In fact, Brian [Last Name Unknown] had worked under me as the Front End Area Manager and my assistant when I was the General Manager at the Gurnee club. When I was passed up, I spoke with District Manager Green and he told me that my General Manager, Keith Lowe, had recommended me. Lowe confirmed this, but told me that Regional Vice President Don Hitt made the final decision about whom to promote based on those recommendations and had not chosen me. This process confirmed my understanding that the Regional Vice Presidents met weekly in Bentonville to discuss and select candidates for general manager and co-manager positions. In addition, I wrote in my 1999 evaluation that "I feel ready to be promoted to a Co-Manager or General Manager position. It is very discouraging to see less qualified individuals get promoted over me." Attached hereto as Exhibit B is a true and correct copy of my April 1999 Sam's Club Performance Appraisal for Merchandise Manager. Director of Operations Brian Collins told me to "wait for my time."

6. Finally, in July 1999, I was promoted to Co-Manager at the Northlake club. The opening was not posted but I found out about it when I learned that the current Co-Manager was being promoted. I told Director of Operations Collins that I was interested in the position and he gave me the promotion.

7. In July 2000, I was transferred to the Evanston, Illinois club. In April 2001, while on maternity leave, I requested extended leave for medical reasons. District Manager Miller told me that I would be terminated if I did not return to work. Because I was denied extended leave and was too sick to return, I felt I had no choice but to resign from the club. After working hard for more than 12 years at Sam's Club, I did not want my records to indicate that I was terminated.

8. I observed in each of the stores I worked in that women were more often assigned to the clothing department and men to the meat department, which pays more. I also observed that more men were assigned to the night shift, which generally pays $1.00 more than the day shift.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Illinois that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 21, 2003 at Waukegan, Illinois.

DECLARATION OF SUSAN HITCH IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Susan Hitch, declare:

1. I am a 39 year old female living in Livermore, Colorado. I worked for Wal-Mart from January 25, 1999 until I resigned from employment on December 29, 2000 out of frustration with the lack of promotional opportunities.

2. During my employment at Wal-Mart, I encountered discrimination based upon my gender with regard to promotions and training opportunities. In addition, I experienced retaliation for voicing my complaints of discrimination to Wal-Mart managers.

3. I started working at Wal-Mart's Longmont, Colorado, store as a Cashier. I also worked as a Layaway Clerk, Customer Service Manager (hourly), Stocker, Safety Team Leader, risk management, fund raising, Furniture Department Manager and Support Manager.

4. I spoke to Kent McCoy, the Store Manager, on numerous occasions and expressed an interest in being promoted into a salaried management position. I specifically remember one such meeting with Mr. McCoy in approximately September, 1999, when I was a Safety Team Leader. Mr. McCoy falsely told me that I had to be a Department Manager before being promoted into a management job at Wal-Mart. I also spoke to Jim Mohan, the District Manager, about my desire to work in management at Wal-Mart. Mr. Mohan replied that Wal-Mart would train me for an Assistant Manager position. Mr. Mohan led me to believe that the training would commence within two to four weeks. When I was not assigned to the Management Training Program after a couple of weeks, I again inquired of Mr. Mohan and Mr. McCoy why there was a delay in my training. Neither Mr. Mohan nor Mr. McCoy explained why training had not started. For weeks thereafter, I continued to ask these men when my Assistant Manager training would begin, but they only ignored my further inquiries.

5. In March, 2000, I was promoted into an hourly Furniture Department Manager position. During my time in this position, department sales increased by 72% and I was invited to attend a meeting in Arkansas as the representative for the Longmont, Colorado, store.

6. I attended this meeting in Arkansas in the spring or early summer of 2000. I noticed that most of the managers attending the meeting were young males. I saw very few female district or regional managers at this meeting. Coincidentally, during this meeting, nuns who owned stock in Wal-Mart accused Wal-Mart of discrimination against women.

7. After I attended the meeting in Arkansas, I spoke to Kent McCoy, the Store Manager, and Rick Caputa, the Co-Manager of the store, and again told them that I wanted to be promoted into a salaried management position. I also told them that I felt Wal-Mart discriminated against women. Mr. McCoy told me that he thought I would one day make it into Wal-Mart management.

8. In late June, 2000, after repeatedly asking Mr. McCoy to be promoted, I became a Support Manager, which is an hourly, not salaried, position. After becoming a Support Manager, however, Wal-Mart excluded me from daily store meetings and Wal-Mart management personnel continued to give me the cold shoulder. When I again discussed my desire to be promoted into a salaried Assistant Manager position with Mr. McCoy, he told me that I would have to relocate. I responded immediately that I would be willing to relocate, and Mr. McCoy said he would "look into it." Nothing ever came of my request.

9. I recall discussing my desire to become a salaried manager with Mr. Caputa in his office in the fall of 2000, when I was a Support Manager. During this meeting, Mr. Caputa told me that women were too emotional to be good managers. I did not use Wal-Mart's 1-800 complaint number because I observed that when other employees used this number to complain, the Home Office would call the District Manager; who would call the Store Manager, who would then retaliate against the complaining employee. I feared that if I used this complaint method, or utilized the Open Door Policy, I would be subject to retaliation.

10. I eventually became very discouraged that I would ever be promoted to a salaried management position at Wal-Mart. I had wanted to pursue a career with Wal-Mart, and had worked long and hard hours to try to succeed in achieving my goal of reaching the salaried management level. I had many times told my store management, as well as the District and Regional Managers, of my goal of reaching management and my desire to be placed into the Management Training Program.

11. In my time at Wal-Mart, I only saw two job vacancies posted. Mr. McCoy would usually hire whomever he wanted. I observed that management only approached men to inquire whether they were interested in becoming a member of management, while women were never approached. I felt that, because I was a woman, I could never advance to an Assistant Manager position.

12. I excelled at every job I held at Wal-Mart and poured my heart and soul into my work there. I always received the highest marks ("Exceeds Expectations") on my Performance Appraisals.

13. I observed males with less qualifications than me promoted by Wal-Mart into salaried Assistant Manager positions. In February, 2000, Jim Mohan, the District Manager, promoted Jorge Cobos, a male Stocker from Wal-Mart's Lafayette, Colorado store directly into the Assistant Manager training program at the Longmont, Colorado store after less than seven total months of employment at Wal-Mart. Mr. Cobos completed the training program and became an Assistant Manager at the Longmont store.

14. I was crushed and extremely disappointed when I saw Wal-Mart promote Mr. Cobos to an Assistant Manager job, despite the fact that I was more qualified than him and had repeatedly made it known that I wanted to become an Assistant Manager. In December, 2000, I resigned from Wal-Mart because I was so fed-up with the discriminatory atmosphere and lack of promotional opportunities for me.

15. After I resigned from Wal-Mart, the store promoted Dustin Turner, a twenty year-old part-time male cashier, into an Assistant Manager position. When I worked as a Stocker in 1999, Mr. Turner had been promoted on a fast track into a Support Manager position despite being disciplined by Wal-Mart at least three times for having romantic affairs with co-workers. I had previously complained to Mr. Caputa about Mr. Turner's unfair promotion, but was told that Mr. Turner was "different."

16. Wal-Mart had been grooming Mr. Turner for a salaried management position. It was clear to me that, because I was a woman, there was no room in Wal-Mart's management for me. The fact that Wal-Mart promoted Mr. Turner to an Assistant Manager position did not surprise me, as I assumed this would be the outcome of Wal-Mart's special treatment of him.

17. If given the opportunity, I would like to return to Wal-Mart if and when the company reforms its policies and practices to ensure a discrimination-free workplace.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Colorado that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 15, 2003, at Fort Collins, Colorado.

Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ

DECLARATION OF DAWN HITTLE IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Dawn Hittle, declare:

1. I make this declaration on the basis of my personal knowledge and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts in it.

2. I was hired as an assistant manager trainee in the Bloomsburg, Pennsylvania Wal-Mart Store in 1993 after completing my Masters' Degree in Business Administration. I was 26 years old when I joined Wal-Mart. In the seven years that I worked for Wal-Mart Stores, I worked in five stores in three states (Pennsylvania, Massachusetts and Connecticut). My hope in joining Wal-Mart was to be able to use the skills and knowledge I had gained through my Masters' Degree to become a store manager. Despite years of hard work and persistence and consistently positive evaluations, that hope was never realized.

3. After six months as an assistant manager training, I was promoted to assistant manager in the Fairhaven, Connecticut store in June 1993. I was hopeful that this promotion was the first step toward becoming a store manager. During my September 1993 evaluation, I told Store Manager Chris Vaden (male) and District Manager Kerry Harmon (male) that I would like to work toward a promotion to store manager. In the career goals section of my evaluation, I wrote: "[i]n the next four to five years, I would like to take on the responsibility of a store manager." Attached hereto as Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of my September 1993 Management Performance Appraisal and Commitment to Success evaluation.

4. In my January 1994 evaluation, I again expressed to Store Manager Vaden and District Manager Harmon my desire to gain the training necessary to eventually become a store manager. I described my long-term goals as wanting to "learn more about the responsibilities of running a store," and I wrote that "I would eventually like to run my own store." Attached hereto as Exhibit B is a true and correct copy of my January 1994 Management Performance Appraisal and Commitment to Success evaluation. Although both Vaden and Harmon were positive about my work in their remarks in my evaluation, no efforts were made to provide me with any training.

5. In May 1994, I asked to be transferred to the new Seekonk, Massachusetts Wal-Mart Store because I believed that the experience of opening a store would help me in my quest to become a store manager. Store Manager Scott Ahrens and District Manager Tony Nardozi both approved the transfer, but then, abruptly and without explanation, transferred me to the Norwich, Connecticut store. Because I was told of the transfer on such short notice, I had no time to move and had to commute 80 miles each way (a three hour daily commute) for three months until I was able to sell my condominium. After a few weeks at the Norwich store, it became clear to me that the Norwich store was in trouble and Store Manager Becky Foy told me that I was part of a new management team that was to revamp the store.

6. In my October 1995 evaluation, I wrote, "[m]y career goals consist of [moving] from assistant to store manager to district and beyond." Attached hereto as Exhibit C is a true and correct copy of my October 1995 Wal-Mart Store Manager/Assistant Manager Performance Appraisal. Again, I received no real encouragement and no direction in how I could gain the skills and experience to becoming a store manager.

7. In March 1997, I initiated a transfer to the new Wal-Mart Store in Branford, Connecticut, in order to get the experience of opening a new store. I hoped that the skills I gained would assist me in eventually becoming a store manager. While working at this store, I spoke several times with Store Manager Billy "Chip" Boyles about my desire to become a store manager. As I noted in my March 1997 evaluation, "my intention is to run a store soon and if improving in these areas will me get there, that's what I intend to do." Attached hereto as Exhibit D is a true and correct copy of my March 1997 Management Performance Appraisal. Again the next year, I wrote in my yearly evaluation that I would like to be considered for a store manager position: "I intend to run my own store within a reasonable amount of time." Attached hereto as Exhibit E is a true and correct copy of my February 1998 Management Performance Appraisal.

8. While Assistant Manager in the Branford Wal-Mart Store, I was called in on my day off to help with inventory at another Connecticut Wal-Mart Store. There were about seven managers scheduled to work this inventory, which entailed preparing the inventory throughout the store to be counted. I was one of only two female assistant managers. After several hours, I noticed I was the only one left working in the receiving area. The male managers and associates also assigned to help with inventory were not in the store. Soon after, they came into the store after having spent the last hour playing basketball in the back lot rather than working.

9. During that time, I applied for about ten store manager positions through the Wal-Mart internal computer system, but received only two interviews. Eight times I did not get a call about an interview, or even a call telling me I had not gotten an interview. And the two times I did get an interview, no one ever followed up to tell me whether or not I got the job. All ten jobs were filled by men.

10. I went on maternity leave in June 1999. While on leave, I was promoted to co-manager for the Cromwell, Connecticut store, and began to work in that position when I returned in January 2000. I understood that this position would be a training period. I would work alongside the store manager in order to develop some of the skills needed to run a store. Although I was confident that I had most of the skills necessary to become a store manager already, I was excited that my interest in becoming a store manager was finally being recognized and I was greatly looking forward to learning whatever other skills Wal-Mart felt I needed in order to advance. However, my hopes were soon crushed. As co-manager, I did not learn any new skills and essentially performed secretarial tasks, such as opening mail and filing. The store manager, Travis McNail, was new to his job and was unable to provide me with any real training on critical management functions.

11. While I was co-manager, I applied twice for open store manager positions, but did not get either position. I also discovered that I was receiving the lowest amount allowed ($43,000) for co-managers. I believed that, with seven years of experience as an assistant manager, I should have been paid more. Frustrated that I was not making any progress within the company, I resigned in May 2000.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and of the State of Connecticut that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on ____________, 2003, at Clinton, Connecticut.

I, Nancy Hom, declare,

1. I was an Assistant Manager for Sam's Clubs for 10 years, from 1991 until 2001. I am female and live in Concord, California.

2. I had been employed in retail management for nearly 20 years when I was hired by Wal-Mart, Inc. to be an Assistant Manager at Sam's Club. I was originally told that I would be in management training for several months, but after approximately two weeks of training with Sam's Club, I was made an Assistant Manager. I remained as an Assistant Manager for the next 10 years and never received a promotion. I never received any discipline. I was never given any direction or guidance as to what I needed to do to become a General (or Club) Manager.

3. My first assignment for Sam's Club was in Omaha, Nebraska, where I was an Assistant Manager. The Director of Operations, Bruce Redding, told me that if I worked hard I would be promoted to General Manager. At one point, he spoke to me about transferring to Las Vegas, Nevada, to show the women there that a woman could be a manager. He never transferred me to Las Vegas, and gave no explanation.

4. After about a year in Nebraska, I received a telephone call from the People Division in the Home Office in Bentonville, Arkansas, directing me to transfer to Yuba City, California with a week's notice. I understood when I was hired that I had to be willing to move on short notice to any place requested by Wal-Mart. I moved with my children from Nebraska to Yuba City where I was an Assistant Manager for approximately one year.

5. While at the Yuba City Club in 1993, I asked Director of Operations Marvin Moxley to promote me to the position of General Manager. He responded by asking with a tone of sarcasm why I felt I could be a General Manager. I responded by asking him why he thought I could not be one. He merely laughed in response, and gave me no further information. He did not appear to take my request seriously. At that time, I was not aware of any female General Managers or female Directors of Operations within Sam's Club. There was no application to complete to express my interest in this position.

6. From Yuba City, I was transferred to Oxnard, California to be an Assistant Manager. Again, at the request of Wal-Mart, Inc., I moved with my children to help open a new club.

7. After about a year in Oxnard, I transferred to Concord, California in 1994 where I remained until I left in October 2001. I left my employment with Sam's Club because I was permanently disabled as a result of a workplace injury.

8. The policies and practices followed at each of these Sam's Clubs in Nebraska and California were the same. When I first began at Sam's Club, there were no handbooks or written guidelines for Sam's Clubs. Instead, we used and relied upon the manual and guidelines used at Wal-Mart Stores. Eventually, a Sam's Club manual was created. Each of the clubs I worked at had a manual in the manager's office which contained the policies and guidelines issued by the Home Office in Bentonville, Arkansas. When a new policy or guideline was issued, it was sent by the Home Office with instructions to insert it in the notebook. The policies and guidelines in the notebook included directives on personnel policies, including hiring and harassment, in addition to sales, inventory and merchandise procedures.

9. When I began working at Sam's Clubs, no job positions were posted. Postings for hourly positions at the Club level began in the late 1990s. However, even when we posted a job as open or available to permit interested employees to sign up for consideration, I observed that the General Managers frequently had already selected the person for the position. I recall, for example, General Manager Alan Oshier at the Concord Sam's Club directed me to post positions when he had already expressed to me his decision on who would be given the job. In particular, I recall that Mr. Oshier had already told me who he had selected as the new Check Out Supervisor at the same time he was directing me to post the position as available. Mr. Oshier also told me who he had selected as Team Leaders, or hourly supervisors, at the time he was directing me to post the positions.

10. Each day at Sam's Clubs, we received reports from the Home Office in Bentonville, Arkansas. We received regular and frequent reports reflecting financial results and goals, including sales and profits and merchandising information. Over the years, we received additional reports. By the late 1990s, in addition to the reports on sales and profits, we also received reports showing employee turnover rates on a club basis. These reports were modified over time, and later also showed the demographics of club associates. This information was sent to our club on a monthly basis. By examining these "People Profit and Loss" reports, one could see what percentage of associates at our club were female, and what percentage of club management was female. Although we received these reports monthly, I do not recall a single instance when any General Manager or Director of Operations ever mentioned our club demographics or discussed this report at all.

11. Each day we sent to Home Office reports reflecting sales and inventory numbers. In the early 1990s, we made and received these reports by telephone. By 2001, these reports were generally sent through computer communications. However, even when the reports became computer-generated, there were still typically daily telephone calls with the Regional or Home Office.

12. As Assistant Manager, I participated in hiring hourly employees upon occasion. Neither the Yuba City club nor the Oxnard club had opened when I arrived and so I helped interview many applicants. The final hiring decisions were made by the General Managers. The pay rates were established by the Home Office in Bentonville, Arkansas, but the General Manager at the Club had discretion to pay more to any newly hired individual. I observed General Managers paying newly hired male employees more than they paid newly hired female employees. For example, General Manager Alan Oshier paid John Naslund approximately $15.00 an hour when he was hired in early 2001. I am unaware of any female employee receiving a comparable rate when first hired.

13. In helping to open the Yuba City and the Oxnard Sam's Clubs, part of my responsibilities included ensuring the policies and procedures established by the home office in Bentonville, Arkansas were implemented at the club level. I did this by discussing these Home Office directives with the hourly employees who reported to me. In addition, when I worked at the Concord club, I was responsible for training newly hired employees and orientation. The materials I used for new hire orientation came from Home Office.

14. In 1992, I received in the mail a copy of a letter that was addressed to Helen Walton, the widow of founder Sam Walton, Rob Walton, the founder's son, Bud Walton, the brother of Sam Walton and a number of top executives of the company. This letter indicated that it was from eighty Assistant Managers, General Managers and Directors and I understood that copies were being sent to store level management across the country. The letter was dated September 26, 1992. Attached to it was a second letter, dated July 20, 1992, again addressed to the Waltons and to company executives. I received these letters at the club where I worked in the usual course of business. The envelopes were addressed to Managers and Assistant Managers. After reading and copying these letters, I gave the originals to the General Manager of the Club. I took copies home with me and have kept them at my home. True and correct copies of these two letters are attached hereto as Hom Exhibits A and B respectively. These letters stated, among other things, that there was a pattern of discrimination against women at Sam's Clubs, and asked for the help and attention of the addressees. The letters also stated that they were prepared on behalf of a large number of managers and highlighted other issues of concern including a fear of retaliation for expressing these concerns. I do not know who wrote these letters, and I was not asked to participate in drafting them. No one in management asked me anything about these letters. I am unaware of any response to these letters.

15. In 1993, I received another letter in the mail at the club where I worked. This letter was addressed to Sam's Assistant Managers, General Managers, and Directors of Operations. It stated that it was from over 100 Sam's Management Members. After reading and copying this letter, I gave the original to my General Manager and took a copy home with me, where I have kept it ever since. A true and correct copy is attached hereto as Hom Exhibit C. This letter stated that women were discriminated against, passed over for promotions, talked down to, and black listed for using the Open Door. I do not know who wrote this letter. I am unaware of any response from Sam's Club or Wal-Mart management as a result of this letter. I was not asked anything about this letter or about the claims asserted in it.

16. In 1993, I was severely injured in a workplace accident. After I transferred to the Concord, California club, I was demoted to an hourly employee. Several weeks after I complained in writing to the Home Office in Bentonville, Arkansas, my title of "Assistant Manager" was restored and I was given the position of "Export Manager." However, my salary was decreased and frozen. In addition, I no longer received Geographical Assistance Pay ("GAP"), which is additional compensation given to Assistant Managers and above to compensate for the increased local costs of living, compared to the base salaries set in Bentonville, Arkansas. GAP at the Concord club at that time was approximately 30% of my annual salary. I protested many times to the Club and Regional management and to the Home Office using the Open Door policy. I explained that Mr. Dave Columb, who had been "Export Manager" before me, had received GAP. Eventually, my GAP pay was restored after a delay of some months. However, I did not receive GAP retroactively for the months in which I waited.

17. As a result of my use of the Open Door, I was told by Regional Personnel Manager Rita Seckington that "We would be watching", and if I did not perform, I would "be coached right out the front door". Director of Operations Phil Goodwin asked me if I realized what I had done, getting the "big boys" involved. I understood these comments to be threats of retaliation for my use of the Open Door.

18. As an Assistant Manager at the Concord club, I worked with and sometimes supervised Christine Kwapnoski, now a named plaintiff in this action. During the years 1994 through 2001, Ms. Kwapnoski often expressed to me her desire to become a manager at Sam's Club. I passed on Ms. Kwapnoski's wish for promotion to Directors of Operations Phil Goodwin, and to the General Managers of the Concord club, including Alan Oshier, Mike Bruegger, Ed Walker, Harley Lowe, and Chet Wayne. Ms. Kwapnoski worked in the receiving and claims area with me. I found her to be an excellent employee and suggested merit raises be awarded to her on more than one occasion.

19. In spring of 2001, the Receiving Area Manager position became vacant. I suggested Ms. Kwapnoski be given the position, based on her experience, work ethic and her potential. She had been qualified for the position for several years, as she had been an excellent receiving and claims area employee, and had been a Team Leader in another area of the club. Nevertheless, she had been repeatedly passed over for this position. Director of Operations Phil Goodwin asked me who I thought should be given the position, and I suggested Ms. Kwapnoski. Mr. Goodwin was adamantly opposed to giving this promotion to her, saying that she had "people issues". Mr. Goodwin was in the Concord store a few times a month. I worked with Ms. Kwapnoski daily and I believed she was qualified for the position. Mr. Goodwin asked if I would cover the Receiving Area Manager position until someone was selected for the job. Shortly thereafter, approximately two weeks after this litigation was filed, Ms. Kwapnoski was finally allowed to be the Receiving Area Manager.

20. Although he blocked Ms. Kwapnoski from being promoted due to unspecified "people issues", Mr. Goodwin did not hold Store Manager Alan Oshier to a similar standard. Mr. Oshier lost his temper with Club associates on a very frequent basis. His outbursts were loud, often cruelly personal, and common knowledge among most of the employees at the Club. Mr. Oshier told me that Mr. Goodwin had instructed him to take an anger management course. Mr. Goodwin never expressed to me a belief that Mr. Oshier had "people issues" or that he should not be in management because of these outbursts.

21. In my experience, male managers that I worked with over the years, including Mr. Goodwin and Mr. Oshier, had stereotypical images of how women should behave. Ms. Kwapnoski did not always fit this image.

22. Ms. Kwapnoski had previously been passed over for numerous other positions, which I, as Assistant Manager, believed her to be the most qualified. For example, Tyler Whitney, Bryce Sherman, and Joshua Reynolds were all Area Managers long before Ms. Kwapnoski was promoted to that position. In my opinion, none of these men were any more qualified than Ms.Kwapnoski, and none of them had the amount of seniority that Ms.Kwapnoski did.

23. I observed more frequent and larger merit raises and larger annual raises given to men than to women repeatedly at Sam's Clubs throughout my career. At the Concord Sam's Club, General Manager Oshier often gave large raises to men. For example, I recall Ernie Tautalatasi receiving raises totaling approximately $2.00 an hour in 2000, his first year at the Concord Club. The following year, his raises increased his hourly rate by approximately $1.25 an hour. Henry Sargent was hired in approximately the fall of 2000. I recall that within months, he had been given raises totaling approximately $4.00 an hour. Women were not given raises with the same frequency or ease. For example, I was told by General Manager Mike Bruegger not to come back to him with a request for another raise for Christine Kwapnoski. Another female employee, Cassandra Iman, was not given raises consistent with her performance or in comparison with male associates.

24. I observed disparate treatment of men and women engaged in prohibited personal relationships. For example, Assistant Manager Richard Putnam at a store in the Sacramento area was accused of having an inappropriate personal relationship with a female hourly employee. The female employee was terminated. Only when greater protest was lodged with the Home Office by Mr. Putnam's wife was Mr. Putnam disciplined. He was terminated but rehired three months later in the same position. To my knowledge, the female hourly employee was not rehired.

25. The workplace atmosphere at the Concord Sam's Club was one of hostility towards women in management. For example, when Director of Operations Goodwin telephoned the Club and I answered, he frequently would ask to speak with "a manager". When I would remind him that I was a manager, he would merely respond by asking me to have one of "the guys" return his call. Assistant Manager Richie King told me that the Region was run as a "good old boys' club" and added that he "was not complaining". The male managers socialized together, to the exclusion of the female managers.

26. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in this Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and California that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 17, 2003, at Concord, California.

I, Angela Horton, declare,

1. I make this declaration on the basis of my personal knowledge and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts in it.

2. I was an employee of Sam's Club from October 1996 until I left the company in July of 2000. In my nearly four years at Sam's Club, I worked in six different stores in two states (Minnesota and Wisconsin). Before joining Sam's Club, I was a petroleum lab specialist in the Wisconsin Army National Guard for five years while working in several different jobs, including as a child care provider and health aide.

3. At Sam's Club, my goal was to become a Fresh Area Assistant Manager. Fresh Area Assistant Managers are responsible for maintaining inventory level and product standards in the department, supervising and training workers, and ensuring compliance with sanitation requirements. I encountered repeated roadblocks in achieving this goal, including poor treatment by management, delayed entrance into the Management in Training program, and, once in that program, inadequate training on skills critical to running a Fresh Area department. When I finally obtained the position, I learned that I was paid substantially less than similarly-situated males. I was scapegoated for poor decisions made by the male General Manager. Ultimately, I left Sam's Club because of the poor management practices, which I believed endangered public health.

4. I was hired as a part-time produce/stocker in the Onalaska, Wisconsin club, making $6.00 an hour. After two months, I was promoted to a full-time team leader, where I remained for 16 months. During that time, I asked for forklift training in order to improve my job efficiency, but was told by Tim [Last Name Unknown], who ran the forklift and did the training, that I was too short and would not be able to see over the steering wheel. I protested to Meat Manager Ben Spanjers, who told me "he has a point, Ang."

5. In late Winter 1997, the "Spirit Committee," one of the company-sanctioned, employee-led committees to improve morale, hired a stripper for General Manager Jeff Marmer's birthday. The stripper performed in the store in front of all the employees and managers during the mandatory morning staff meeting, stripping down to her bra and panties while dancing to music and mixing a cake on his lap. Although I felt the stripper was inappropriate and I was embarrassed by the display, I did not use the Open Door policy to protest this incident because I had overheard Meat Manager Spanjers call the women who did complain about the stripper a "bunch of whiners." I was afraid of being labeled a whiner, facing possible retaliation, and hurting my chances for promotion.

6. At my six-month review in March 1997, I wrote as my goals to "increase overall knowledge and skills within Fresh Department; advance to higher level of responsibility within merchandising or buying within Fresh." Attached hereto as Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of my March 1997 Sam's Club Associate Evaluation Form. Despite my clear request, my manager did not offer me any training. In order to achieve the goals I had laid out in my evaluation, for the next six months I taught myself by reading produce magazines, exploring Sam's Club merchandising reports on the computer and seeking out information from other employees, such as Quality Control Inspector Craig Millie. I also received a "Partner of the Month" award and several commendations for doing a good job increasing sales and putting together demos.

7. Before my one-year review scheduled for September 1997, General Manager Marmer approached me and asked me what my goals were. I told him I was interested in the Management in Training program and wanted more information about it. After explaining the program to me, he told me that I had a good chance of making it into the program. In September 1997, at my one-year review, I again spoke with Meat Manager Spanjers about my interest in the Management in Training Program so that I could become a Fresh Area Manager. He told me that he supported my goals. In addition, I wrote in the Associate's Career Goals section of my written evaluation, "desire to move up within fresh, receive training in meat, possibly fresh management." Attached hereto as Exhibit B is a true and correct copy of my September 1997 Sam's Club Associate Evaluation Form. General Manager Marmer left the store in late September and no one else spoke to me about my interest in the training program until November 1997.

8. I expressed my interest in the training program to the new General Manager Catie Conneally in November. General Manager Conneally told me that Director of Operations Michael Matheson would interview me the next time he was in the store. When he arrived at the store soon after, he told me that the process had changed. He explained that there was no formal application process. Instead, the general managers at each store would identify associates who should be considered for promotion, and then those associates would take part in a series of interviews in the Twin Cities.

9. I was excited to begin this process. I repeatedly asked General Manager Conneally and Regional Fresh Merchandiser Bruce Burlson about when I would be interviewed for the training program. Finally, I used the Open Door to question the delay, yet I still heard nothing about the interviews or the program. In February 1998, I was finally interviewed for the Management in Training program by Regional Sales Manager Doug Persley, Duluth's General Manager Jim Caeser, Divisional Personnel Director Diana Eldridge, and St. Louis Park's General Manager Tim Kotiranta. I was chosen for the program and began training in Onalaska in March.

10. The Management in Training program for Fresh Managers consisted of being trained by a Fresh Manager for several months and reading self-taught training materials. Meat Managers Spanjers was assigned to train me, but he actually did very little of that training. He had associates Don Witt and Donovan Scott train me on how to cut meat and he spent very little time training me on how to run the department. I had observed three other trainees, Don Lindstrom, Jerry Swanda and Jenny Trombley, go through the program before me and they received more training on how to structure the department, including how to manage staffing, payroll and ordering. Instead Meat Manager Spanjers spent most of his time training Team Leader Chris Forde (male), who was not even a trainee, on how to run the department. Although I recognized the importance of being trained to cut meat, I felt that these management skills were far more important, particularly if I wanted to advance further in the company. Based on his behavior during the training and throughout my time at the Onalaska store, I believe that Meat Manager Spanjers was not truly committed to my training or my success and had chosen to groom the male employees instead. Spanjers specifically told me that, because of my physical size, I would not be able to handle the physical work of the position. Even if this had been true, which it was not, it did not explain why he did not train me on other critical management functions such as ordering and staffing. My belief was reinforced by comments made by Chris Forde and tolerated by Spanjers. He often referred to me as "little woman," and I once overheard him calling Jenny Trombley "broad." I protested these comments to General Manager Conneally and Meat Manager Spanjers, but the behavior did not stop.

11. In June 1998, I was promoted to Fresh Manager for Meat and Produce and was sent to the St. Cloud store to set up the fresh department, which was being added to the club. Because construction had not yet begun on the Meat and Produce department there, I worked in three Twin Cities clubs until construction began on the department in October 1998. While I was working at the three Twin Cities clubs, I trained many of the new Fresh Managers. Even after the Meat and Produce department at the St. Cloud store opened, I continued to have responsibility for training new Fresh Managers even after the St. Cloud store opened. While training them on how to calculate their monthly profit and loss statements, I discovered that many of these individuals, including Don Lindstrom and Doug Thompson, were paid $5000 to $10,000 more than I was for the Fresh Manager position. I protested this discrepancy with General Manager Kevin Shields who spoke with Regional Director Michael Matheson, who in turn spoke with Divisional Director Michael Miller in December 1999. In January 2000, I got a $2000 raise, which management later called a "market adjustment." My salary was still well below the amount that the male Fresh Managers were making, even though I was training them how to do their jobs.

12. Once I began working full-time in the St. Cloud as Meat Manager, I was not allowed to make many decisions about which products to merchandise and promote, and how many workers to hire. Instead, General Manager Kevin Shields told me to stock products that I felt would not sell or be profitable, and told me to hire more employees than I felt necessary. As a result, my department did not run at a profit. I expressed my concerns about the way the department was being run to General Manager Shields who told me that I would not be held responsible for the loss of profit. I also registered my disagreement with the General Manager's merchandising decisions to Co-General Manager Neil Gwynne and Director of Operations Matheson, who told me to follow General Manager Shield's orders. Finally, I raised my concern with Fresh Merchandiser Carl Kramer. Although Fresh Merchandiser Kramer agreed with me, I did not see any follow up from these complaints.

13. After Kramer left the company, his replacement, Fresh Merchandiser Jim Hancock, held a meeting with me, General Manager Shields and itinerant Fresh Merchandiser Spanjers to discuss the department's lack of profit. At that meeting, Shields told Hancock that I was running the department according to his direction. Hancock and Spanjers told me to cut staff and product. Shields still did not express agreement with Hancock on how to run the department. Confused about whose direction to follow, I cut some product, but for the most part continued to follow General Manager Shields' orders. At my six month evaluation in September, I got a standard score despite the fact that my department had lost nearly $80,000 dollars.

14. Six months later, five days before my one year evaluation, I got a verbal coaching from Merchandise Manager Ralph [Last Name Unknown] about the lack of profitability in my department. Johnson and Shields were present for this coaching. When I explained to Merchandise Manager Ralph [Last Name Unknown] that I was running the department at Shields' direction, Shields became upset, saying loudly, "don't try to turn this back on me now" and slamming a chair under his desk. At my evaluation, I got a substandard score.

15. In May, I noticed that General Manager Shields was flirting with several female associates, Vicki [Last Name Unknown], Jennifer [Last Name Unknown], and Pepper [Last Name Unknown]. I saw that he took them out to lunch and spent a lot of time hanging out with them. Shields often did not return his pages and did not check in with employees in the Meat Department before closing the store. Some of the employees told me that he inadvertently locked the employees in the Meat Department in the store and they had to leave out the receiving dock platform. I spoke with Co-General Manager Johnson and told her that I felt this flirting was interfering with Shields doing his job properly. Johnson told me she had received complaints from several associates. I did not see any changes as a result of these complaints.

16. Two weeks after complaining to Johnson about Shields, I was demoted for "bad leadership," and for running an unprofitable department. In fact, my department had turned a profit in March, April and May 2000. I was replaced by a male, Dave Donnick, who later told me that Divisional Director Miller commended him for the three months of profit that had actually occurred under my leadership.

17. I immediately protested my demotion through the Open Door with Director of Operations Matheson. Matheson told me that he thought my demotion was the right decision and that he had already decided to transfer me back to the Onalaska store. I told him that I did not want to go back to the Onalaska store so he instead transferred me to the Northside Milwaukee store. In the Northside store, I first noticed sanitation problems in the meat department. I complained to two different assistant managers about the issues. Jeff Lemay, Regional Fresh Merchandiser also overlooked these problems.

18. One month later, I was transferred to the West Allis store to promote their rotisserie program. Over the next few weeks, I observed many sanitation violations at this store as well, and was extremely concerned about the food handling practices. I complained to the West Allis new General Manager Michael Hitz about the sanitation and food handling violations, but nothing was done. Not wanting to take part in serious health code violations and feeling like I was not being taken seriously, I decided to leave the company.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and of the State of Wisconsin that the foregoing is true and correct.

This declaration was signed by me on April 12th, 2003 at Watertown, Wisconsin.

I, Amy Houchins-Post, declare:

1. I have personal knowledge of the facts contained in this declaration and, if called as a witness, am competent to testify to those facts.

2. I am a female and am 27 years old. I have a Bachelor of Arts degree in Criminal Justice. I am married and I have one daughter.

3. I was employed at a Wal-Mart store in Sioux City, Iowa from April 2001 until I resigned in November 2002. I was hired as Security in Loss Prevention. In April 2001, I was temporarily assigned to the Lincoln, Iowa store to assist with security set-up. While at that store, a male co-manager, Shawn (last name unknown) grabbed me from behind and proceeded to grind himself against me. When I complained to the Loss Prevention Supervisor, Cindy Bauer, about the harassment she told me that it was just something that I would have to get used to since I was working in a "man's world." While I was at that store, Co-Manager Steve Casley also commented to me that I would make a "good dominatrix."

4. In approximately 2002, after I had been transferred back to the Sioux City Wal-Mart, I applied for the position of hourly support manager. I had previously been told by Store Manager James Hardy that experience in this position was required to get into the management trainee program, which had been my goal from the outset of my employment at Wal-Mart. Attached hereto as Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of my In-Store Performance Appraisal indicating my interest in advancement within Wal-Mart. I was interviewed by Assistant Manager Bruce Schultz but the position was awarded to Chris Wykle, a male co-worker. Wykle had had several coachings and had drug and alcohol problems. I had observed that, when Wykle did poorly in one department, he was simply moved to another department. I was present at one of Wykle's coachings with Co-Manager Darrell Davis; one of my job responsibilities was to sit in on employee coachings.

5. Several days after my interview, I was standing outside the UPC office and heard Co-Manager Darrell Davis state to someone on the phone that he would not hire a "squatter" for the Support Manager position. He then explained "someone who squats to pee", i.e. a woman. This made me upset because just several days earlier at a store-wide meeting, Davis stated that Wal-Mart does not tolerate sexual harassment or any type of discrimination.

6. In Summer 2002, I approached District Manager James Conrad and expressed my interest in applying for a salaried manager position that had been posted. He told me that I would have to get permission from Store Manager Hardy. When I spoke with Hardy, he told me that I did not have enough floor experience and experience in "Wal-Mart culture" This made me mad because I was familiar with Sam Walton's philosophy, as well as company policies and was often the biggest cheerleader for Wal-Mart. He offered me a position in ISC (Inventory) and led me to believe that this position was required to get the experience that I was supposedly lacking for a store management job. This was very frustrating to me because I had previously worked at a grocery chain where I supervised 100 people. By taking the ISC position, my pay was cut from $10.82 hourly to $8.84 hourly. Attached hereto as Exhibit B is a true and correct copy of my Associate's Commendation form. While this pay cut was very difficult for me to handle, I understood that the sacrifice was necessary in order to achieve my goal of promotion to store management. Soon after, I learned that Daniel Porter, who held the same position in ISC as I did, was making $10.00 per hour. He had been hired after me.

7. Shortly after taking the ICS position, a group of employees from the store were selected to enter the management training program by Store Manager Hardy. I was not selected, although I had repeatedly expressed interest in the position to store management personnel. In fact, there were no women in the group. When I asked Assistant Manager Terry Sadler why I was not selected, he stated that it was because I was not doing a good job in ISC. I had instituted some innovations in the ISC Department to alleviate some of the problems the department faced and, because I did not specifically seek permission to do so, I received a coaching. This was surprising to me because Wal-Mart's management frequently talked about the importance of encouraging associates to be independent and to take on problems creatively. I understand now that this was just talk.

8. By November 2002, I realized that no matter what I did in the store, or how much experience I gained, male store management would not recommend me, nor allow me to enter the management training program. Therefore in November 2002, I decided to resign from Wal-Mart. In my exit interview, I stated that one of my reasons for leaving was lack of career opportunities. Attached hereto as Exhibit C is a true and correct copy of my Exit Interview form.

9. I have personal knowledge of the facts contained in this declaration and, if called as a witness, am competent to testify to those facts. I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State of Iowa that the foregoing is true and correct.

I signed this on March 29, 2003 in Sioux City, Iowa.

DECLARATION OF BRENDA HOULE IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2 I was employed by Wal-Mart, Inc., in the Supercenter Store in Hazelton, Pennsylvania from November 6, 1996 until May, 2001. I am female.

3 I was hired by Wal-Mart as a cashier. I was successful at every level of my employment, I never received any write ups or discipline, all of my evaluations were good and I received many awards. The awards I received were Outstanding Performance, August 24, 1999; first place VPI Winner for store 2255 in February 2001; and Third place VPI Winner for District 326 in February 2001. The VPI award is given for proving your marketing skills by picking the item that had the highest sales for one month. Despite this proven record of success, I was never offered any position higher than Department Manager. I became a Department Manager in 2000 after applying for the job. I was told that I did such a great job in the Seasonal Department that I deserved the promotion.

4. In 1997, while I was working in the Hazelton store, a man named Ed Kelly trained for six weeks there to be a Co-Manager. He sexually propositioned me when I was resetting Register 2. He said he was lonely, and told me he was staying at the Genett's Hotel on Route 93. He told me his room number and said "Let's get together." I did not go to his hotel room. The following day, Co-Manager Kelly came to me and said, "You did not show up last night." I ignored him since he was leaving the store in two weeks at the conclusion of his training.

5. In June 2000, Ed Kelly returned to the Hazelton store as Store Manager. One of the first things he did was ask Traci Davis, the Customer Service Manager on duty, if the "British girl" was still working at the store. Ms. Davis then came to me and told me that Ed Kelly was asking about me. When Mr. Kelly saw me, he made sexual comments and when I did not respond, he verbally abused me. He told me I would not make it into management, that I was not ready. In April 2001, Store Manager Kelly said to me "You know you don't need floor experience to make management, you need willingness." Based on his prior sexual comments to me, I understood that Mr. Kelly would block any promotion for me because I was not willing to submit to his sexual advances.

6. I made a point of telling every manager in my store that my goal was to be promoted to management. District Manager John Donaldson and Assistant Store Manager Ben Kanour promised me in October 2000 that I would be promoted to the Assistant Manager Training Program in January 2001. In January, I asked about my promotion. In a meeting with Robin Ripple, Co-manager, Mr. Donaldson said I was not ready for management training. He said that Ms. Ripple would help me progress towards management. I was devastated. Soon afterwards, Matthew Gaydos, a young male associate from Electronics who had just returned to Wal-Mart in March 2001 after a year of working for another company, was promoted to the Assistant Manager Training Program. Unlike me, he had no previous experience in management. I had management experience as staffing coordinator in charge of the nursing staff at Memorial Hospital in Colorado Springs for one year before moving to Pennsylvania.

7. I reported Mr. Kelley's conduct to District Manager John Donaldson, Assistant Store Manager Ben Kanour and Co-Manager Robin Ripple. Mr. Kanour told me that I needed to change locations because of Mr. Kelly. There was no investigation of which I was aware. No action was taken to change Mr. Kelly's conduct nor was any other action taken to protect me. I am unaware of any response to my use of the Open Door, other than Mr. Kanour's suggestion that I leave.

8. Linda Student, Department Manager of Infants, told me she was also being propositioned by Ed Kelley at the same time he was propositioning me.

9. After being denied the promotion to Assistant Manager, I requested a leave of absence in March 2001 due to my husband's poor health, but it was denied. I then requested a transfer to the St. Claire, Pennsylvania store to get away from Mr. Kelly. However, the long drive to St. Claire was too much, especially with my husband in failing health. I requested a transfer back to the Hazelton store, but Mr. Kelly told me that there were no openings and that I was not coming back to that store. Consequently, I resigned.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and of the State of Pennsylvania, that the foregoing is true and correct.

I signed this on April 9, 2003 in White Haven, Pennsylvania.

DECLARATION OF MELISSA HOWARD IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Melissa Howard, declare:

1. I have personal knowledge of the facts contained in this declaration and, if called as a witness, am competent to testify to those facts.

2. I am female and 35 years old. I live in Indianapolis, Indiana with my daughter, Mikaela, who is seven years old.

3. I was hired by Wal-Mart Stores in August 1992. I was placed as a department manager in Electronics in the New Castle, Indiana Wal-Mart store, earning $6.00 per hour. At the time I was hired, I had six years of retail experience with K-Mart, including supervisory experience as department manager and support team manager.

4. I entered Wal-Mart's Assistant Manager training program in June 1993 and was trained at the Muncie, Indiana store. When I started training, I wrote that my long-term goals were to work my way up the ladder to store manager, district manager and ultimately regional manager. Attached hereto as Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of my March 23, 1993 Management Candidate Recommendation.

5. Following my training, I returned as the Third Shift Assistant Manager to the New Castle store, which meant that I worked nights managing, unloading, and stocking. I was transferred to the Watsecka, Illinois store where I was the Assistant Manager for Hardlines. I was the only female in management. Within the year, I was the Lead Assistant Manager, meaning that I was responsible for signatures and reports in the store manager's absence. In February 1994, I received an "exceeds expectations" rating on my performance evaluation. I wrote on my evaluation that I wanted to be a store manager by the time I was 30, and then move up to district manager. Attached hereto as Exhibit B is a true and correct copy of my February 4, 1994 evaluation.

6. I resigned from Wal-Mart in September 1994 because of an incident with Regional Vice President John Waters. In the course of a store tour, Mr. Waters loudly berated me about designating plastic spoons as non-replenishable items. He yelled and belittled me in front of my hourly clerks as well as other management staff and questioned how I could be an assistant manager. The District Manager, John DiPasquale, who was also on the store tour, tried to come to my defense, telling Mr. Waters that I had in fact acted properly with respect to the plastic spoons. This did not deter Mr. Waters.

7. Later I decided to use the Open Door Policy and spoke with District Manager DiPasquale about the incident. He told me that things would not change with Mr. Waters and that I just needed to "take the shit and let it roll." I did not want to be treated this way in the future so I resigned.

8. Shortly thereafter, I learned that Wal-Mart Divisional Vice President Bill Fields was interested in speaking to former Assistant Managers about their reasons for leaving Wal-Mart. I met with Mr. Fields and explained what had occurred with Mr. Waters. Mr. Fields told me that he had received other complaints from women about Mr. Waters' conduct towards them. Mr. Fields assured me that Mr. Waters was no longer a Regional Vice President and he asked me to return to my position with Wal-Mart. I agreed.

9. I was placed as an Assistant Manager in Plainfield, Indiana in March 1995. My daughter was born in January 1996 and my performance evaluation ranking for the year after she was born was "exceeds expectations."

10. In July 1997, I was promoted to the position of Store Manager in Marysville, Kansas. I drove with my daughter's father, who is African-American, to find a place to live there. When we arrived in town, we were treated hostilely by a clerk in the local Wal-Mart store, the town realtor and by a number of prospective landlords because we were a mixed-race family. At the last rental we visited, the landlord told us that my daughter was not safe and that we needed to be out of town by dark. I knew then that I could not move my family to this place.

11. I called the Regional Personnel Manager Gary Coward, explained what had happened and asked to be placed as a store manager anywhere else. He refused and told me that I would have to go to Marysville as planned or accept a demotion and return as an assistant manager to the 86th Street Store in Indianapolis, a low performing store with high shrink. I took the demotion to assistant manager at the 86th Street Store. This was particularly humiliating because my employees in Plainfield had just thrown me a big going away party to celebrate my promotion.

12. I was placed as a co-manager of the Greenwood, Indiana store in September 1997. The Store Manager, Curt Mace, ran the store like a boys' club. He regularly socialized with a group of male managers and hourly employees – going to lunch together, drinking, playing pool, and going to the race track. I was not invited to participate in these activities but rather was left to run the store. Wal-Mart's anti-fraternization policy prohibits store management from socializing with subordinates outside of work. To my knowledge, Mr. Mace was not coached for his conduct.

13. In June 1998, I posted for a store manager opening in Decatur, Indiana and was selected. The store had a lot of problems when I arrived (i.e. 16 trailers of old merchandise in the back) but I was able, over time, to clean it up. I put the store through a remodel and there was a grand opening in late 1999. Attached hereto as Exhibit C are a number of commendations that I received for the work that I did at Decatur.

14. As the Decatur store manager, I was required to attend regular district meetings in Fort Wayne, Indiana. I was the only female store manager in the district. The district manager would sometimes hold the lunch meeting at Hooter's restaurant. The waitresses at the restaurant are required to wear tight t-shirts to show off their breasts. During the meeting, I was forced to listen to lots of discussion among the male managers about the waitresses' breasts and butts and which sexual experiences they would like to have with them. While it was humiliating to be there, I was reluctant to complain. I knew from attending the annual company meetings that the male managers often went out together to strip clubs after the meeting. It seemed to me to be an accepted part of the culture.

15. In September 1999, I was assigned as the store manager for the new supercenter slated to open in Bluffton, Indiana. In my experience, Wal-Mart generally staffed new stores with an experienced group of managers. Instead, I was given a team of managers that included two co-managers who were brand new to Wal-Mart. So, in addition to hiring and training 450 new employees, I also had to train the management staff. When other new stores had in the past opened in the Fort Wayne area, they had been staffed with experienced managers. The store managers in those new stores were men. I felt as if I was being set up to fail with this inexperienced management staff.

16. Specifically, district management hired Jerome Rauch (a male) from a local grocery store chain to serve as the co-manager in Bluffton. Rauch had no Wal-Mart experience, management or otherwise. He was paid a guaranteed salary of $65,000 annually -- $15,000 more than I was making although he reported to me. He also received three weeks' paid vacation from his hire date; I had had to work seven years to accumulate that same benefit. I am aware that another male co-manager, Alia Naghdi, was hired off the street for $10,000 more than I was making.

17. In March 2000, our district manager Kevin Washburn learned he was in trouble because several stores in his district had high shrink; the Bluffton store was not one of them, however. We (the district manager, the store managers and the loss prevention staff) were told to drive to Bentonville to meet with senior management about the problems. We went in two cars, one driven by District Manager Washburn and the other by Phil Harris, Loss Prevention District Manager. I was the only woman in my car and there was another female store manager, Shelly Lehman, in the other. During the approximately 16-hour drive, the male managers talked ceaselessly about sex despite my repeated requests that they stop. We stopped for gas and several of the male managers wanted to go for a drink at the club adjacent to the station. When we entered, I realized that it was a strip club. Although I had never been in a place like this and had no interest in being there, I had no choice but to stay because I did not have my own car. I did not believe that it would have been safe for me to sit in the parking lot in the dark outside the club. I tried to ignore the show, but at one point, I was approached by one of the strippers and District Manager Kevin Washburn proposed that he pay one of the strippers $50 to have a "threesome out back" with me. I refused.

18. In Bentonville, our team was berated and humiliated for the district's bad performance. We were made to stand up in a large group meeting and be introduced as the group "that just lost us a million dollars." District Manager Washburn and another Store Manager, David Pickle, were demoted. I met privately with the Divisional President Mike Huffaker, who told me that I was a great store manager and that I was only there because the Decatur store (which I had been out of for several months) was among those with high shrink.

19. On the return trip to Indiana, we stopped at two more strip clubs, including the "Pink Cadillac" somewhere in Missouri. The other female manager, Shelly Lehman, and I sat in the back of the club as far away from the stage as possible, while several of the men sat up close and paid for lap dances. We repeatedly asked the male drivers whether we could leave. When we returned to the motel where we were to spend the night, District Manager Washburn and at least one other store manager dropped us off and announced that they were going to a massage parlor, which I understood to mean that they were planning to hire prostitutes.

20. I returned to work at the Bluffton store and District Manager Washburn was replaced briefly by David Tyson, who in turn was replaced by John Waters in May 2000. As noted earlier in my declaration, I had resigned in 1994 because of Mr. Waters' abusive conduct towards me and I knew that he had been demoted at that time from his Regional Manager position. I worried that he might now retaliate against me for these earlier events. I grew more afraid when, at our first meeting, he made a point of telling me, in a less than friendly tone, that he "remembered" me.

21. At our next meeting, two weeks later, my fear increased when District Manager Waters questioned how it was that I had ever gotten a supercenter store manager position. When I responded that it was because of my strong past performance, he told me that what he had heard that I was a supercenter store manager because I was "Kevin's pet," referring to my former District Manager Kevin Washburn.

22. While my store's performance was on track, Mr. Waters started to look for reasons to criticize me. For example, some of the hourly employees complained to him that one of the female assistant managers (who I played no role in selecting) was "too mean." Based on this, he told me my performance was "unacceptable" and I needed to fix the problem or turn in my keys. Mr. Waters called in a Wal-Mart quality assurance inspector to see if he could find a problem in the grocery area of my store. The inspector found nothing wrong.

23. Two weeks later, on June 16, Mr. Waters telephoned me and asked me to step down. I demanded to meet with him in person and I drove 30 miles to meet him. He told me that a woman should not be running a Wal-Mart store and that I "needed to be home raising my daughter." He instructed me to step down "voluntarily" and to tell my employees at the morning meeting that having this new supercenter was too stressful for a single parent and that I just needed to take a break. In other words, it was not enough for Mr. Waters to just get rid of me. I believe that he also wanted me to send a strong signal to other women that the job was not right for any mother. He told me to step down voluntarily or he would have me out within four to six weeks – he would make my life "hell." I had no choice but to step down.

24. At the time, the Bluffton store – my store – was running in the black and would have made a profit in the first year, which is very unusual for a new store.

25. At that time that I was forced to step down, Mr. Waters had ten stores in his district and I was the only female manager in the district. A male, Bruce Hovey, was assigned as the new store manager of the Bluffton store. Mr. Hovey had previously worked for Mr. Waters and had been fired for altering payroll documents.

26. I sent a letter to the Regional Vice President Arthur Emmanuel complaining about my demotion. In the letter, I specifically raised the question of whether my treatment was a result of my gender. Attached hereto as Exhibit D is a true and correct copy of the letter that I wrote. I subsequently spoke by phone with Mr. Emmanuel and renewed my concerns that Mr. Waters was motivated to act because I am female. Mr. Emmanuel told me that there had not been any complaints about Mr. Waters' treatment of women, a statement that I knew to be false based upon my discussion with Divisional President Bill Fields in 1994.

27. I was transferred as a co-manager in the Columbia City, Indiana store in July 2000. My new district manager, Dave Tyson, told me that I had to be placed in a different district – a 120 mile daily commute – because John Waters refused to have me in his district. He told me to work hard and prove myself and I could again run a store.

28. Shortly thereafter, I received a call from the Regional Personnel Manager, Shantel Jones, who instructed me not to shop in the Bluffton Wal-Mart store. The associates there remained loyal to me and were not receptive to the man that Mr. Waters had selected to replace me. She felt that my presence in the store undermined his ability to succeed.

29. I assumed that, once I took my demotion and moved out of his district, District Manager Waters would leave me alone. I was wrong. Mr. Waters accused me of violating the anti-fraternization policy – he claimed that I had been involved with a subordinate whom I supervised. There was an investigation, ironically conducted by Jerome Rauch, the Bluffton co-manager hired to report to me but who was paid $15,000 more. I was cleared of any wrongdoing.

30. I knew at that point that I had to leave Wal-Mart. I resigned a few weeks later.

I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State of Indiana that the foregoing is true and correct. Executed this 29th day of March, 2003 at Indianapolis, Indiana.

NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

I, Tammy Howard, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I am a female and a current employee of Wal-Mart, Inc. I reside in Florida.

3. I was a vocational trainer of mentally handicapped persons before working for Wal-Mart. I decided to leave that field because I wanted a career with better promotional opportunities. My brother, Tracy Stephens, told me that he had begun working at Wal-Mart as a temporary unloader and in less than two years, he had been promoted to an Assistant Manager position. I wanted a job with advancement opportunities. When my brother told me that Wal-Mart was hiring employees for a new Su-percenter in Sylacauga, Alabama, I applied for a position. In January 1996, I began working at the Sylacauga Supercenter as a night stocker in the Sporting Goods Department. At that time, I aspired to be an Assistant Manager.

4. In July 1996, I saw a posting on a bulletin board in the Sylacauga store for a Zone Manager position in the Domestics and Crafts department. I applied for the Zone Manager position and was offered it without having an interview. No one else had applied for the position by signing the posting, as I had.

5. After approximately nine months of working as a Zone Manager in Domestics and Crafts, Store Manager Fred Twilley told me that I had not had enough training to do the work required of a Zone Manager, and he demoted me to Sporting Goods Department associate. I never received the training that I needed to do the Zone Manager job well. I was not aware, until I was demoted, that Mr. Twilley was not satisfied with my job performance. In fact, in my evaluation of November 1996, my performance was rated as "standard." (Attached hereto as Howard Exhibit A is a true and accurate copy of 1996 Associate Evaluation.)

6. In July 1998, I was transferred to a Milton, Florida store.

7. In October 1998, the Automotive Department Manager position opened. The position was not posted. I told Assistant Manager David Taylor that I was interested in the Automotive Department Manager position. After an interview, I was offered the position, which I accepted.

8. In September 1999, I asked Store Manager Jimmy Cross if I could have some Support Manager responsibilities in addition to my job as a Department Manager. I was interested in taking on these extra tasks so that I could learn more about Wal-Mart procedures. In addition, I took these responsibilities because I wanted to show Wal-Mart store management that I could handle multiple tasks and responsibilities so that I would be an attractive candidate for promotion in the future.

9. In September 1999, a job opening for Sporting Goods Department Manager was posted in the back of the store. In October 1999, Store Manager Cross told me that I did a very good job as an Automotive Department Manager and asked if I would be interested in the Sporting Goods Department Manager position. He also told me that he had been unable to find qualified candidates for the position. I accepted the position because my goal was to move into salaried management and I saw this as an opportunity to move up with Wal-Mart. When I assumed responsibility for the Sporting Goods Department in October 1999, I remained Automotive Department Manager and part time Support Manager.

10. The evaluation I received for the time that I was the Sporting Goods Department Manager, Automotive Department Manager, and part time Support Manager, indicated that my supervisor, Assistant Manager Ron Scott, was impressed by my performance. My evaluation rated my performance "exceed expectations." (Attached hereto as Howard Exhibit B is a true and accurate copy of 1999 Performance Appraisal.)

11. In June 2000, the Milton store was scheduled to move to a new location in Pace, Florida. The new Pace Supercenter was not going to have an Automotive Department. The Milton store's Automotive Department was going to be absorbed by the Pace Supercenter's Tire and Lube Express Department ("TLE"), a division that was supervised independently of the other departments in the store, and not by the Supercenter's Manager. In early 2000, I told TLE District Manager James Taylor that I was interested in the TLE Department Manager position in the new Pace Supercenter. I also mentioned my interest in that position to District Manager William Hart, who told me that he would put in a good word for me if I decided that I was interested in that position. When Store Manager Cross became aware that I was interested in taking a TLE Department Manager position, which is not a division that he supervises, he said to me "how dare you even think about going somewhere else." I told Mr. Cross that I wanted to eventually be placed in the Manager Training program. However, I had never seen a posting for this position and the handbook did not explain how to apply for the program. Store Manager Cross told me that if I remained Sporting Goods Department Manager for one more year, he would help me get into the Manager Training program. Based on his promise to promote me to the Manager Training program, I agreed to remain Sporting Goods Department Manager.

12. In June 2000, the Pace Supercenter opened and I began working there as Sporting Goods Department Manager

13. In approximately August 2000, I asked Store Manager Cross how employees who were interested in the Manager Training program got into it. He responded that there is no way to apply for the program. The Store Manager, explained Mr. Cross, submits a list of employees whom he or she believes should be in the program. The District Manager then decides who will be placed into the program. Store Manager Cross told me that I already knew 90% of what I needed to know to be ready for placement into the program. I understood that Store Manager Cross would soon submit my name to District Manager Hart.

14. In April 2001, nearly a year had passed since Store Manager Cross had agreed to help me get into the Manager Training program. I asked Mr. Cross if there was anything that I should do that would increase my chances of being promoted to the Manager Training program. He assured me that everything was fine and that it was now the District Manager's decision to select me for the program. I then called District Manager Hart to ask him if there was anything that I should do that would increase my chance of promotion to the Manager Training program. He told me that Store Manager Cross had not submitted my name to him and therefore I was not eligible for the promotion. He also stated that he would tell Store Manager Cross to talk to me about why my name had not been submitted.

15. The next day Co Manager Paul Tetanich told me that I did not qualify for the Manager Training program because I had hygiene problems and needed to have my teeth fixed. He added that I needed to work on my people skills and stop reminding store management that I wanted to be promoted. I had been expressing my interested in the program to store management because Mr. Cross and my co-workers, including Department Manager Virginia Canning, had advised me that to be promoted into the Manager Training program, you had to show interest in it.

16. Co Manager Paul Tetanich's remarks prompted me to use Wal-Mart's open door policy to call Regional Personnel Manager Larry Ezell. I told Mr. Ezell that I was being overlooked for promotion because of my teeth, which I believed was an improper basis for evaluating an employee. He responded that I was drawing at straws. He then suggested that my chances of being promoted might increase if I used Certs breath mints and mouthwash and read "The One Minute Manager" by Kenneth H. Blanchard. Mr. Ezell also suggested that I ask my District Manager and Store Manager for a list of measurable goals, which if met within a certain timeframe, would increase my chances of promotion.

17. A few days after talking to Mr. Ezell, I asked Store Manager Cross for a list of measurable goals. He refused, stating that hygiene was not measurable. Mr. Cross then stated that his decision not to promote me was not based on my gender, although I had not mentioned this motivation.

18. Later that week, District Manager Hart met with me in an office in the back of the store. He suggested that I visit a dentist and asked if I had dental insurance. I told him that I did have insurance but that it would not fully cover the cost of replacing my missing teeth. I had no extra money because I had three children to support and was only paid $10.81 an hour. I told Mr. Hart that I wanted to be judged on my qualifications and performance, not my teeth. He responded that he stood by Store Manager Cross' decision but would expect Mr. Cross to submit my name for the Manager Training program next year.

19. I observed that male employees were promoted faster than I was, with less management experience at Wal-Mart than I had, and with poor hygiene. Watkin Stott, a Night Receiving Clerk, was promoted to Support Manager in June 2001. I became aware that he was being given Assistant Manager training when he approached me with a career goal survey that I had only observed Manager Trainees answering. Mr. Stott was missing teeth, his hair never looked combed, and his clothes fit very loosely giving him an unkempt appearance. In addition, Mr. Stott told me that he had never held a management position during the seven years that he had worked for Wal-Mart before his promotion to Support Manager. In June 2001, Randy Byrd, a male department manager, was placed in the Manager Training Program after working in the store for just over a year. He had been promoted very quickly during his time at Wal-Mart. He was hired as a temporary setup person in April 2000. In August 2000, he was promoted to Pet Department Manager before being selected for the Manager Training program ten months later. When I was finally promoted to Manager Trainee, I had been with Wal-Mart for over 6 years.

20. In June 2001, store management called a meeting. In this meeting, Mr. Cross and the other managers said that they had just found out that Wal-Mart was being sued for gender discrimination. After the meeting, Store Manager Cross and Co Manager Tetanich told me that they would give me extra training like they were giving Mr. Stott.

21. In August 2001, District Manager Hart asked me if I was still interested in management training. I told him that I was. For the next three months, District Manager Hart repeatedly scheduled interviews with me and then cancelled them or failed to show up. When I saw him in the store, he would explain that he had other things to do and that he wanted to test my patience by making me wait to be interviewed. On October 17, 2001, Mr. Hart finally met with me. I was under the impression that he was going to interview me for the Management Training Program. In our meeting, he told me that he was placing me in the Management Training program without asking me any questions about my qualifications.

22. I began management training in February 2002 in a Pensacola, Florida Supercenter. District Manager Hart told me that I would be transferred to an Assistant Manager position in Brewton, Alabama upon completion of the program. In April 2002, I talked to Brian English, the Store Manager of the Brewton store. He told me that the position had been filled by James Odom, a man who was the son of an Assistant Manager in a Crestview, Florida store.

23. In May 2002, Candy Maddox, District Manager Hart's assistant, told me that Store Manager Cross had requested that I end my training early to fill an Assistant Manager position in the Pace Supercenter. In June 2002, I told District Manager Hart that I was concerned about returning to the Pace Supercenter to work for Store Manager Cross because I thought that he might be angry that I had used Wal-Mart's Open Door policy to complain about his failure to promote me. Mr. Hart assured me that I had nothing to worry about and that Store Manager Cross would not mistreat me because I had used the Open Door.

24. Since July 2002, I have been working as an Assistant Manager in the Pace Supercenter. I believe that Store Manager Cross has been retaliating against me because I used the open door to complain about him. For example, in March 2003, he questioned individually each of the cashiers that I supervise. When I asked Mr. Cross why he was questioning the cashiers, he responded that he had heard that the cashiers had low morale. Although I had never suggested that he was trying to find out negative information to use against me, he repeatedly stated that he was not trying to get anything on me. I have been working for Wal-Mart for seven years in four different locations and I have never seen a Store Manager, including Mr. Cross, question all of the hourly employees in a department.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Florida that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me April 23, 2003, at Milton, Florida.

I, Frances Jackson, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I am female. I have been employed at a Wal-Mart store in Aberdeen, North Carolina for fifteen years, from July 1987 through the present.

3. Wal-Mart hired me as a stock clerk and soon after transferred me to the Electronics Department as a Sales Associate. In 1989, I was promoted to Department Manager of Electronics. Since then, I have also worked in the following departments as a Department Manager: Sporting Goods, Photo, Pets, and Furniture.

4. In 1992, Wal Mart established the position of Zone Manager in my store. The Zone Manager position was an hourly position that took the place of the existing Department Manager positions. I signed up to interview for this position. Instead of formally interviewing me, Assistant Manager Leroy Townsend spoke with me briefly on the floor about the position. Mr. Townsend questioned my ability to do the job because of my husband's health, since he had recently had a heart attack. Although I was already a Department Manager, I was not selected for the Zone Manager position. I learned from Roberta Helin, a Personnel Manager, that Mr. Townsend refused to promote me because of my husband's health. A man named Roger (last name unknown) received the position of Zone Manager for Electronics. Because of the restructuring of positions, I was demoted to a stock clerk until additional Zone Manager openings became available.

5. In 1998, I learned that Julius Ford, a male Sporting Goods Department Manager who I had trained, had received a $3.00 an hour merit increase. I learned this from Tonya Spencer, who had been working in the cash office at the time and had access to payroll information. I spoke with Store Manager Jay Gomez to find out if this was true, and he neither confirmed nor denied it. I then spoke with District Manager David Norman and he told me he would investigate the matter. The next day when I returned to work, I was given a $1.00 an hour merit increase. All of my other merit increases, before and after this occurrence, were increases of $0.50 - $0.75 an hour.

6. In approximately 1996, I began talking to management about my interest in the Management Training program. I expressed my interest to Store Manager Gomez, who told me there were no openings. Two weeks after my conversation with Mr. Gomez, a man who worked in store security named Al (last name unknown) was selected for the program. Mr. Gomez did not tell me any additional information regarding the Management Training Program.

7. In approximately 1998, I learned that Jamie Jenkins, a male employee who had worked for Wal-Mart as a cart pusher and lay-away runner for one year, had been promoted to Assistant Manager. The Assistant Manager position was not posted and I had no opportunity to apply for the position. Jamie was promoted over the weekend. I asked my Store Manager, John Furner, why a cart pusher and lay-away runner was made Assistant Manager ahead of more qualified associates. He responded by telling me that Mr. Jenkins was the only one qualified for the job and that he needed an Assistant Manager that same day.

8. In 1999, I spoke with my Assistant Manager, Portia Conway, about the Management Training Program. She encouraged me pursue this goal. I later asked Store Manager Brian Barnett about the possibility of entering the Management Training program and staying in the Aberdeen store. Mr. Barnett told me that the option for staying in the store while undergoing training no longer existed as it had for Jamie Jenkins and Al (last name unknown).

9. In 2000, I spoke with my District Manager, Terry Branton (male), about my interest in entering the Management Training Program. Mr. Branton informed me that in order to participate, I would have to relocate to Cheraw, South Carolina. The relocation policy for Management Training and other management positions has hindered my ability to advance within the Company. Because I am raising my grandchildren and caring for my husband, it is extremely difficult for me to relocate. I am interested in management opportunities but am unable to pursue those that require relocation due to my family situation. I believe the policy is discriminatory toward women because men in my store were allowed to train for management without having to relocate.

10. At my store, the male managers are in a clique. They golf together and socialize in the store during breaks. In contrast, when I began having lunch with Co-Manager Gloria Williams, District Manager Branton told me I was not allowed to socialize with her because it violates the Company's fraternization policy.

11. Within the past year I observed Josh (last name unknown), a male sales associate who only worked for Wal-Mart for one year, get promoted to first to Department Manager and then to Support Manager. Josh was pre-selected for the Support Manager position: he was asked to perform the duties of a Support Manager even before anyone was interviewed. I have worked for Wal-Mart for 15 years and have been unable to advance at this rate because of my managers' discriminatory bias against women.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and of North Carolina that the foregoing is true and correct. I signed this on the of April, 2003 in North Carolina.

I, Joanne Jaso, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I have been employed by Wal-Mart Inc. in California since April 1996. I am female.

3. When I began working for Wal-Mart, my goal was to eventually become an Assistant Manager.

4. I am a single mother. When I first began working for Wal-Mart, I made approximately $11,220 per year and, seven years later, I now make approximately $25,000 per year. It has been very difficult to support my two children on the salary I make working for Wal-Mart. In February 2001, I could no longer support my family on my salary so I took a second full-time job. This second job provided insurance for my family, as I could not afford Wal-Mart's health insurance and had been uninsured since I began working for Wal-Mart in 1996. In February 2002, I was diagnosed with stress-related illnesses and was forced to quit the second job.

5. From 1998 to 2001, I worked every weekend even though I was an hourly associate. I also worked overnights for that entire period. I thought that Wal-Mart would recognize my commitment to the job if I worked these hours.

6. I have observed a great amount of gender segregation in jobs at the two Wal-Mart stores I have worked in. Women tend to work in Cosmetics and Health and Beauty Aids. The Garden Center employees are almost exclusively male with the exception of the cashiers. In the store where I currently work in Bakersfield, California there are only two women that hold management positions above support manager: Assistant Manager Tina Hernandez, and Assistant Manager Davlin Barrera. Assistant Managers Hernandez and Barrera both transferred into the store. I have never seen a female store manager.

7. I was hired by Wal-Mart as an overnight stocker in a Bakersfield, California store. In approximately December 1996, I transferred to a different Wal-Mart store in Bakersfield, California and took a position as a processor. In February 1997, I became a cashier.

8. In approximately September 1997, Customer Service Manager Carly Griswold asked me if I wanted her position because she was stepping down. The position was not posted and I did not apply for it. I took the position and held it for three years until 2001. In this position, I supervised cashiers and was responsible for the front end of the store. I was never disciplined and my performance evaluations were always either 'meets expectations' or 'exceeds expectations.' (Attached hereto is a true and accurate copy of 1999 Performance Evaluation as Jaso Exhibit A). I received several merit raises. In April 2000 I was recognized for "above and beyond performance." The commendation stated: "[Joanne] displayed ownership in her area with great leadership." (Attached hereto is a true and accurate copy of Associate's Commendation Form as Jaso Exhibit B).

9. I have applied for at least ten department manager and support manager positions from 1998 to 2002. Store Manager Oscar Cuevas told us in employee meetings that everyone who applies for these positions would be interviewed, yet I have been interviewed for only four or five of these positions.

10. In approximately 1998, I applied for an Electronics Department Manager position. Store Manager Cuevas told me that he already had two men selected for the position because the department carries a lot of responsibility and he did not think I could handle it. He added that the position was a man's job and requires a lot of heavy lifting.

11. In approximately 1998, I applied for a support manager position. I was not interviewed. A man, Charles Bristow, was selected for the position. I asked Store Manager Cuevas why I was not considered for the position. He replied that I did not have enough merchandizing experience to be a Department Manager or Support Manager. At this time I had been working in the front end for about one year and I believed that I had gained considerable merchandizing experience. Store Manager Cuevas also told me that to be a Support Manager, you had to first be a Department Manager. Before his promotion to Support Manager, Charles Bristow had been a Receiving Manager for approximately one month. Receiving Manager is not a Department Manager position.

12. In approximately 1998, I went on the pipeline, Wal-Mart's intranet, looking for different opportunities that Wal-Mart offered. I saw reference to a Manager Training program. I had never seen a posting for a manager training position. I told Store Manager Cuevas that I was interested in the Manager Training program. He responded that I did not have enough merchandizing experience.

13. In approximately 1998, I applied for a Department Manager of Furniture position. I was not interviewed for that position. It was given to a male cashier that I had supervised.

14. In approximately May 2001, I applied for a support manager position. Robert Morning, who had worked for Wal-Mart as a Receiving Manager for only a few months, was promoted to Support Manager without first holding a department manager position.

15. In approximately 2002, I applied for a furniture department manager position. Several times I asked Assistant Manager Craig Beemer when I would be interviewed. He repeatedly responded that I would be interviewed soon. I was never interviewed for the position and when I asked Assistant Manager Beemer why, he responded that he had based his decision on a previous interview. I had not been interviewed in approximately three years.

17. In November 2002, after six years of experience with Wal-Mart, I was finally promoted to Department Manager of Boys Wear. This is an hourly position. I have no confidence that I will ever reach my goal of becoming Assistant Manager.

18. In early 2003, I saw that for the first time in my six years at Wal-Mart, Wal-Mart was offering an opportunity to apply for manager training. However, I was on medical leave for the seven days during which an application could be made. I missed my opportunity and I have not been told if or when Wal-Mart will accept applications for the Manager Training program again. I remain interested in joining the Manager Training program at Wal-Mart and if given the opportunity would readily enter a training program.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of California that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 17th, 2003, at Kern County.

JOANNE JASO, DECLARANT

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, CLEO PAGE, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, DEBORAH GUNTER, KAREN WILLIAMSON AND EDITH ARANA, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiff, vs. WAL-MART STORES, INC., Defendant	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF JENNIFER JOHNSON IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Jennifer Johnson, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. Prior to being hired by Wal-Mart in 1986, I graduated high school, completed two years of college, and worked for five years in a variety of retail stores as a sales associate and cashier. I am a female.

3. I was initially hired by Wal-Mart as a cashier in the Ormond Beach, FL store, but after a few months transferred to a sales associate position. A few months later I transferred to the camera/electronics department because I had previously worked in the camera department for one of my previous employers.

4. During the course of my fifteen year career with Wal-Mart, I was promoted to Department Manager, Support Manager, Assistant Manager and ultimately Co-Manager. However, at each level I had to wait much longer to be promoted than similarly qualified men, as described below.

5. I worked in the Ormond Beach, Cooper City, St. Augustine, Eustis, Palm Coast and Melbourne stores in Florida. In each store that I worked in, the policies for compensation, promotion and other personnel matters were the same. I saw the written policies posted at each store, and the substance was the same in each location I worked.

6. In 1988 or 1989 the Department Manager for cameras/electronics in the Ormond Beach store, a woman named Terri, was leaving, and told me that she had recommended me for the Department Manager position. However, she also told me that the store management had decided to give the job to a male employee, Keith, who had been employed at Wal-Mart less time than me. After Keith died in an accident, I was then promoted to Department Manager.

7. In approximately 1989 or 1990 they had promoted a male from Support Manager to Assistant Manager. This left the Support Manager position open. This position was not posted and I asked Store Manager Guy Pshek to make me a Support Manager. The Support Manager job is the highest level hourly position, and, based on my observation, working as a Support Manager would increase my chances of being promoted to Assistant Manager, which was my goal. I was denied this promotion with the excuse that it was because I managed a department that required me to be available for customer service. However, the position I sought was given to Scott Schwalback, who also managed a department, small appliances, where the manager had to be available for customer service. After Mr. Schwalback had been promoted, I asked Mr. Pshek about the position again, pointing out that Mr. Schwalback had been permitted to be a Support Manager while working in a service department. I was finally promoted, again later than I should have been and after similarly qualified men.

8. In 1991, Mr. Pshek was promoted to District Manager in a different district. He told me that if I was willing to relocate to a store in his district, that he would promote me to Assistant Manager, a position that I had sought for some time. I agreed, although I knew that Scott Schwalback, Mark Melatesta, and a male named Rick had been promoted to Assistant Manager without having to switch districts. I was transferred to the Eustis, Florida store as an hourly employee. I worked in that store as a Department Manager for approximately five months without receiving the promotion to Assistant Manager that Mr. Pshek had promised. Finally, I spoke with Bob Hart, Regional Vice President, about the situation, and he told me I had to wait another three to fourth months to be promoted to Assistant Manager. I was finally promoted in February 1992. Both Scott Schwalback and Rick (a Department Manager in Furniture) became Department Managers after I had, since I had worked for Wal-Mart for longer, but they were both promoted to Assistant Manager positions before I was. Thus, I worked much longer as a Department Manager before being promoted to Assistant Manager than similarly qualified men had.

9. When I was promoted to Assistant Manager I relocated to Ft. Lauderdale, FL to work in store 1845 in Cooper City, FL.

10. While I was an Assistant Manager I regularly asked Dan Erwin, Store Manager, and later, Brad Bower, Store Manager after Mr. Erwin, about promotion to Co-Manager. Mr. Bower referred me to Steve Leake, District Manager.

11. In 1996 I was told by Anne Morrow, Co-Manager, that if I made a lateral move within the store to the Assistant Manager responsible for the front end, and was able to successfully resolve some problems there, that I would be promoted to Co-Manager. I agreed, and successfully fixed the problems, but was not promoted. Instead I was moved laterally through softlines, store set ups, and then night manager.

12. I was told by District Manager Steve Leake that doing store set ups, which meant working to set up a newly built store instead of working in my regularly assigned store, would lead to a promotion to Co-Manager. When I completed the store set up, which required that a commute of 100 miles round trip for six weeks, I asked Mr. Leake about the promotion to Co-Manager. Mr. Leake said he wanted to place me in a position on the District staff instead. When I said that I really wanted a Co-Manager position, not a lateral move to a staff job, Mr. Leake told my Store Manager, who was also present during this conversation, to "do whatever you want with her." I was then assigned to the night shift, which is the least popular. Although Co-Manager positions were not posted, I heard, through word of mouth, of at least one vacancy for Co-Manager, in the Port Orange store, during the time that I was seeking promotion to Co-Manager. I was denied that position.

13. After nine months on the night shift, I spoke to Regional Vice President Arthur Emmanuel in June 1998. Mr. Emmanuel met with me, District Manager Leake and Store Manager Brad Bower. Mr. Emmanuel asked Mr. Leake and Mr. Bower if I was ready for promotion to Co-Manager, and they acknowledged that I was. In July 1998 I was promoted to Co-Manager in the St. Augustine store.

14. All Co-Managers are supposed to be paid the same base salary. However, while I was a co-manager in the St. Augustine store with a salary of $39,254.22, I learned that Mr. Greg Antl, a co-manager in the same store, was being paid a few thousand dollars more.

15. Shortly after I was promoted to Co-Manager, one of the male Assistant Managers who reported to me was disrespectful and avoided doing work I assigned him. I spoke to my Store Manager Kevin Robinson about it. He told me that the man was upset that I had been promoted instead of him, and said "you have two strikes against you: 1) you're a woman; 2) you're black."

16. While I was a Assistant Manager at the Cooper City, Fl, store I recommended three people for promotion to Assistant Manager in training positions, all during the same time period. Two individuals I recommended were men, Clive Provost-Heron and Adrian, and they were promoted immediately. The third person I recommended for promotion was a woman, Pat, (I think her last name was Jennings), and she was not promoted until a year later.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Florida that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on March 26th 2003, at Daytona Beach, Florida.

I, Katheryn Johnson, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I am female, and I am twenty-five years of age.

3. I was hired at Wal-Mart Store #723 in Troy, Alabama, on March 23, 1999. At the time, I was twenty-one years of age and attending Troy State University in Troy, Alabama, studying for my Bachelor of Science degree in Sports Management with a minor in Business Administration. I resigned when it became apparent that Wal-Mart would not permit me to receive management training because I am a woman.

4. I was initially hired as a part-time sales associate (hourly employee) in the Infants and Little Girls Department of the Troy, Alabama, Wal-Mart Store, and worked until October 13, 1999, when I had to stop working because of scheduling conflicts with my position as a student worker (and, later, intern) with Troy State University, and because of inefficient scheduling within the store.

5. When my scheduling conflicts were resolved, I was rehired at Wal-Mart Store #723 on April 3, 2000, part-time as an hourly associate. I went full-time in January of 2001 and ultimately resigned on April 13, 2001, because of gender discrimination by the District Manager, James Pike.

6. During the Fall of 2000, the new store manager, Mr. Bobby Brackenridge, asked me if I was interested in a course Wal-Mart had for college students who wanted to become a Wal-Mart manager. I told him I was not eligible because I would soon graduate. However, several days later, I told him I was interested in applying for the management training program. Mr. Brackenridge told me to submit an application with a resume, which I did. He did not inform me that I first needed to perform other jobs within the store.

7. Also, in approximately September of 2000, I expressed to Ms. Jina Jordan, the Store Co-Manager who had approximately fifteen years of employment with Wal-Mart, my interest in the Wal-Mart Assistant Manager Training Program and in working my way up through management in Wal-Mart in order to make my employment with Wal-Mart a career. Ms. Jordan told me that she would support my promotion in any way she could.

8. I had always performed my job as an associate well and had received numerous compliments on my job performance from management, including Mr. Brackenridge. I was never disciplined, and the two performance evaluations I received were "exceeds expectations."

9. I graduated from Troy State University in December of 2000, and in approximately February of 2001, submitted an application for promotion to the Assistant Manager Training Program, with a cover letter and a resume, and Mr. Brackenridge and Ms. Jennifer Keil, the assistant manager who was my supervisor, gave me good references.

10. Assistant Manager Trainee positions were never posted at the store. When I asked Mr. Brackenridge about openings, he indicated that there were openings for Assistant Manager Trainee in three nearby stores but that the District Manager, Mr. James Pike, was "in charge of who goes."

11. Approximately two weeks after I had submitted my application to Mr. Brackenridge, I approached Mr. Brackenridge and asked him if he had given Mr. Pike my application. He replied, "No", and when I asked him why not, he said that Mr. Pike was coming to the store that week and that he would give my application to him at that time.

12. When Mr. Pike came into the store the following week, I encountered him in the store personnel office with Mr. Brackenridge and held out my hand to shake his hand, saying, "Hello, my name is Katheryn Johnson. I have applied for the Wal-Mart training program. Have you received my application?" Mr. Pike saw me extend my hand but did not shake it. He only said, "Oh, it [my application] is in a file over there somewhere. Bobby [Brackenridge] has it for me, don't you, Bobby?"

13. For the next six weeks, I heard absolutely nothing from Mr. Pike. During that time, I spoke with Mr. Brackenridge and told him that I was going to quit because there had been no response to my application, and I felt that there was no reason for me to stay with Wal-Mart. I had student loans that I needed to pay, and I needed to find a job where I could start a career and make enough money to support myself and my family. Mr. Brackenridge urged me not to quit and told me that "they [Wal-Mart]" needed Assistant Managers in the Enterprise, Alabama, store and that the Supercenter in Montgomery, Alabama, also needed Assistant Managers.

14. When Mr. Pike finally came into the store on March 16, 2001, I approached him in the manager's office and asked him if he had an opportunity to look over my application. He responded by saying, "Naw, Shug, I sure haven't." I then said, "When do you think you'll have an opportunity to look it over?" He replied, "I need one month; give me one month." I then said, "One month is all I'm going to give." Mr. Brackenridge was present in the room during this conversation, and when Mr. Pike asked me to give him another month, instead of speaking up and urging Mr. Pike to consider my application, Mr. Brackenridge only nodded his head at me to indicate that I should agree with Mr. Pike's request for an extension. It was obvious to me that Mr. Brackenridge, who had verbally supported my application, was not willing to actually do anything to support my application.

15. That same day, I met with Ms. Jordan and told her my concerns about being denied the opportunity to become an assistant manager trainee. I told her that I had heard that Mr. Pike didn't hire women, and Ms. Jordan told me, "Just between you and I, some people tend to think he [James Pike] doesn't like to put women into the training program; I believe that, as well." When I asked her what I should do, she told me, "Give him [Mr. Pike] a month, and then if you leave, I will understand."

16. Twenty-seven days passed with no word from Mr. Pike, and he again appeared in the store on April 13, 2001. I approached him and said to him, "I'd like to speak with you before you leave," so I could find out if I was going to be accepted into the management training program. He nodded, "Yes", indicating that he would speak with me before he left the store. However, Mr. Pike left the store that day without making any attempt whatsoever to speak with me.

17. I then wrote a letter of resignation and gave it to Ms. Nancy Hussey, the Assistant to the Personnel Manager, and turned in my badge and smock.

18. I later dialed 1-800-WAL-MART, the telephone number that we had been told to use if we were having problems at the store. I spoke to a young woman in the Ethics Department and related everything that had happened in detail. She indicated to me, "We'll be getting back to you in three days."

19. Three days passed, and I heard nothing from Wal-Mart. I again dialed 1-800-WAL-MART and spoke with a different young woman in the Ethics Department who indicated that she would have someone get in touch with me. At the end of April or the beginning of May, 2001, I finally received a call from the Regional Personnel Manager, Mr. Larry Ezell. I related to him all of the details of what had happened. He told me that I probably didn't get the job because I wouldn't relocate out-of-state. I told him that Mr. Brackenridge had told me I didn't have to relocate out-of-state until I completed my training. He concluded the conversation by telling me, "If you don't have any hard feelings toward the company, then you can reapply when you're available to move."

20. At the time I resigned my employment with Wal-Mart, I was making $5.70 per hour after two years of employment as a sales associate. If I would have become an Assistant Manager, I would have started with a salary of approximately $31,000.00 per year plus bonuses based upon the store's net profit. Instead, because of the gender discrimination directed toward me, I was unable to find a job until June 5, 2001, and then working as an administrative assistant for O.S.I. Outsourcing Solutions, Inc., in Montgomery, Alabama, earning only $9.50 per hour, or approximately $19,500.00 per year.

21. I subsequently filed a charge of discrimination with the EEOC in Montgomery, Alabama, alleging gender discrimination by Wal-Mart.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and the State of Alabama, that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 3, 2003, at Hartselle, Alabama.

I, Lucretia Johnson, declare:

1. I am a woman and a current Sam's Club employee.

2. I began working at the Sam's Club in Concord, California in August 1993. Although I consistently expressed interest in being promoted into management, I was not offered a salaried management position until June 2002, a year after this lawsuit was filed and almost nine years after I began working for Sam's Club. At that time, I was promoted to Front End Area Manager, the position I currently hold.

3. Between 1993 and my promotion to Front End Area Manager in June 2002, I held the following positions: Cashier, Check Out Supervisor, Membership Desk Employee, Outside Sales, Marketing and Membership Team Leader, and Advantage Coordinator. I have always worked in the areas of the store known as "operations" and the "front end". I have never been offered a position in another area of the store, such as receiving or the merchandise areas.

4. In February 1994, I received my six-month evaluation. I wrote on the evaluation that my career goal was "to learn more about the company where it would benefit me to move up in the company. I would like to learn each department to have the knowledge to benefit myself and grow with the company." A true and correct copy of that evaluation is attached hereto as Exhibit A.

5. In July 1994, I received my first annual evaluation. I wrote on the evaluation that I "would like to be trained to advance within our company" and my goal "is to learn as much as I can about the warehouse business to guide me to a management position." A true and correct copy of that evaluation is attached hereto as Exhibit B.

6. In July 1995, I received my second annual evaluation. In the section entitled "career goals," I wrote that I wanted "to be able to grow within the company." A true and correct copy of that evaluation is attached hereto as Exhibit C.

7. In July 1997, I received my fourth annual evaluation. I wrote on the evaluation that my career goal "is to grow within the company as a lead person and to develop my skill." A true and correct copy of that evaluation is attached hereto as Exhibit D.

8. In July 1998, I received my fifth annual evaluation. In the section entitled career goals, my supervisor, Angela Putnam wrote, "Lucretia would like to master her new current position and then work her way to the next level which is management." A true and correct copy of that evaluation is attached hereto as Exhibit E.

9. In September 2000, I received my seventh annual evaluation. I wrote on the evaluation that I wanted to "enroll in the MIT program for management" and "continue to develop skills that would help me to become an operation manager." A true and correct copy of that evaluation is attached hereto as Exhibit F.

10. In July 2001, I received my eighth annual evaluation. I wrote on the evaluation that I wanted to "develop my skills and job knowledge that would lead me in a management position." A true and correct copy of that evaluation is attached hereto as Exhibit G.

11. Despite my repeated expression of interest in promotion into management, I was never told how I could apply for the Management Training Program. I never saw or heard about any applications. On one occasion, General Manager George Cunningham told me that I would never be promoted into management, but did not tell me why. On other occasions, my managers told me that I needed to get more experience, but did not tell me what experience I needed or give me a timeline. It was very discouraging to continually express interest in a management position, but not get promoted for so many years.

12. While I was working at the Membership Desk, my supervisor was a woman named Angela Putnam. Ms. Putnam promoted me to the position of Marketing and Membership Team Leader. Ms. Putnam was a very good supervisor and mentor who encouraged me in my goal of getting promoted. Ms. Putnam referred to Sam's Club as a "boy's club" and told me that, as a woman, she had to fight to get promoted and that I would, too. Ms. Putnam no longer works at the Concord Sam's Club. Apart from Ms. Putnam, I have not received encouragement and mentorship from my supervisors.

13. In June 2002, I was promoted to the position of Front End Area Manager. The position became open when the Front End Area Manager Neville Boston left the Club. I told General Manager Alan Oshier that I was interested in the position. About three or four months after Mr. Boston left, Mr. Oshier told me that I had been selected for the position. I had not applied for the position or been interviewed for the position. I believe that I was promoted only because this lawsuit was filed and Sam's Club wanted to increase the number of women in management at the Concord store.

14. In January 2003, there was a notice posted in the store, soliciting interest in the Management Training Program. I told Director of Operations Ross LaDeaux that I was interested in the Management Training Program. Mr. LaDeaux told me that I did not have to sign up on the posting because he already knew that I was interested and I was being considered. I have not been interviewed or heard anything further.

15. I do not know how long I must work as a Front End Area Manager or whether I have to become Receiving Area Manager in order to get promoted into the Management Training Program. When the Receiving Area Manager position opened up a few months ago, I told General Manager Alan Oshier that I was interested in the position. Mr. Oshier told me that I needed to spend more time as Front End Area Manager. I later spoke to General Manager Theresa Hagensen about what I had to do to get promoted into the Management Training Program. Ms. Hagensen suggested that I transfer to the Receiving Area Manager position. When I received my annual evaluation in February 2003, I asked Director of Operations Russ LaDeaux whether I had to work as Receiving Area Manager in order to be promoted. Mr. LaDeaux told me that I can be promoted without being Receiving Area Manager.

16. I learned that Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. stated, in response to an Interrogatory propounded in this case, that General Manager Alan Oshier and Assistant Manager Brian Lothamer do not believe that I am qualified for the Management Training Program because I have poor people skills. I find that ironic because Mr. Lothamer and Mr. Oshier have poor people skills, but have been allowed to advance into management. When I worked under the supervision of Mr. Lothamer, he routinely yelled at me, belittled me, and put me down in front of other employees. I had similar experiences with Mr. Oshier. Mr. Oshier told me that he was taking anger management classes and thanked me for praying for him.

17. I have worked under class member declarant Nancy Hom's supervision. I never experienced any difficulties working with Ms. Hom. I have worked with Named Plaintiff Christine Kwapnoski. I never had any difficulty working with Ms. Kwapnoski.

18. Neither Mr. Lothamer, nor Mr. Oshier, nor any other Sam's Club manager has ever told me that I am ineligible to advance beyond the position of Front End Area Manager because of my supposed problems with people skills.

19. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of California that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 16, (month, day), 2003, at San Francisco, CA (city, state).

I, Laverne Jones, declare:

1. I began working at Wal-Mart in November 1977, as a Sales Clerk in the Pontotoc, Mississippi, Wal-Mart. From the beginning of my career, I communicated to Wal-Mart management that I was interested in advancement within the company and noted so on many of my annual evaluations under "career goals." I was promoted to Department Manager in July 1978, and remained a Department Manager throughout my career. Because I am a woman, Wal-Mart did not permit me to advance past Department Management for twenty-five (25) years.

2. My job performance was rated as "above standard" or "exceeds expectations" on nearly every annual evaluation that I received in my twenty-five

(25) years at Wal-Mart. I never received a rating less than "standard" or "meets expectations." The last "standard" rating I received was over ten years ago, in 1991.

3. During my career at Wal-Mart, I never received a written or verbal "coaching," nor was ever I ever disciplined in any form by management. Instead, I was consistently praised in my evaluations for my productivity, initiative, judgment, job knowledge, ability to work with others, appearance and attendance. For example, in September 2002, I received my last performance appraisal from my supervisor, David LeSueur. In 25 of 28 categories, I received an "exceeds expectations" rating. My rating was "meets expectations" for the other three categories. See Associate Evaluation Form, Dated 9/10/02, a true and correct copy attached hereto as Exhibit A. In 2002, I was never absent, never late for work and remained 100% current on all of my Computer Based Learning modules ("CBLs"). In fact, in twenty-five (25) years, I missed work only twice: in 1986 when I gave birth to my son and in 1994 when I had lung surgery.

4. I tried to enter the Management Training Program every year for the first fifteen years of my employment and was repeatedly discouraged by management. My desire for advancement with Wal-Mart is documented by my comments in my annual appraisals and conversations with Wal-Mart management. For example, in 1983, I wrote on my evaluation that my career goal was "to move up in the company, such as the asst. mgt." See Associate Evaluation Form, Dated 10/6/83, a true and correct copy attached hereto as Exhibit B. In 1985, I wrote that I "would like to advance with [the] company and be considered for promotions whenever available," and if "anything [is] available in office or asst. mgmt., I would like to be considered . . . ." See Associate Evaluation Form, Dated 6/7/85 and Associate Evaluation Form, Dated 11/1/85, true and correct copies attached hereto as Exhibits C and D.

5. I spoke with many members of Wal-Mart management about my interest in promotion over the course of my 25 years with the company. The following are typical examples of how my requests for placement in the Management Training Program were received by Wal-Mart management throughout my career:

a. In 1986, District Manager Jim Crowe denied my requests to be placed into the Management Training Program.

b. William "Bill" Wulfers, a former Regional Vice President, told me in 1992 that I did not want to be in management because Assistant Managers are required to move around the country, and I did not want to relocate. However, I told Mr. Wulfers that I was willing to relocate at that time in order to become an Assistant Manager. Furthermore, I was aware of many male trainees who stayed at my store, because my store was known as a "training" store for management, or transferred to stores in the immediate area that were within driving distance. For example, Brad Sullivan, a male who entered the Management Training Program in 1990, was trained at my store, then moved to another location in the area, within driving distance of Pontotoc.

6. Despite my exemplary work history and requests for promotion, less experienced men were continuously chosen for the Management Training Program over me. Adam Worthham worked at my store for less than one year before becoming Department Manager and after serving just one year in that position, Mr. Worthham joined the Management Training Program in 2001. Mr. Worthham trained in a store within driving distance from Pontotoc, in West Point, Mississippi.

7. In November 2002, Coy Tutor, a male employee who had only five years of experience in my store, was asked to enter the Management Training Program, but declined. At that time, I asked Sammy Sappington, a District Manager who, like me, began working at Wal-Mart in 1977, if I could get into the Management Training Program. District Manager Sappington told me that I did not want to go into management because I had the best job in the store and that I did not want anything else. He also told me that there were only a handful of promotable people in the store. When I asked why Mr. Tutor could join the program, Mr. Sappington replied, "He's a man, he doesn't have a family." That was his only explanation for why Mr. Tutor was promotable, yet I was not.

8. In June 1997, I was part of a group of female Wal-Mart employees, including Brenda Lipsey and Bonnie Ware, who used the "open door" policy by contacting the Home Office with our concerns and complaints of sexual and racial discrimination. Part of our complaint was the fact that men were almost always put on "support teams," where they earned more money through a shift differential of one dollar more per hour, while women were often overlooked for this position. Cheryl Ford, from Wal-Mart personnel, came from the Home Office in Bentonville, Arkansas, to talk to us. She said, "Don't bother using your quarter to call us. I can fire you, without taking any steps, for using the open door." My experience with Ms. Ford made me reluctant to use the "open door" policy because of the fear of retaliation and further confirmed for me that Wal-Mart was not concerned about discrimination in its stores.

9. After twenty-five years of employment at Wal-Mart, I received only one promotion, and that was six months after I started working at Wal-Mart.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Mississippi that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 4, 2003, in the City of Pontotoc, State of Mississippi.

I, Sheila Joyce, declare:

1. I am a 29 year old female who lives in Salisbury, North Carolina. I began working at Wal-Mart a little over two years ago, in February 2001. I work at the Concord, North Carolina Wal-Mart Supercenter, store # 1027.

2. I feel that Wal-Mart has discriminated against me based on my gender because I am aware that Wal-Mart has paid a male employee more money than me for doing the same work.

3. I began working at Wal-Mart as an overnight stocker in the paper goods and chemicals department, which is on the general merchandise side of the Supercenter. I was evaluated on the first 90 days of performance as an overnight stocker in May 2001. I was rated as "exceeds expectations," the highest possible rating.

4. In November 2001, Earl Easley, a stocker supervisor, requested that I transfer to the grocery department. I said that I would transfer, but because I understood that Wal-Mart paid grocery department stockers more than general merchandise stockers, I first asked co-manager Bill Williams I would get a raise for transferring. Mr. Williams said that I would get a raise for transferring to the grocery department.

5. Once I got to the grocery department, I did not receive my transfer raise. My pay stayed the same, $8.40 per hour. Meanwhile, within days of my move to the grocery department, Wal-Mart hired a new male stocker for the grocery department, Jerry Hamilton. Jerry Hamilton told me personally that he was hired at a rate of 9.00 per hour. About that time, Wal-Mart also hired Richard Gieck, another male grocery department stocker, who also started at a rate of 9.00 per hour. Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Gieck and I worked the same shift in the grocery department, the overnight shift.

6. When I was hired, I was hired at $8.00 per hour. After 10 months of employment with Wal-Mart and after receiving my 90-day pay increase I was making $8.40 per hour. But there I was, working in the grocery department with two new males who were making .60 cents more per hour than me from the moment they set foot in Wal-Mart. When I found out Mr. Hamilton was making more money than me, for doing the same job, I was upset. It certainly did not seem right. I felt like I could not complain about his pay rate, because Wal-Mart has a strict policy forbidding employees from speaking about pay. Instead, I persisted in trying to get my transfer raise.

7. First, I complained to co-manager Mr. Williams that I should be making more money in the grocery department and requested a transfer raise again. Mr. Williams, who originally told me I would get a raise if I transferred, now told me he could not give me a raise because I was no longer in his section of the store.

8. In January 2002, after two months in the grocery department, I received my first annual performance evaluation. Just like on my 90 day performance evaluation, I was rated as "exceeds expectations," the highest possible rating.

9. In February 2002 I was given a .35 cent merit raise for my performance. But I still did not receive my transfer raise, and at this point I was still making less money than Mr. Gieck and Mr. Hamilton who had only been with Wal-Mart for three months.

10. By March 2002, I took my complaints to Co-Manager Neil White, who was the co-manager over the grocery department. Mr. White that he would check to see if it was policy to give associate's a transfer raise when moving from general merchandise to grocery. Mr. White later told me that it was not standard policy to receive a transfer raise. He did not give me the raise.

11. Within a few days of Mr. White's decision not to make my pay at least comparable with the new, less experienced stockers in the grocery department, I called the home office. I talked to someone in the personnel office. I told them that I believed Wal-Mart was discriminating against me in my rate of pay because I was female.

12. In April 2002, after having to fight for 5 months, Store Manager Ken Garner, met with me and told me he was going to give me the .50 cent transfer raise. The raise was put into effect at that time. However to this day, I have never received back pay for the five months I worked in the grocery department with men who were hired at a higher rate than me.

13. Four months after I complained to the home office about gender discrimination, I applied for a transfer to a new Wal-Mart opening in Salisbury, North Carolina. A co-manager of the new store, Paul Renn, met with me and told me I had the job. When I later contacted Mr. Renn to find out when I would make the transfer, Mr. Renn pretended like we never met and that he had not given me the job. I did not get the transfer.

14. In January 2003, I saw a posting on the time clock that stated Wal-Mart was accepting applications from employees for the Management Training Program. I met all of the qualifications to apply, so the next night I applied for a management trainee position over the pipeline, Wal-Mart's computerized communication system.

15. I felt like the opportunity to apply over the pipeline for a management trainee position was unique. To my knowledge, since I had been working at the Concord Wal-Mart, management trainee positions had never been posted. In fact, I was never given any information or guidance on how to gain entrance into the Management Training Program before the January 2003 opportunity.

16. Approximately 6 weeks after submitting my application for a management trainee position I still had not gotten a response from Wal-Mart. I saw other employees get interviewed, but I was not interviewed. Then the store manager, Ken Garner, called me into his office and told me that I was not going to get interviewed. He said that too many people had applied and Wal-Mart could not interview all of them. I asked Mr. Garner who decides who would be interviewed out of the applicants. Mr. Garner told me that the home office made the decision.

17. Approximately a week later, on March 11, 2003, I called the home office to find out more information about how to get an interview for the trainee positions. I asked the home office who makes the decisions regarding which employees are interviewed for a position. The home office told me that the store manager, together with the district manager, made those decisions.

18. Neither the home office nor the store manager told me any steps I could take in order to receive an interview.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of North Carolina that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on 4/2/03, 2003, at Salisbury, North Carolina.

I, Gayle Kellems, declare:

1. I am a female and a former employee of Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. I live in Berryville, Arkansas.

2. I began working for Wal-Mart in July 1980. Twenty-one years later, in July 2001, I resigned from Wal-Mart. I resigned because I believed that Wal-Mart would never promote me to the position of Store Manager.

3. From 1980 until 1989, I was an hourly employee at a Wal-Mart store in Pocahontas, Arkansas. I held the positions of cashier, sales associate, department manager, and support manager. During this period, I always worked hard, performed well, and was never disciplined. For the first seven years of my career with Wal-Mart, no Wal-Mart manager ever asked me whether I would be interested in a management level job.

4. In approximately 1987, Store Manager Jack Staten asked me whether I was interested in entering the management training program. I declined his offer because, at that time, I had three young children. I did not believe that I could manage to raise my children and work fifty hours per week as an Assistant Manager. At that time, I did accept a position as Support Manager. The Support Manager position is an hourly supervisor position.

5. As a Support Manager, I worked approximately forty-eight hours per week which generally included two nights per week and one weekend every month. Working in the Support Manager position, I realized that I could handle the additional hours and responsibility of management. I enjoyed the work and became excited about the opportunities to build a career as a Wal-Mart manager. As a result, in approximately 1988, I told Store Manager Staten that I wanted to be promoted into the management training program. Approximately one year later, I entered the management training program.

6. In approximately December 1989, I was promoted to the position of Assistant Manager of a Wal-Mart store in Ankeny, Iowa. When I accepted this position, I relocated my family and home from Arkansas to Iowa. I was not given the option of remaining in Arkansas. At the time, I had three school-age children. I would have preferred to remain in Arkansas, but I was willing to make the sacrifice of relocation in order to further my career with Wal-Mart. I aspired to become a Store Manager and then a District Manager. I was willing to work hard and make personal sacrifices to achieve my goal.

7. When I worked at the Ankeny, Iowa Wal-Mart store, District Manager Mark Pistorius told me that I was not earning as much as the other Assistant Managers. I was the only female Assistant Manager in the Ankeny store. Instead of immediately raising my salary to the level of the other Assistant Managers, Mr. Pistorius gave me raises approximately every six months to bring my salary to parity with others.

8. In October 1991, District Manager Mark Pistorius asked me to transfer laterally to a new Wal-Mart store in West Des Moines, Iowa as an Assistant Manager. I agreed to the transfer because the store in West Des Moines was a larger store with a higher volume of sales. As a result, I believed that I would learn more about managing a Wal-Mart store. I believed that accepting this transfer would benefit my career at Wal-Mart and increase my opportunities for advancement within Wal-Mart.

9. I received performance evaluations in approximately the following dates: September 1990, December 1990, June 1991, November 1991, December 1991, March 1992 and October 1992. On each of these evaluations, I wrote that I wanted to be promoted. True and correct copies of these evaluations are attached hereto as Kellems Exhibits A through G, respectively.

10. In September 1992, I was transferred laterally to a Wal-Mart store in Berryville, Arkansas where I worked as an Assistant Manager. When I transferred to Berryville, Arkansas, the store was being converted into a Wal-Mart Supercenter. I believed that I was advancing my career by transferring to a Supercenter because Supercenters are larger than regular Wal-Mart stores and sell grocery merchandise. When I began working in Berryville, I did not receive any additional training even though I had not previously worked in a Supercenter.

11. On numerous occasions while I worked in Berryville, Arkansas, I told District Manager Steve Furner and Store Manager Larry Philips that I would like to be promoted to either a Co-Manager or a Store Manager position.

12. In February 1994, I received a performance evaluation that is signed by Store Manager Larry Phillips and District Manager Steve Furner. I wrote on the evaluation that my short term career goal was to be Co-Manager in Berryville and my long-term goal was to be director of a small Supercenter or a similar size Division One store. The performance evaluation also has a space for the District Manager to write comments. In that space, the following statement is written: "We will work closely with Gayle to achieve her goal to which can be accomplished by January 1995." A true and correct copy of this evaluation is attached hereto as Kellems Exhibit H.

13. In 1995, I told Regional Personnel Manager Debby Moody that I would like to be promoted to the position of Co-Manager. Ms. Moody responded that she would keep me in mind. Ms. Moody never contacted me about available Co-Manager positions. I was not aware of any postings for Co-Manager positions. Other than speaking to my Store Manager, District Manager, and Regional Personnel Manager as I did, I did not know what else I could do to get promoted to a Co-Manager position.

14. In March 1995, I received a performance evaluation that is signed by Store Manager Larry Phillip and District Manager Steve Furner. Mr.

Furner wrote at the bottom of the evaluation, "is ready for co-mng [Co-Manager] this year 95. Thanks. Steve Furner." A true and correct copy of this evaluation is attached hereto as Kellems Exhibit I.

15. While I was working in the Berryville, Arkansas Supercenter, a Co-Manager named Gary Saporito left his position in the Berryville store. I asked the District Manager whether I would be promoted into the position. He replied that Wal-Mart was not going to replace Gary Saporito.

16. In the spring of 1995 Gary Rains replaced Larry Phillips as the Store Manager in Berryville, Arkansas. At that time, I told Mr. Rains that I wanted to be promoted.

17. In the spring of 1995, Carl Simpson replaced Steve Furner as District Manager over the Berryville, Arkansas Supercenter. The first time that I met Mr. Simpson and many times after that, I told Mr. Simpson that I wanted to be promoted to the position of Co-Manager. On one occasion, Mr. Simpson told me that I would be promoted to the position of Co-Manager the next time that there was an opening in the district. Mr. Simpson did not tell me what I could do, if anything, to ensure that I would be considered for positions outside of his district.

18. A Co-Manager position did open up in the district, but it was not offered to me. A few months after the Co-Manager position vacated by Gary Saporito was eliminated, another Co-Manager position was created in the Berryville, Arkansas Supercenter. The position was not posted. I was not aware of the opening until the position was filled, so I could not apply for it. I was not offered that position. The position was given to a male named Allen Buck. I asked Store Manager Gary Rains why the position was given to Mr. Buck and not to me. Mr. Rains responded that the store was in a convenient location for Mr. Buck and that Wal-Mart wanted to give Mr. Buck the experience of working in a store.

19. When Mr. Buck left the position of Co-Manager in the Berryville, Arkansas Supercenter, he was not replaced. District Manager Simpson told me that the Co-Manager position was eliminated in that store. Unlike Mr. Buck, I was not allowed to work as a Co-Manager of the Berryville Supercenter in order to get that experience.

20. I continued to ask District Manager Simpson to promote me. While I was working in Berryville, Arkansas, I never spoke about my interest in promoting to a Regional Vice President or anyone else that I would consider to be Mr. Simpson's supervisor. That would have been "career suicide." Despite the open door policy, there is an unspoken rule at Wal-Mart that managers should not go over their immediate supervisor's head.

21. In August 1996, Mr. Simpson offered me a position as Co-Manager of the Harrison, Arkansas Supercenter. At the time that he offered me the position, Mr. Simpson told me that a Co-Manager position was a training position and that after eighteen months I would have to relocate elsewhere. I accepted the position and told Mr. Simpson that I was willing to relocate. I remained as a Co-Manager for five years.

22. When I worked at the Harrison, Arkansas Supercenter, there were two Co-Managers at that store. One was assigned to the "grocery side" of the store, and the other was assigned to the "general merchandise side" of the store. For approximately two years, from August 1996 until 1998, I was assigned to the general merchandise side of the Harrison, Arkansas Supercenter. From approximately 1998 until July 2000, I was assigned to the grocery side of the store.

23. In July 2000, District Manager Bill Lovell asked me to transfer as Co-Manager to the Wal-Mart Supercenter in Branson West, Missouri. Mr. Lovell told me that employee morale was low and that the store needed a female manager so that employees would feel that they had someone in whom they could confide. I later learned that Mr. Lovell claimed to have transferred me to Branson West, Missouri Supercenter because a man named Gary Saporito wanted my position in Harrison, Arkansas. A true and correct copy of a statement by Mr. Lovell that Wal-Mart provided to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and that Wal-Mart produced in this case is attached hereto as Kellems Exhibit J.

24. I agreed to transfer to the Branson West store because I believed it would lead to a promotion to a Store Manager position. District Manager Bill Lovell promised me that I would be promoted to the position of Store Manager within one year of July 2000. At the time that I resigned, on July 31, 2001, I had not been offered a position as Store Manager.

25. I considered the transfer to Branson West to be a demotion. As a Co-Manager, I earned a base salary and also a bonus that is calculated based on store profits. The Harrison Supercenter is larger and more profitable than the Branson West Supercenter. As a result, the Co-Manager bonus for the Harrison Supercenter is about $5,000 more than the Co-Manager bonus for the Branson West Supercenter. As a condition of my transfer, Wal-Mart agreed to pay my bonus for the year following my transfer based on the Harrison Supercenter's profits. If I continued working for the Branson West Supercenter, my annual income would have declined about $5,000.

26. Between 1999 and 2001, I applied for eighteen Store Manager positions on the Management Career Selection computer system, including two stores in Arizona, five stores in Texas, four stores in Arkansas, five stores in Missouri, one store in Kentucky, and one store in Oklahoma. I was not offered any of the positions. No Wal-Mart manager ever told me why I was not selected for any of these positions.

27. In selecting which positions to apply for, I selected Supercenters and large Division One stores. All of my experience since 1992 had been in Supercenters and I had the knowledge to manage both general merchandise and food operations. In 1994, District Manager Steve Furner had told me that I would be bored if I was not working in a Supercenter. I enjoy fast-paced work and being challenged in my job. In addition, Store Managers, like Co-Managers, are paid a bonus based on the store's profits. I did not want to take a pay cut by transferring to a small store.

28. No District Manager, Regional Personnel Manager, or Regional Vice President for Wal-Mart ever approached me to offer me a promotion to a particular Store Manager position or asked whether I would be interested in a particular Store Manager position.

29. In late 1999, there was an opening for a Store Manager in the Berryville, Arkansas store. I was very interested because I live in Berryville. I applied for the position, but I was neither interviewed for the position nor offered the position. The position was filled by a man named Tom LaRue.

30. In early 2000, the position of Store Manager at the Berryville, Arkansas Supercenter opened up again. I applied for the position again. Again, it was given to a male, Tim Lehr. I am familiar with Mr. Lehr's career at Wal-Mart because we worked in the same district. In approximately late 1992 or early 1993, Mr. Lehr began working for Wal-Mart at the Berryville, Arkansas Supercenter as an Assistant Manager. Before he became the Store Manager in Berryville, Mr. Lehr worked briefly as Co-Manager of the Supercenter in Bentonville and as Co-Manager of the Berryville Supercenter. Mr. Lehr did not have the many years of experience as a Co-Manager that I had.

31. In early 2001, the Store Manager position in the Branson West Supercenter opened up. I applied, but I was not offered that position. I was qualified for the position. During the time that I had been at Branson West, the store's "shrink" and "unresolved people issues" rating had improved. The "shrink" is measurement of the store's losses through theft or paperwork errors. The "UPI" rating is a measurement of employee morale. The Store Manager position in Branson West was filled by a man named Bill Stark. After working with me in the Branson West Supercenter and observing my skills, Mr. Stark told me that he was not any more qualified for the position that I was.

32. In June 2001, I reminded District Manager Bill Lovell that I had been at the Branson West Supercenter for almost one year and that I had not been promoted to a Store Manager position. Mr. Lovell replied that he thought that I would have been promoted to a Store Manager position by then. Mr. Lovell did not tell me that a store would soon be available. Mr. Lovell did not tell me that there was anything else that I could do to get promoted, other than to continue to apply for positions on the computer system as I had been doing unsuccessfully. Mr. Lovell did not tell me that he would do anything to help me get promoted to a Store Manager position. This conversation with Mr. Lovell left me with the impression that he was not going to assist me in getting promoted and that I would not be promoted any further.

33. As a result of my conversation in June 2001 with District Manager Lovell, I decided to resign. When I told Mr. Lovell of my decision, he did not try to discourage me. On July 2, 2001, I turned in my resignation notice in which I informed Wal-Mart that my last day of work would be July 31, 2001. I stated on my resignation notice that I was resigning because I felt that I had gone as far with the company as Wal-Mart will allow. Despite the fact that I had worked for Wal-Mart for over twenty years and was only forty-eight years old, no one from District, Regional, or Home Office management staff tried to persuade me not to resign.

34. I took the responsibility of being a Wal-Mart manager very seriously. I felt that I was obligated to give 110 percent to Wal-Mart because Wal-Mart gave me the opportunity to work in management. During the five years that I was a Co-Manager, I missed only three scheduled days of work. I missed two days because I was in the hospital. I missed a third day due to inclement weather. I live in a rural area with narrow, winding roads that often get icy in winter. On particular bad days, my family urged me to stay home from work because they feared that driving was dangerous. I did not take their advice because I was dedicated to my job at Wal-Mart. As a manager, I was scheduled to work fifty-two hours per week, but I often worked more than sixty hours in a week. I sacrificed holidays, weekends, and monumental occasions with my children. For example, I left my daughter's wedding party early to attend Wal-Mart's annual holiday meeting in Texas. I never hesitated to make these sacrifices because I believed that the opportunities I would have to advance within Wal-Mart would ultimately benefit my family.

35. During the time I worked at Wal-Mart, I consistently received high ratings on my performance evaluations. I was never disciplined. Wal-Mart has a training program for managers who perform poorly. I do not know what the official name of the program is, but it is commonly referred to among managers as "bad boys' school." I was never sent to "bad boys' school."

36. During the entire time that I worked as a manager for Wal-Mart, I do not remember ever hearing any discussions at the store level about the importance of increasing the number of women in management.

37. All of the Store Managers with whom I have worked during my twenty-one years at Wal-Mart have been male. All of the Co-Managers with whom I have worked during my twenty-one years at Wal-Mart have been male. All of the District Managers with whom I worked during my twenty-one years at Wal-Mart have been male.

38. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Arkansas that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 1, 2003, at Berryville, Arkansas.

I, Martha Kettle, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I was employed by Wal-Mart, Inc. in Newhall, California from October 1997 through April 2000. I am female.

3. I owned and operated my own businesses before working for Wal-Mart. I ran a toy store for six years and a pre school for fourteen years. I applied for a position at Wal-Mart to supplement my income from my preschool business. At the time, I was going through a divorce and needed extra income to care for my twelve-year-old son. I went to Wal-Mart to see if there were any job openings and Personnel Manager Marina Bruns told me that the only openings were temporary cashier positions. I took a temporary cashier position because Personnel Manager Burns told me that if my performance was good after 90 days, Wal-Mart would hire me permanently and at that time I could negotiate a higher salary.

4. The cashier position paid only $5.65 per hour but I was expecting to earn much more when I became a permanent employee. In December 1997, Customer Service Manager Lori Newman asked me if I was interested in a Customer Service Manager position. The position was never posted, and I was not asked to apply for it. I accepted the Customer Service Manager position in January 1998 and was given a 25 cent per hour pay raise which increased my salary from $5.93 to $6.18 per hour. When I left Wal-Mart in April 2000, two years later, I was still only making $7.75 per hour.

5. During the two and one half years that I worked at the Newhall store, I observed very little opportunity for advancement for women. I never saw a posting for open Department Manager or Support Manager positions. Only a few women in the store rose to a position higher than Support Manager. Most of the employees in store management were men. There was only one female co-manager, Lani Abbott. A woman never held the Store Manager position while I worked there.

6. I also observed that men who performed the same work I did were paid better wages than I was. Gerald Stallworth, a cashier who was hired in 1999, was promoted to Customer Service Manager in 2000. He told me that his salary as a customer service manager was $8.11 per hour, this is 37% more than I made when I was promoted to Customer Service Manager. Gerald Stallworth told me that he became Customer Service Manager when Co-Manager Jerrald Simpson offered him the position. The position was never posted. Howard Staszower, who was hired as a customer service manager in November 1999, showed me his pay stub and his hourly rate was $9, 52% more than I made when I was promoted to Customer Service Manager. I felt that I was more experienced than Customer Service Manager Staszower because I owned a business for over fourteen years and he had owned his business for only four years. This made me think that my pay rate was not based on my prior work experience, but that I was being paid less than my male co-workers because I am a woman.

7. The male managers at the Newhall store tolerated conduct that I found offensive. Co-Manager Simpson and Store Manager Cimo had statues of persons engaged in sexual acts on their desks. These statues were very offensive to me and I believed that they were inappropriate. In June 2000, I called the 1-800 Wal-Mart number to complain about the statues. I waited until I was no longer employed by Wal-Mart to complain because I was afraid of losing my job. I talked to Regional Manager Jonathan Sims and his assistant. My understanding from others who continued to work at the Newhall store was that minor changes were made after my call. In August 2000, the Store Manager's office was moved to a different location within the store. Store Manager Cimo was transferred to another Wal-Mart store.

8. I left Wal-Mart in April 2000 because of the offensive environment and to find a better paying supplemental job.

9. In September 2000, my former Wal-Mart supervisor, Debbie Eastman, called to ask if I would be interested in working for Wal-Mart part time during the Christmas season. I decided to return to Wal-Mart for that short period. In approximately October 2000, I filled out an application for a Customer Service Manager position. That month I called the store repeatedly to find out when I would be interviewed for the position. One night I was shopping in the Newhall store and Ms. Eastman was working. I told her that my calls to the store were not being returned. Ms. Eastman told me that the Newhall store was short staffed because no one was applying for the open Customer Service Manager position. Ms. Eastman and I walked to the back of the store where she showed me the posting for the Customer Service Manager position. Ms. Eastman introduced me to Store Manager Thomas Lorenzen and told him that she wanted me to come back as a customer service manager. Store Manager Lorenzen told me that the position was open, that he would ask Personnel Manager Elizabeth Chavez to retrieve my application, and he would contact me by the end of the week. Store Manager Lorenzen never called me. I continued to call the store and could never reach Store Manager Lorenzen or Personnel Manager Chavez.

10. I called the Home Office and spoke with the Regional Personnel Manager. The Regional Personnel Manager told me, after looking at my record, that he found no reason that I should not be rehired. He said he would call the Personnel Manager and tell her to rehire me. Despite the Regional Personnel Manager's efforts, I was never interviewed for the open Customer Service Manager position. In November 2000, I called the Newhall store and Personnel Manager Chavez told me that all positions were filled. I did not believe that the positions were filled because I had seen the job posting for the Customer Service Manager position and Ms. Eastman told me that no one was applying for the position. In addition, Newhall Store Management refused to return my calls even after the Regional Personnel Manager informed me that he would recommend my rehire. Because of this, I felt that I was not being considered for the Customer Service Manager position in retaliation for having used the 1-800 number.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of California that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 4, 2003, at Valencia, CA.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, CLEO PAGE, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, DEBORAH GUNTER, KAREN WILLIAMSON AND EDITH ARANA, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiffs, vs. WAL-MART STORES, INC., Defendant.	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Christine Kwapnoski, declare:

1. I am a named plaintiff in this action. I have been employed by Wal-Mart, Inc. since 1986 and am currently in management training, having commenced the training in March 2003. I have spent most of my adult life working for Sam's Clubs and was promoted only after this lawsuit was filed. I am female and live in Concord, California.

2. I began my employment with Sam's Club in Grandview, Missouri in 1986 when I was 22 years old. I worked as a cashier, cash office associate and in claims. All of my evaluations while working in Missouri were very good. I expressed my interest in being promoted to management in a number of conversations with General Managers and Assistant Managers at the Grandview club, but received no promotions. I was never told what, if anything, I needed to do to become qualified for management training. I was unaware of any way to apply for a promotion or for management training. I observed co-workers, mostly male, suddenly being moved into positions as soon as the positions were opened and before I had an opportunity to express interest.

3. I was recognized by Sam's Club as having "expert" status in the area of claims while I was at the Grandview Club. This meant that associates at other clubs in the area, who had questions, could call me for advice and guidance.

4. In late 1993, I came to Concord, California, to help convert an existing Pace store to a new Sam's Club. There had been a posting in the Missouri club for this opportunity, which I understood was intended to be temporary. This posting was unusual, as I do not recall other job opportunities being posted. I signed up to express my interest, and was selected to go. Part of my responsibilities in helping to convert the club in Concord, California was to help the former Pace employees become Wal-Mart employees. I taught Wal-Mart/Sam's Club policies and practices to these new Wal-Mart employees. These policies and practices that I helped to implement in the new Concord Club were the same policies and practices that I had learned and followed while working in Missouri.

5. While I was working to open the new club, I was approached by the General Manager, Robert Ortega, who asked me to transfer permanently to the Concord club and promised me a $2.00 an hour raise. As a result of this request, I did transfer to the Concord club in March 1994 but did not receive the promised raise.

6. My initial position at the Concord Sam's Club was in claims. Over the next seven years, I held the positions of dock associate, receiving clerk/exports, freezer/cooler associate, center section team lead, and auditing clerk. As a result of holding these positions and my experience in the Missouri club, I was familiar with almost all areas of the club. During these years, I received evaluations annually, which were always good. I received annual raises and merit raises upon occasion.

7. With my experience and good evaluations, I believed I could be a good manager at Sam's Club. I saw management at Sam's as an opportunity to have a career that would be both financially rewarding and satisfying. There was nothing in the handbook nor any other materials available to me to explain how to become a manager. I believed I would be eventually recognized with a promotion. I worked hard, and was available for whatever shifts and positions I was asked to fill. I succeeded at the variety of positions I was assigned. I continued to receive merit raises and good evaluations. I made my desire for promotion known to numerous managers over the years, as described below. However, I watched as men I had trained were selected to go into management training or received promotions above me, as detailed below.

8. When I was working on the dock, I told the dock lead, a man named Clark Holt, that I wanted his position as dock lead when he left it. I wanted this position because, based on my observation, I believed it would increase my chances for promotion and I knew I could do it well. I also expressed my interest in this promotional opportunity to General Manager Alan Oshier, and to the Assistant Managers. The position became open a number of times in the 1990s. I was the employee with the most experience in that area, and I had expressed interest, but the job was given to a succession of male associates including Dion Denes and Joshua Reynolds. I had more experience in receiving and more tenure with Sam's Clubs than either of these men. None of these men lasted in this position.

9. When I was working as the freezer/cooler associate, I was passed over four times for the promotion to team lead, an hourly supervisor position, in three and a half years. During the mid to late 1990s, Doug Hailey, Mike Montgomery, Serge Orloff and a fourth male employee whose name I cannot recall, were given this position, despite my stronger qualifications.

10. I wanted to become an hourly supervisor, but there was no application process. Neither was there an organized, formal method by which supervisory openings were routinely made known, as they were not always posted. I could only rely upon word of mouth or the club grapevine. The Club's grapevine was more available to male employees, as they spent more time talking and socializing with management employees. I did not apply for the position when I became Center Section Team Lead. The General Manager, Alan Oshier, simply approached me and asked if I wanted the position. A few months later, Mr. Oshier transferred me into the position of Audit Clerk. Again, I had not applied for the position.

11. While I was in the audit position, Mr. Oshier yelled at me upon frequent, almost daily, occasions. I witnessed him scream at other female employees, but seldom did he scream at men. I complained to Director of Operations Phil Goodwin about Mr. Oshier's conduct but received little response. Mr. Oshier told me that he was being demoted and was required to take anger management classes. In fact, he remained as our General Manager without a demotion and his abusive behavior continued.

12. By 2000, I was the longest tenured hourly employee at the Concord Sam's Club, with 14 years of experience. Despite these years of experience, I was paid virtually the same as a male associate with one-half my tenure. This male co-worker, Jon Salomone, had only seven years of experience at Sam's Clubs and did not have the responsibility I did, as he was only an unloader on the dock. When I asked General Manager Oshier why Mr. Salomone received nearly as much as I did, Mr. Oshier responded by saying that "some people make their beds, some people make them better." When I asked Mr. Oshier why he had given a large raise to another male employee, Jose Rivera, Mr. Oshier told me it was because Mr. Rivera had a family to support. John Naslund was hired in 2001 in the position of verifier on the dock and was paid nearly as much as me. Bryan Van Roo was hired in 2001 as a sales associate and was paid approximately $14.00 an hour. I was still not making a wage sufficient to support me in the San Francisco Bay Area. Consequently, throughout most of the years I have worked in Concord, I have also held a second job.

13. I worked hard and continued to get good evaluations and valuable experience but was not selected for a management position or training. My desire for advancement was discussed often at my annual evaluations, but I was not told how to apply for management training or what, if anything, I needed to do to become a manager. I discussed my interest in going into management at Sam's with General Managers Robert Ortega, Alan Oshier, and Mike Bruegger, and perhaps others. I discussed this interest to join management with Assistant Managers Nancy Horn, Ted McDavitt, and many others.

14. I continued to express interest in getting into a management position. Several times in 2000 and 2001, I approached General Manager Alan Oshier, and asked him what I needed to do to get promoted. I was never told of a process or application procedure and I was unaware of any application process which I could use to enter the Management Training Program. I have never seen or been told of any form to complete to document my interest in promotion (except for the one that was available for approximately one week in January 2003, 18 months after this lawsuit was filed).

15. I was finally promoted to Receiving Area Manager at the end of June 2001, two weeks after this lawsuit was filed and 15 years after I first expressed my interest in management. This is an entry level managerial position. I reported to an Assistant Manager. I was paid a salary which resulted in a decrease in my hourly rate, as I no longer received overtime pay, and I was scheduled to work 48-52 hours a week. Unlike the Assistant Manager positions, Geographical Assistance Pay ("GAP") is not paid for Receiving Area Managers. In Concord, California, GAP results in payment of approximately 50% more of a manager's salary. As a result, my pay was approximately $38,000 as a Receiving Area Manager while the Assistant Managers at the Concord Club made over $50,000.

16. In late 2001, after I was promoted to Receiving Area Manager, Mr. Oshier told me to "doll up, " to wear some makeup, and to dress a little better. I responded by indicating that high heels on the receiving dock were not appropriate. About a month later, when standing by the time clock and in the presence of another employee, Mr Oshier told me to "blow the cobwebs off my make-up. " I worked in the receiving area of the club at the time, which is a hot and dirty job with little, if any, contact with the public. I never heard Mr. Oshier comment on the physical appearance of male co-workers.

17. When I was given my annual review in the spring of 2002, I was told by General Manager Alan Oshier and by Director of Operations Phil Goodwin that I needed to be in the position of Receiving Area Manager for one year and then I could be considered for the Management Training Program. There is no guideline or written requirement that an employee be a Receiving Area Manager for one year or any time at all before going into Management Training to become an Assistant Manager. During my 17 years with Sam's Clubs, I have seen a large number of male employees begin their career with Sam's Clubs as Management Trainees. In the last year, for example, Joshua Wilson joined Management Training upon completion of college. He had never worked at a Sam's Club before. He is now an Assistant Manager in the Concord Club. I have never known a man to be required to be Receiving Area Manager for one year, or for any time, before being permitted to go into Management Training.

18. During the nearly two years that I have been Receiving Area Manager, I have received good evaluations, but no raises. Mr. Oshier and Mr. Goodwin told me that I would not receive any raises while in this position since I was at the "maximum rate."

19. After being a Receiving Area Manager for a year, I asked General Manager Alan Oshier and Mr. Goodwin when I could go into management training to become an Assistant Manager. They said I should just continue to do what I was doing and suggested I move to the front end to get experience there as an Area Manager. No other Assistant Manager had been required to be an Area Manager at all, let alone an Area Manager in two positions before being promoted.

20.. A new Director of Operations was assigned to supervise our club in approximately December 2002. I approached this man, Ross LaDoux, introduced myself, and asked when I could expect to go into management training. He said we would talk later, but he did not follow-up.

21. In January 2003, Regional Vice President Greg Johnston toured our club. I had known Mr. Johnston when we worked in Missouri together. During the intervening years, I had been promoted to the lowest-level manager with an annual salary of less than $40,000 and no GAP, while my former co-worker had risen to one of the highest positions at Sam's Club. Mr. Johnston remembered me and spoke with me about our days in Missouri and about my current situation. He told me that he respected my work ethic, and knew I was a good employee. Soon after my discussion with Regional Vice President Johnston, Director of Operations LaDoux approached me and said I could enter the Management Training Program in Vacaville, commuting from my home. I began the training in March 2003.

22. Throughout most of my 17 years at Sam's Club, I have been willing to relocate to advance my goals of obtaining a managerial position. However, in the last year, I have been involved in a family law matter and have not wanted to move my home on short notice and more than once. I explained this to General Manager Oshier, Director of Operations Goodwin, and Director of Operations LaDoux. They each refused to make any accommodation, telling me that I could not go into management training unless I was willing to relocate for the approximate three months of training, and then move again for my first managerial assignment. No manager had ever told me that this was a requirement until after this lawsuit was filed. And, until the summer of 2002, I had no limits on relocating, and would have accepted such terms had they been offered. Once Regional Vice President Johnston became involved in my situation, as described above, this need to relocate no longer existed.

23. I decided to become a named plaintiff in this action because I have been unfairly denied promotional opportunities and equal pay for 17 years. I have observed countless male employees leap frog over me, despite my excellent reviews and persistent requests for advancement. Wal-Mart management has repeatedly and falsely promised pay increases and promotions and held me to non-existent promotional requirements. My primary goals are to ensure that the employment practices at Wal-Mart which hinder the progress of women wishing to enter management be changed, and to ensure fair and equitable treatment of female employees. I understand the responsibilities of a named plaintiff and I am prepared to fulfill my duties to the women in the class.

24. I have personal knowledge of all the foregoing facts and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to each. I declare under penalty of perjury that the foregoing is true and correct under the laws of the United States and the State of California.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and of the State of California that the foregoing is true and correct.

I, Jaime Lanois, declare:

1. I have personal knowledge of the facts contained in this declaration and, if called as a witness, am competent to testify to those facts.

2. I am female and 25 years old. I reside in Republic, Missouri. I am currently a certified audiologist and licensed hearing aid dispenser for a regional health system in Springfield, Missouri and Joplin, Missouri.. I obtained a master's degree in Communication Sciences and Disorders with an emphasis in Audiology from Southwest Missouri State University in Springfield, Missouri.

3. I was first hired by Wal-Mart when I was 15 years old and a sophomore in high school. This was the first job I ever held. I initially worked for the Springfield, Missouri Wal-Mart from May 1993 through August 1995, until I left for college. At this store, I held the positions of cashier, sales floor associate (experience working in every department), service desk associate, layaway associate, store closing team, Customer Service Manager, and store set-up crew member. The periodic evaluations I was given as an employee regarding my job performance met or exceeded my job duties.

4. In approximately May 1995, a male stock person, Rick Miller, sexually assaulted me on the job. We were both in the back of the store outside the UPC office. As I was reaching in the UPC office window, Mr. Miller forced his hand down the front of my shirt and grabbed my left breast. I was 17 years old at the time.

5. I reported the incident to Store Manager, Randy Epley, who told me that he would speak to Mr. Miller. Mr. Epley later informed me that he had spoken with Mr. Miller regarding the incident, that Miller did not deny the assault, and that he had given Mr. Miller a verbal warning.

6. Shortly thereafter, Mr. Miller confronted me and called me a "cry baby" and a "tattletale." I went directly to Store Manager Epley to inform him of the remarks and to urge that Mr. Miller be given a more severe discipline since he did not seem to appreciate the gravity of his conduct. To my knowledge, no investigation was ever conducted and no further action was taken against Mr. Miller.

7. After attending a year of college out-of-state, I returned to the area to attend college locally and resumed working for Wal-Mart in April 1997 at a different Wal-Mart store in the Springfield area.

Several times, I asked head Customer Service Manager, Barb Carver, to promote me to the position of Customer Service Manager as the openings became available. I informed her that I had been a Customer Service Manager at the other store where I had worked. Ms. Carver stated that she did not believe I had enough experience and that I "was too young" to have been a Customer Service Manager. Instead, she promoted a male cashier, Tony Snavely, who was approximately the same age as myself; to a Customer Service Manager/Service Desk position who had very little experience. Mr. Snavely had been a cashier for a shorter period of time than myself and had only held one particular position in the store as a cashier. I complained about this promotion decision to Store Manager, Beth Runyan, and Personnel Manager, Christy Perryman and was finally promoted to Customer Service Manager/Service Desk Associate several months later, approximately in August 1997.

8. After my promotion, Ms. Carver also promoted another male cashier, Roger [last name unknown] to the Service Desk position despite his lack of qualifications. Roger was newly hired and had little experience as a cashier. I am aware that several female cashiers had also applied for the position and were more qualified than Roger.

9. I was interested in being in upper management and was told by Store Manager Runyan that I had to work my way to the top when I learned that a Support Manager position would be opening soon. I had planned to make Wal-Mart management my career, and even made plans to discontinue college classes upon getting the position on Support Team. However, she did not tell me what the process was or what steps I had to take to get there, other than "working my way to the top."

10. In approximately March 1998, I applied for a position of Support Team Manager, which was considered a first step towards the management training program. To my knowledge, there were two other applicants for the position beside myself: a male lawn and garden associate (Terry Hood) and a female department manager of foods (Dorothy Girard). I had been at Wal-Mart longer than Mr. Hood and had more experience, especially supervisory experience, than he had. At that time, I had over three years of supervisory experience as a Customer Service Manager. The promotion was given to Terry Hood.

11. I did observe that the promotion and job posting process was very arbitrary. For example, sometimes job vacancies were posted and sometimes they were not. For example, after being denied the support management position, I was placed in a cash office position that was never posted.

12. I resigned my employment with Wal-Mart in August 1998 in part because of my perception that the process for promotion to management was unfair.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Missouri that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on March 30, 2003, at Republic, Missouri.

I, Darlene Leadingham, declare:

1. I am a 56 year old female and live in Lubbock, Texas.

2. During my employment at Wal-Mart, Inc's Sam's Club Division, I encountered discrimination based upon my gender with regard to compensation, promotions, failure to accommodate my medical condition and sexual harassment.

3. I worked at the Odessa, Texas Sam's Club from July 26, 1993 until March 22, 2002. My first job at Sam's Club was as a part-time cashier, where I made $6.00 an hour. During my nearly nine years of service with Sam's Club, I worked in demos, member services, refunds, comparison shopper, fax and pool backup, marketing backup, shelf maintenance, tire mounting and as a people greeter.

4. My ending hourly wage was $9.10 per hour. This reflects the modest standard increase in wages that resulted from my periodic evaluations and performance reviews, which always averaged at least a "three" on a scale of one to five. At no time during my career with Sam's Club did I ever receive a merit raise, even though I repeatedly requested such raises.

5. I am aware that many male employees with identical or comparable experience at Sam's Club received merit raises or annual raises that exceeded $.50 per hour during the time I worked there, including those described below. I know that Eduardo Ramirez, who worked in maintenance cleaning floors, received approximately a $.70 per hour raise in 1998. This directly contradicts what Curtis Gullett, the General Manager, and Juan Jimenez, the Assistant Merchandising Manager, told me in a meeting in October or November, 2001, when they said that the largest raise they could give anyone was $.50 per hour. I also know that Dustin Hatfield, Marcus Pacheco and Macario Tobar have received annual raises between the years 1999 and 2002 that exceeded the standard annual raises that I received.

6. I have also been discriminated against in being denied promotions to management positions while other male employees with comparable Sam's Club experience were promoted around me. I made it known to Sam's Club management very early in my Sam's Club career that my long-term goal was to become a manager. See Evaluation Summary dated 10/24/93 and identified as WMHO 913499, a true and correct copy of which is attached hereto as Exhibit 1.

7. In approximately August, 1995, I complained about the pay inequalities to Chris Cecchine, the General Manager at the time, after I received my annual evaluation in July, 1995. But, as usual, Mr. Cecchine and Sam's Club did nothing to respond to my complaints.

8. Over the years, I applied for several team leader positions, but was never selected. These positions were usually posted and I contacted the manager in charge of the department where the vacancy occurred. Meanwhile, when I applied and interviewed for the Marketing Team Leader position in the fall of 1999, Danny Castro, a male, was given the job even though he had no marketing or customer service experience. My co-workers also submitted my name for Checkout Supervisor ("COS") openings approximately six times, but I was never selected. Four out of these six times Sam's Club selected a man for the job. In approximately 1999, I personally applied for a COS vacancy that was posted on the wall at the store. I informed Connie Martin, the Front End Manager, that I wanted to be considered for the COS position, but I was never interviewed for the job and did not receive the promotion. I was never given a promotion at Sam's Club.

9. In the year 2000 or after, I also know that Brent Ward, who was a male employee working in tire mounting, made a higher hourly wage than I did when I was a comparison shopper, for doing comparable work. Eduardo Ramirez, Maintenance worker, and Mike Byrd, a Sales Associate, Merchandiser and Greeter, both male employees, also made higher hourly wages than me for doing comparable work from at least 1999 through 2002.

10. In approximately September or October, 2001, I approached Mr. Gullett to request a merit raise. I had received a rating of 15 out of a possible 16 on my June, 2001, Performance Evaluation, and felt that I deserved a merit raise for the hard work I did for Wal-Mart. Mr. Gullett said that he never gave merit raises because he would get accused of bias, and then told me to discuss the matter with Mr. Jimenez. When I spoke to Mr. Jimenez about my request, he refused to give me a raise, stating that he thought I was a poor employee. Mr. Jimenez' s comments that I was a poor employee, however, were belied by the excellent rating he gave me on my June, 2001 Performance Evaluation.

11. Eventually, Mr. Gullett, Mr. Jimenez and I had a meeting together to discuss my raise request, but I never received the merit raise I sought. In this meeting, Mr. Gullett appeared to agree with my position that I deserved a raise, but he failed to authorize any change in my hourly wage.

12. In approximately July, 2001, I was also subjected to discrimination in the failure of management to provide me with suitable accommodation for a medical condition I had. I had been ordered in writing by my doctor to restrict my lifting due to my heart condition. But when I brought this subject up with Mr. Jimenez, he told me that I could take unpaid personal leave if I could not do the heavy lifting, and refused to accommodate my condition. I know, however, that Mr. Jimenez had previously given an accommodation to a male employee, Mike Byrd, who had a bad back.

13. I have also been sexually harassed by a fellow Sam's Club employee. Edward Garcia, a co-worker, made offensive remarks to me about my sex life. I complained about this sexual harassment to management during general club and grass roots meetings, but management failed to promptly address my complaints. Mr. Garcia's penchant for making inappropriate sexual remarks to female employees was a frequent topic at the general club and grass roots meetings. I understood that Mr. Garcia had 32 complaints made against him at Wal-Mart for sexual harassment.

14. In March, 2002, Sam's Club terminated my employment due to a misunderstanding over my purchase of a marked-down item. My termination was not justified, and I feel that Wal-Mart treated me unfairly in terminating my employment.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Texas that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 2, 2003, at Lubbock, Texas.

I, Phyllis Lehman, declare:

1. I am a 46 year old female from Liberty, Missouri. I began working for Wal-Mart in March of 1991 at store # 234 in Liberty, Missouri as an overnight unloader. The entire time I worked at Wal-Mart I let Wal-Mart know I wanted to move up the ladder into salaried management, but Wal-Mart never gave me the chance to enter the Management Training Program. Instead, Wal-Mart placed a male with less experience than me in the Management Training Program.

2. Within the first few weeks of my employment at Wal-Mart I spoke with either Store Manager Leroy Marvel or Assistant Manager Dean Boyd regarding my interest in entering the Management Training Program. I was told that in order to be qualified for the program I had to first gain experience as a department manager and as a support manager.

3. I then documented my interest in promotion at Wal-Mart on my 90 day evaluation. I wrote on my evaluation that I wanted to become department manager of foods. See Phyllis Lehman's 90-Day Evaluation, a true and correct copy is attached hereto as Exhibit A. I chose this position because I wanted to gain the department manager experience I was told was necessary to reach the Management Training Program and because I knew there was an opening for department manager in the food department.

4. My first annual-performance evaluation was completed on February 3, 1992. I was rated as an "above standard" employee. I reminded Wal-Mart that I had long term goals with the company and I stated on my evaluation that, "I plan to excel with the Wal-Mart family." See Phyllis Lehman's February 3, 1992 Associate Evaluation Form, a true and correct copy hereto attached as Exhibit B.

5. In the fall of 1992 Wal-Mart promoted me to department manager of food, which I considered a step closer to the Management Training Program. Within approximately six months of my promotion, I received a merit raise for increasing sales in the food department.

6. I remained the department manager of foods for approximately two and half years. During that time, I talked to Assistant Manager Ben Abbott several times about my desire to train for an assistant manger position. I even told him that I felt that if I had been male, that I would have already been given the opportunity to enter the Management Training Program. Mr. Abbott typically told me to keep up my good performance so that I might be considered for the Management Training Program. He also frequently reminded me that I would have to relocate with my children in order to enter the Management Training Program. I told him that relocating did not deter me from pursuing a position in the Management Training Program.

7. In January 1995, I received another annual performance evaluation. Assistant Manager Ben Abbott rated me as "above standard," the highest rating possible. I let Wal-Mart know that I continued to be interested in gaining increased responsibility. I wrote on my performance evaluation that my goals for the year included cross-training at the service desk and gaining an opportunity to have department 3, the stationary department, added to my duties. See Phyllis Lehman's January 31, 1995 Associate Self Evaluation, a true and correct copy hereto attached as Exhibit C.

8. In late spring or early summer of 1995 I gave my two weeks notice to Wal-Mart because I felt that Wal-Mart was not giving me the chance to advance beyond my current position as department manager. I had been stuck in the department manager position for two and half years despite my good performance evaluations and my repeatedly expressed interest in promotion. Leroy Marvel, the store manager, and Ben Abbott, an assistant manager, spoke with about my reasons for leaving. I told them again that I wanted to be an assistant manager at Wal-Mart but I was going to leave because I had not been given any opportunity to progress. They told me they did not feel that I had enough experience yet to become an assistant manager, but if I would stay, they would promote me to support manager now, and advance me to assistant manager later. I agreed to those terms and in June 1995 I was promoted to support manager.

9. I was evaluated in my support manager position in January 1996. Once again, I was rated as "above standard." I was still interested in taking on more responsibility so I wrote on this evaluation that I was hoping that my support manager position would "lead to a position in the assistant manager field." See Phyllis Lehman's January 11, 1996 Associate Evaluation, a true and correct copy hereto attached as Exhibit D.

10. In February 1996 I was wrongfully accused of exhibiting inappropriate behavior in the workplace and I was reassigned to a position as a day stocker. Once again though, when I received my next annual performance evaluation, in February 1997, I was rated as "above standard."

11. In the spring of 1997 I took a position in Directs Receiving. Within three or four months I was promoted to the Lead Associate of Directs Receiving.

12. I continued to speak to Mr. Marvel and Mr. Abbott about moving into the Management Training Program. I also told the District Manager Jerome Schneider that I wanted to enter the program. The District Manager told me I would have to relocate if I entered the program and that such a move would be difficult with children. He told me to go home and ask my kids if they thought a move would be okay. I felt like Mr. Schneider's response to my interest was not sincere, but I did go home and talk to my children. About a month later I was finally able to track down Mr. Schneider again and I let him know that my family was supportive of the move. Again he responded that he thought the move would be hard on my kids. But he said he would see what he could do. I never heard from him again about it. When I continued to approach Mr. Schneider about getting into the program, he told me time and again that he would get back to me, but he never did.

13. In February 1998, I was rated as "outstanding" as Lead Associate in Directs Receiving, the absolute highest evaluation an associate could get. I also received a merit raise in August 1998. I continued to excel in this position and in February 1999, was rated as an "above standard" employee.

14. In July 2000, Fred Hack, a male associate from my store was promoted into the Management Training Program. He had only worked at Wal-Mart for two years, compared to my 8 1/2 years with Wal-Mart. Mr. Hack trained in a nearby store and was placed as an assistant manager in a nearby store. Despite the District Manager's warnings to me that entering the Management Training Program required relocation, Mr. Hack did not have to relocate when Wal-Mart placed him in the program.

15. I was disappointed and frustrated when I saw Mr. Hack's easy track into the Management Training Program. I had experience in the highest position of responsibility before crossing the line into salaried management, the support manager position, and I had been a dedicated employee to Wal-Mart for 8 1/2 years. I felt that I was more qualified than Mr. Hack but I was kept out of the Management Training Program because Wal-Mart preferred to have male assistant managers.

16. In November 2000, I was accused of mishandling merchandise when in fact another associate had misplaced the merchandise. Wal-Mart gave me a decision day. I was very upset over the unfair treatment. I decided to end my employment with Wal-Mart to pursue a different career opportunity.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Missouri that the foregoing is true and correct.

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, CLEO PAGE, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, DEBORAH GUNTER, KAREN WILLIAMSON AND EDITH ARANA, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiff, vs. WAL-MART STORES, INC., Defendant	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF VAN LE-KOHLER IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Van Le-Kohler, declare:

1. I am female. I first started working at a Wal-Mart store in Kissimmee, Florida, in June of 1998. I always had good evaluations and was never disciplined at work.

2. I worked as a stocker on the third shift for just about a month before my family suddenly had to relocate. I returned to Florida in 1999 and reapplied at Wal-Mart. I was hired as a stocker in girls' wear in an Orlando Wal-Mart store in August 1999. Just a few weeks later, I received a "promotion" to "supervisor" of stocking for all softlines. Ed Tomaselli, Co-Manager in charge of the third shift, told me this was a promotion, and that he had chosen me because I knew the job better than anyone else and knew how to direct others in the job. However, neither my title (stocker) nor my wage changed; I had seven departments to stock instead of one and was responsible for training and supervising the other stockers and zoners in softlines. I remained in that position for about two years.

3. I applied for a Support Manager position in the Fall of 2000 on the recommendations of Mary [last name unknown], Department Manager in women's clothing and Louise [last name unknown], Department Manager in girls' wear. Mary told me she thought I was in a good position to get the job because I was familiar with most of the relevant departments. I was interviewed by Ed Tomaselli and Larry [last name unknown], Co-Managers. Mr. Tomaselli denied my request for the promotion, saying that I was not a "people person."

4. I was stunned by this, because of what he had told me when he "promoted" me to supervisor of the softlines stockers, and because my supervisors had always indicated that my communication skills and personal interaction skills were some of my major strengths. For example, on my Performance Appraisal dated September 28, 1999, my supervisor, Toni Daniel, wrote: "Very outgoing personality. Ready to take on any situation. Very detail oriented. Works well with others. Great attitude—does whatever is asked with a smile on her face." See true and correct copy attached hereto as Exhibit A.

5. A male employee, Kevin Holmes, was promoted to the Support Manager position. Mr. Holmes had worked at Wal-Mart for about the same amount of time as I had and his only experience was stocking groceries. In my observation, he kept to himself on the job and avoided interacting with customers.

6. On one occasion in early 2001, I was present during an impromptu meeting in the break room involving several associates and the Store Manager. A female associate, Mary Tromboli, had caught another employee stealing and she and several others were discussing this with Peter Schultz, Store Manager. Ms. Tromboli began raising other concerns, including complaining that men were promoted over her. Mr. Schultz said to her, "You will never get promoted because you are female."

7. In the Spring of 2001, I needed to take a medical leave of absence. Ed Tomaselli, Co-Manager, John Sanchez, Co-Manager, and Peter Schultz, Store Manager, all told me I would be able to return to the same job. I completed the necessary paperwork to be able to return to my same job, but on the day shift. The paperwork was "lost" twice. When I returned after only two months, the store managers told me that the job was not available after all and that I had to take a cashier position. At least two men in the store had been allowed to return to their jobs after medical leaves. Joe [last name unknown], Front End Manager, took a leave of absence for a couple of months and was permitted to return to his job upon his return. Hector Munoz, the top meat cutter, had been out on medical leave for eight or nine months and was permitted to return to his job.

8. In 2001, shortly after I returned from leave, I applied for a Support Manager position again. I was interviewed by Ed Tomaselli and Don [last name known], Co-Managers. However, a man, Eddie [last name unknown], with no supervisory or management experience, got the position. He had been with Wal-Mart only a few months as a stocker.

9. None of the managers who interviewed me told me what I needed to do in order to get a promotion. I was given neither guidance nor support in my efforts to advance my career or join the management ranks at Wal-Mart. I was aware of no other routes into a management position. I was never provided any information about management training, and there was never an opportunity to apply for a management training position.

10. After a few months as cashier, during which my hours were reduced, I quit. I was very upset about being denied promotions, not getting my job back after my leave, and the reduction in my hours.

11. I received no encouragement to make a career at Wal-Mart. No manager gave me any indication that I would be promoted or trained for a management position, despite my repeated expressions of interest. The Store Manager's comment to my female co-worker led me to conclude that women could not expect to receive fair opportunities for promotions, and this conclusion was supported when I looked at the management in the store. The Store Manager, the Co-Managers, all but one of the Assistant Managers and all of the Support Mangers were male. I saw that I could not expect a fair chance at promotion at Wal-Mart.

12. In my experience, men at the Wal-Mart store where I worked received higher starting wages and higher raises than women. For example, Kevin Holmes started around the same time that I did in mid-1999 at the Orlando store, and he told me he was making $.50 an hour more than me. My husband, Steve Kohler, started shortly after I did, and his starting wage was $8.00 an hour as a meat cutter, despite the fact that he had no experience in that job. I had started at $7.00 an hour and was still receiving that wage when my husband was hired at $8.00 an hour.

13. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in this Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Florida that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 11, 2003, at 3:45 pm.

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I am female and a former Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. employee. I worked in the Dekalb, Illinois Wal-Mart from August 2000 to July 2001.

3. Between 1993 and 1996, I had two years of client services experience at a collection agency and had held a cashier position at Filene's Basement for one year.

4. At Wal-Mart, I was employed as a Cashier from August through November 2000, a Customer Service Manager from November 2000 through July 2001, and a Sales Associate in July 2001.

5. Between 2000 and 2001, my Co-Manager, Dale [last name unknown], actively encouraged me to pursue promotion to management. Co-Manager Dale told me I would excel in a management position; with his encouragement, I decided to pursue the Manager Training Program.

6. While working as a Customer Service Manager, I told my Store Manager, Tom Kehrees, that I was interested in participating in the Manager Training Program. He told me that I needed to gain sales floor experience before being considered for the program. At his recommendation, I left my Customer Service Manager position and took a Sales Associate position in Health and Beauty Aids to gain the suggested experience. In June 2001, I posted an application on Wal-Mart's computer system for the Department Manager position of the Girls and Boys section. When I did not receive an answer to my application after three weeks, I submitted another. I did not receive a response to either application.

7. In 2001, Lee Murray, the husband of a Customer Service Manager, was hired into the Manager Training Program. Mr. Murray had no previous retail or Wal-Mart experience. Also that year, a male Customer Service Manager, Joe [last name unknown], was placed in the Manager Training Program. Joe, like myself, had held a Cashier position prior to working as a Customer Service Manager. However, despite our similar backgrounds, he was able to enter the Manager Training Program without having to gain sales floor experience.

8. I approached my District Manager [name unknown] in July 2001 regarding my frustration trying to gain promotion to management. Several days later, I told Store Manager Kehrees that I had discussed my concerns with the District Manager; Mr. Kehrees grew angry with me for doing so. A few days after my conversation with Mr. Kehrees, I was told that I was to work as an Assistant to the Department Manager of Health and Beauty Aids. Despite our previously good working relationship, Mr. Kehrees did not speak to me again after my reassignment.

9. Of the ten Assistant Managers in the Dekalb Wal-Mart, only three were female. There were no female Co-Managers at the DeKalb store during my employment with Wal-Mart.

10. Disheartened by my inability to advance to management, I decided to leave Wal Mart Stores in July 2001, after only one year with the Company.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and the State of Illinois that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 15, 2003, in Sycamore, Illinois.

I, Gail Lovejoy, declare:

1. I am female and reside in Florida. I have been an employee of Wal-Mart, Inc. for over 14 years, have worked at a Wal-Mart store and currently work at a Sam's Club.

2. I first went to work at a Wal-Mart store in Brooksville, Florida, in August 1988. I started out in receiving and helped open this as a new store. Shortly after the opening, I was moved to Claims as a clerk, where I worked for about a year. After some other short-term assignments, I was put in the Cash office where I worked for about six months. By this point I had been with Wal-Mart for about two years.

3. Sometime in 1991, I told Julie [last name unknown], the Store Manager, that I wanted to be an Assistant Manager. She told me that I would have to work as a Department Manager first, but there were no Department Manager positions open at the time. Within a few weeks, I was made Customer Service Manager and, approximately five months later, I was made Department Manager in Toys. By this time, Rick Watkins was the Store Manager.

4. I stayed in that job for about two years but never heard anything further about promotion to Assistant Manager, despite the fact that I continued to indicate my interest in becoming an Assistant Manager. Over a period of approximately six months, in 1991 and early 1992, I reminded Rick Watkins that I was interested in what they then called "the program," which was a management training program that lead to promotion to Assistant Manager. He always told me he would talk with the District Manager about my interest, but I never heard anything further or received any guidance or information about how to pursue promotion. I knew of no other way to express my interest in moving into management as there was no other way to apply for the program. Eventually, I concluded that I would never get a promotion.

5. In 1993, a new Sam's Club opened in New Port Richey, Florida. I requested a transfer, worked in receiving until shortly before the store opened, and have worked in Claims ever since.

6. Sometime in 1995, an overnight supervisor position opened up, and I spoke with Jeff Williams, who I think was an Area Manager at the time, about my interest in that job. He told me that I could not have the job because I had children and because I would be the only female locked in the store overnight with a male crew.

7. I have always had good evaluations and have never been disciplined at work.

8. At the Sam's Club where I work, almost everyone who works in Crafts, Lingerie, Clothing, Pets and Health and Beauty Aids is female. Almost everyone who works in Automotive, Sporting Goods, and Groceries is male. During the ten years I have been there, all but two of the Team Leaders (hourly supervisors), all but three of the Area Managers, and all but three of the Assistant Managers have been male. In all the years I have worked there, there has never been a female General Manager.

9. When I first started at Wal-Mart in 1988, I was making $4.00 an hour. By the time I transferred to Sam's in 1993, I was making only $7.45 an hour. When I started at Sam's, the General Manager, Allen Ashmore, gave me a $.50 merit raise to $7.95. He told me that brand new employees were starting at $6.00 an hour at that time and that I should be making more than $1.45 more than them with my five years of experience. Today I make $12.65 after nearly fifteen years with the company.

10. In January 2003 I saw a poster for a Manager in Training Program (MIT) to become an Assistant Manager, and I applied. In my 14 years with Wal-Mart, I had never seen a similar posting. There had never been a previous opportunity like this to apply for the management training or for a position of Assistant Manager.

11. On March 10, 2003, I was told that I would have an interview on March 11 with the Director of Operations, Mike Peel, for a position in MIT. Although I was cordially welcomed, his first question to me was whether I was willing to work weekends and holidays. He also asked me, very early in the interview, whether I would be willing to move if a promotion took me more than an hour away from home. He told me that the Assistant Manager job would involve working 55 hours a week for a maximum salary of $31,000 a year. He did not tell me how much I could expect to make as a General Manager of a Sam's Club. He did not talk about the number of Sam's Clubs that are planned to be opened within the next few years and the number of General Managers that will be required for the new clubs and due to attrition. He did not tell me that relocation might not be required, especially with the number of new clubs opening. He did not ask me about the fact that I am currently working towards a college degree, even though I had put that on my application.

12. When I indicated that I thought the salary was too low for the long hours, Mr. Peel asked if I would be interested in an Area Manager position instead. He told me that an Area Manager works only 45 hours a week but that the maximum salary for Area Manager is $29,000 a year. Three days later, two female friends and I were talking with the current Area Manager for receiving, Marley Bunker, and he told us that his current salary is $35,000.

13. On March 14, 2003, Bob Gleghorn, the General Manager, told me that Mr. Peel must have been mistaken about the maximum salary for Area Managers and that he thought it was $35,000.

14. On March 27, 2003, Mr. Peel visited our store and told me that I was not being selected for MIT but that he would keep me in mind for an Area Manager position. He said the reason I was not selected was because I thought the hours were too long for the salary. If he had explained the advancement opportunities to me at the interview, and what I might be able to make if I ever got a General Manager position, I would not have felt so negative about the MIT position.

15. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Florida that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 3rd, 2003, at Hudson Florida.

I, Kathleen MacDonald, declare:

1. I am female. I am over 18 years of age, and competent to testify in court. I have personal knowledge of the facts contained herein, and could and would testify to them in a court of law if requested to do so.

2. I currently reside in Aiken, South Carolina, where I have lived for the last twenty years. I have a certificate from vocational school and a high school degree. I also have prior retail and grocery experience. I worked at Kroger from 1988 - 1990 as a sales clerk, stocker and cashier before going to work for Wal-Mart.

3. In 1990, I went to work for Wal-Mart in Aiken, South Carolina because I had heard from some of my husband's friends that Wal-Mart was a good company to work for. I applied for a position as a clerk, cashier or stocker and was hired as a sales clerk for toys. Upon being hired, I was given an associate handbook and told to read it. I did so.

4. During the years I have worked at Wal-Mart, I have worked as an associate in the housewares department; the pets and furniture department; the lawn and garden department; the stationary department; the candy department; and as a checkout clerk. Currently I work as an associate in the candy department.

5. Since joining the candy department as an associate, I have consistently received "exceeds expectations" on my reviews. In addition, I have specifically been praised in my reviews for my honesty. True and correct copies of some of these reviews are attached hereto as Exhibits A and B.

6. At my store, many male associates brag about their pay. It is against Wal-Mart policy to discuss pay, but nevertheless these male employees have done so in my presence. Based upon their statements, in 1999, I became concerned that I was being paid less than the men in the store, because the pay they claimed to receive exceeded mine. The men who have discussed their pay in my presence and stated that they make more than me include "Bobby" (last name unknown), an associate who works in the sporting department, "Wesley" (last name unknown), an associate who works in the frozen foods department, John Cassimisina, who stocks paper goods and chemicals, John Cooper, an associate who works in the lawn and garden department, and Shane Jackson, a grocery stocker.

7. After hearing these men talk, in 1999 I complained about the pay issue to my Department Manager, Joel Batson. In response to my complaint, he said "women will never make as much money as men." When I asked why, he said "God made Adam first, and so women would always be second to men."

8. After receiving this response from Mr. Batson, I relayed the story to Ms. Queenie Turner, another associate at the store. In response to my story, she told me that she had once complained about her pay as compared to her male counterparts in the bakery department. Ms. Turner informed me that, after presenting her complaint, she was told that men would be paid more because they were the heads of household. Based upon these responses, I decided not to pursue the matter further at the store level.

9. Around that same time, there were several other women at my store who also complained about the fact that it seemed we were making less money than the men at the store, even though we were performing similar jobs and had similar levels of experience. Women who complained include: Ramona Hunt; Leanne Posten; Liz Boyd; Becky Benfield who was a former cashier; Thelma Davis, also a former cashier; and Jerri Jackson, lawn and garden dept manager.

10. Sometime a few months after my conversation with Mr. Batson, but still in 1999, Mary Smith, our Regional Personnel Manager, and Russ Berry, our District Manager, came to the store to visit. At that time, I and several others, including some of the women identified above, raised with the two of them that we believed the women were being paid less than the men for the same work. They promised they would get back to us within 30 days about this issue. We never heard anything from them again on the matter. Having complained as high as the Regional Personnel Manager about the issue, I did not know whom else to complain to, and thus did not raise the issue again for some time.

11. Two years later, however, we had a new Regional Personnel Manager, Gwen Cannon, who came for a store visit. This was in approximately June of 2001. Once again, I and several other women complained that we believed that we were being paid less than the men in the store. Gwen promised that she would look into the pay issue.

12. After this meeting with Ms. Cannon – and after this lawsuit was filed – I was given an 81 cent raise following an "internal wage analysis." Attached hereto as Exhibit C is a true and correct copy of my Associate's Commendation Form. The internal wage analysis apparently confirmed that I was being paid less than I should have been.

13. I was informed of the $.81 raise by Tim Mallet, who was my store manager at the time. He told me that the 81 cent raise was not a merit raise, nor was it a cost of living allowance raise. When I asked him to explain why I was getting the raise, all he would tell me was that Wal-Mart had determined I was "not at the level I should have been," so I was getting a raise. I was further told by Mr. Torgeson, the District Manager, that I should not tell anyone about the raise, because not everyone would be getting a raise. As a result of this raise, I went from approximately $9.25 to $10.04 an hour. Even after this raise, however, I still was not making as much as the male grocery stockers were being paid.

I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State of South Carolina that the foregoing is true and correct. Executed this 16 day of April, 2003 at Aiken, South Carolina.

I, Barbara Mack, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I am a 41 year old African American woman, currently employed as an Assistant Manager at a Wal-Mart store in Sumter, South Carolina. I am a single mother and have primary responsibility for my 12-year-old son. I have been employed by Wal-Mart since January 27, 1987.

3. When I joined the company, I had prior supervisory experience as a shift supervisor with Pizza Hut where I had supervised 10 employees. I applied at the Wal-Mart store in Manning, South Carolina to get a different type of experience although I was not sure of the specific advancement opportunities available within the company. I initially worked as a cashier and then a year later I was assigned to receiving. From approximately the summer of 1988 to approximately 1992 or 1993, I worked as a sales associate in Stationary and Electronics Department Manager. My performance evaluations were above standard and I was very interested in promotional opportunities in the company.

4. In approximately 1992 or 1993, I was promoted to Support Manager after Store Manager Jane McKeller, who had been promoted recently to Store Manager, offered me the position. In approximately the winter of 1994, Store Manager Danny Oswald transferred to the store. Store Manager Oswald removed me from the position of Support Manager after informing me that the position no longer existed. I called the Home Office and District Manager Mike LNU and both confirmed that the position no longer existed. I returned to my former position as Department Manager of Electronics and continued to express interest in promotion to Store Manager Danny Oswald.

5. In December 1996, I was transferred to the Loss Prevention department. I continued to work in the Manning, South Carolina store but my job responsibilities required me to travel to various stores to investigate security, fraud and shrink issues.

6. In May 1998, I asked District Manager Jerry Cole for the opportunity to participate in the Assistant Manager Training Program after I decided that I wanted a chance to go into management. My Loss Prevention District Manager, Jake McNeal, supported me in the process and I began my training in the Sumter, South Carolina store in June 1998.

7. I trained for ten weeks in the Sumter store. After my training was completed in September, I was assigned to work at a store in Columbia, South Carolina, an hour and 20 minutes from my home. Store Manager Charles Kenny told me that I had been assigned to this store because Assistant Managers could not train and work in the same store. However, I observed that male Assistant Manager Trainees James Primus and Joe Thompson were permitted to train and work in the Sumter store.

8. I worked very hard at the Columbia store and the Store Managers Ed Mason and Jim Crosland frequently would assign me to the most difficult areas in the store to clean them up. I was at the store for a year and a half, and finally, was assigned to the worst area of the store, Domestics, which I managed to organize.

9. I asked District Manager Cole for a transfer to a store closer to home on a number of occasions because I am a single mother. In January 2000, I was transferred to the Sumter, South Carolina store.

10. By the time of my transfer back to the Sumter store, I felt that I could run a store. I, consequently, expressed interest in a promotion to Store Manager Gary Ulmer. In February 2001, Store Manager Ulmer and I discussed my moving up in the company after Co-Manager Ann McClam was promoted to store manager. Store Manager Ulmer informed me that he thought I could perform the job responsibilities of a co-manager. Based on this and other discussions, I fully expected to be promoted to the position. However, a couple of weeks later, Store Manager Ulmer informed me that a man, Patrick

Ryan, had been selected to work as co-manager because he had food experience and that I would be ready for promotion in a few months.

11. Co-Manager Ryan had only been an employee of Wal-Mart for a short period of time when he transferred to the Sumter store in April 2001. Because of his limited experience with Wal-Mart, Store Manager Ulmer asked me to train him. As a result, I worked closely with Mr. Ryan. Almost immediately, Co-Manager Ryan started to touch me in an offensive way. He would, frequently, touch me including brushing up against me, touching my butt and massaging my shoulders. He would also make inappropriate remarks. For example, at one point he asked that I join him in his hotel room to watch television despite the fact that we were not friends and had no relationship beside a working relationship within the store. Although I did not tell Store Manager Ulmer of each of these incidents, I did tell him that I did not like to work with Co-Manager Ryan and, eventually, had my schedule changed so that I would work with Co-Manager Ryan as little as possible. I did not tell Store Manager Ulmer the details of what occurred because I feared that I would lose my opportunity for promotion to co-manager.

12. On a Saturday in August 2001, Co-Manager Ryan came into the administrative office where I was working typing the Back to School plan for the store for District Manager Patsy Williams. Co-Manager Ryan came into the office and while my back was turned raised my shirt up as if he was attempting to take it off. I turned to stop him and pushed him against the wall. I told him that I was going to tell Store Manager Ulmer about the incident and told him to take his hands off of me. I then left the room humiliated and embarrassed by the experience. The next day Store Manager Ulmer, who was off, called in to check on the store. I answered his questions and told him about Co-Manager Ryan raising my shirt. Store Manager Ulmer assured me that he would take care of it the next day.

13. However, Store Manager Ulmer did not raise the matter the next day. Two days after the incident, Gary Ulmer called me from his cell phone to tell me had spoken to Co-Manager Ryan and that he, Co-Manager Ryan and I would sit down and talk about it. He also told me that he would do an investigation. Approximately a week later, I had not heard anything and I went to talk to District Manager Williams whose office was in the Sumter store. I told District Manager Williams what had happened and that Co-Manager Ryan liked to touch me. She told me that she would investigate it but then left town to attend the annual company meeting in Dallas.

14. During this period, I was still required to work with Co-Manager Ryan although I was uncomfortable doing so. Weeks after District Manager Williams and Store Manager Ulmer returned from the Dallas meeting neither had spoken to me about my complaint and I called the Home Office for assistance. I spoke to a woman named Melissa in the Home Office about what had happened and she told me that she would get back in touch with me. A short time later, Melissa called to tell me that she had spoken to District Manager Williams and that Ms. Williams would follow up. Approximately, a week and a half later I spoke to District Manager Williams who told me that after an investigation she had concluded that something had happened but that I had exaggerated. I denied that I had exaggerated and told her that Co-Manager Ryan had raised my shirt. At no time did District Manager Williams talk to me about Co-Manager Ryan's conduct toward me as part of her investigation. She then told me that she had disciplined Co-Manager Ryan but that she could not be specific about how he had been disciplined because it was confidential. District Manager Williams told me that she wanted me to go downstairs, continue to work with Co-Manager Ryan and perform for her the way I had always done. Because I believed I had no other choice but to continue to work with Co-Manager in order to keep my job, I did as District Manager Williams directed and continued to work with Co-Manager Ryan despite the discomfort I felt.

15. After I complained about Co-Manager Ryan's behavior, Store Manager Ulmer and District Manager Williams changed in their attitude toward me. Store Manager Ulmer no longer discussed the possibility of my promotion to co-manager. Rather, he began to tell me that I had people issues and that I needed to work on my "deliverance." He also complained to me about the fact that I had gone over his head to complain about Co-Manager Ryan. District Manager Williams no longer requested that I assist her in completing STAR Reports at various stores. She also no longer requested that I assist her in putting together plans for the store. Before I complained she would include me in both of these activities. I saw these as opportunities for me to get to know District Manager Williams better since she would influence whether or not I got a promotion or not.

16. I knew that my chances for promotion were doomed when I received an evaluation in 2002 that included input concerning my strengths and areas of improvement from Co-Manager Ryan, the very person against whom I had made my complaint. I raised my concern about Co-Manager Ryan's providing input and informed Store Manager Ulmer and District Manager Williams that I believed that I was being treated differently because of my gender. Exhibit A. However, both ignored my concern.

17. Co-Manager Ryan transferred out of the Sumter store in October 2002. He was replaced by another male, Chris Hanson who has less experience than I have as an Assistant Manager. I had not been given the chance to apply and I was not interviewed for the position. Instead, I have been told that I need to work on people issues. I believe that this is retaliation for my complaining about sexual harassment and gender discrimination because I have observed that male associates, Jim Crosland and Bobbie Green, were terminated for sexual harassment or other people issues and were then rehired and promoted to store manager and Rising Star, respectively.

18. Store Manager Ulmer has recently continued to retaliate against me by attempting to transfer me to a store in Florence, South Carolina without discussing it with me. I was not transferred after I spoke to District Manager Williams about the issue. However, Store Manager Ulmer does not allow me to fully do my job and insists that I go to Co-Manager Chris Hanson before I do anything. I find this to be particularly insulting since I have more experience than he has and am qualified to perform my job with little or no supervision.

19. Each of the stores in which I have worked and that I visited while I worked in Loss Prevention operated in the same manner. I was not required to receive any additional training to work in any of the stores in which I worked. Currently, I am working with a team of associates from the Sumter store to set up a new Supercenter that is opening in Sumter, South Carolina in May 2003. I have not received any additional training to set up the store and am not expected to go through any additional training to work at the store.

20. I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of ________ that the foregoing is true and correct.

I, Sandra Marshall, declare:

1. I am a female, former employee of Sam's Club. I quit after 13 years because believed that the male management at Sam's Club retaliated against me when I demanded to be paid at the same rate as a male employee.

2. I began working at the Houston, Texas Sam's Club in November 1984. I applied for a cashier position, but was asked to work in the "Center Section," which includes Health and Beauty, Candy and Office Supplies. Within six months, I was promoted to "Team Lead", an hourly supervisory role, of the Center Section. In November 1985, I requested and received a transfer to the Sam's Club in San Antonio, Texas.

3. As an hourly employee between 1984 and 1991, I received an "exceeds expectation' or the equivalent on each and every evaluation, and was selected as "employee of the month" at least four or five times, I never used a single "personal" or "sick" day, and as a result, forfeited over 140 hours of paid leave when I was promoted to a salaried position in 1991.

4. In 1991, my supervisor Larry Thibeaux at the San Antonio store asked me if I was interested in joining the Management Training Program. I was required by Sam's Club to transfer to the Austin, Texas store in order to receive management training. After three months in Austin, I completed the program, and was promoted to Assistant Manager. I stayed in Austin for almost year and a half.

5. I never refused to transfer to other locations when requested by Sam's Club. I transferred, at the request of Sam's Club, to Arlington, Texas in April 1992. Within several months of arriving at the Arlington store, I was asked if I would transfer to a "Pace" store in order to assist in its conversion to a Sam's Club. I was given a. choice of three locations, and chose to transfer to Albuquerque, New Mexico.

6. Once the Albuquerque conversion was completed, I requested and received a transfer to Fort Worth, Texas, where I continued my employment as a salaried Assistant Manager. At the Fort Worth store, a female employee in the TLE department complained to me of foul language used by other male employees. I wrote a note summarizing the complaint and gave it to District Manager Carlton Walls. General Manager Bob Arnold told me that the female employee would "get over it." Shortly after a submitted the complaint, District Manager Walls transferred me to Grand Prairie, Texas.

7. As an Assistant Manager, I was required to work 55 hours per week. In addition, I spent extra hours working when necessary so that I could complete special projects. My evaluations for the six years that I was a salaried Assistant Manager were, like my evaluations as an hourly employee, exemplary.

8. When my brother became terminally ill in 1996, I wanted to reduce the number of hours that I was required to work. I asked my General Manager, Mike Wanzer to transfer me to a position as an hourly Assistant Manager, where I would be required to work only 40 hours per week. He deferred me to his supervisor, Director of Operations Craig Winstat. Mr. Winstat told me that if I transferred, my hourly wage would be reduced to $10.00 per hour.

9. I contested the reduction with Mr. Winstat, and informed him that a male hourly Assistant Manager, John Johnson, did not receive such a drastic reduction when he transferred from a salaried position. I knew this because Mr. Johnson and I worked together as Assistant Managers in the Fort Worth and Grand Prairie stores, and we discussed his transfer to an hourly position. Mr. Winstat told me that Mr. Johnson was paid more because he was better qualified than me. To my knowledge, Mr. Winstat was new to Sam's Club, and never worked with Mr. Johnson. After several days of dispute, my salary was reduced to $13.00 per hour, and I was transferred at Mr. Winstat's direction to the Richmond Hills, Texas Sam's Club.

10. My General Manager in Richmond Hills was Byron Lindemann, with whom I had worked at the Grand Prairie store. Mr. Johnson followed Mr. Lindemann to the Richmond Hills store shortly before I received my transfer there. Assistant Manager Rick Burris, worked with me and Byron Lindemann at the Grand Prairie store, and transferred to Richmond Hills after Mr. Lindemann. Mr. Burris was a Team Lead at Grand Prairie, and I had been his immediate supervisor. Craig Winstat was still my Director of Operations.

11. Upon assuming an hourly position in Richmond Hills, I was treated differently that Mr. Johnson, who was also hourly. Mr. Lindemann was aware of the salary reduction dispute with Mr. Winstat, and informed that me that he would expect more from me because I was getting paid more. In contrast, Mr. Johnson was treated much more leniently, and not required to take on as much responsibility, even though we received comparable pay.

12. I wrote a letter complaining of mistreatment to Regional Vice President Brad Link. Shortly after I wrote the letter to Mr. Link, Assistant Manager Rick Burris called me into his office and informed me that I was stocking incorrectly. He directed me to pull down fewer products in the Candy Department. For the next week, I stocked the candy section as instructed by Mr. Burris. About a week later, Mr. Burris called me into his office again, and informed me that the stocking procedure, which he had shown me, was incorrect. He told me that I was not pulling enough product down to stock, and he gave me a written coaching.

13. The night I received the coaching was the last night I worked at Sam's Club. I found another job. I returned to Sam's Club about two weeks later and filled out an exit interview, where stated that I left for another job, even though the primary reason that I left was because of retaliation from my male supervisors. I told this to Assistant Manager Lloyed Lyons, who did not write it on my exit interview.

14. During my career at Sam's Club, spanning 13 years and seven 7 stores, I did not work for any female District or Regional Managers. I received outstanding performance reviews until was placed under the management of Byron Lindemann. I believe that the male managers, including Rick Burris, Byron Lindemann, and John Johnson at my store formed a male "clique" which excluded, and discriminated against women.

15. I contacted the EEOC and made a written complaint for discrimination against Sam' Club in October 1997, shortly after I terminated my employment.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Texas that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 13, 2003, in the City of Glenn Heights, State of Texas.

I, Nancy Martin, declare that:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I began working full-time for a Wal-Mart Store in Janesville, Wisconsin in May 1989 as a customer service manager making $3.50 an hour. In my application, I wrote that I was applying for a management trainee position. Attached hereto as Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of my Wal-Mart Application for Employment. In the resume that I submitted with my application, I specifically noted that my objective was "retail management trainee position with opportunity for advancement. Willing to relocate." I had also had experience as General Manager of a floral and craft supply store. Attached hereto as Exhibit B is a true and correct copy of the resume I submitted along with my Wal-Mart Application for Employment.

3. Upon being hired, I immediately and persistently spoke with both Store Manager Bob Morey and District Manager Jeff Kraus about my interest in moving into a management position. I spoke with them casually, as well as during my evaluations and in individual meetings with each of them to discuss my career goals. Each told me that, in order for me to enter the management training program, I would be required to relocate. I asked Mr. Kraus if he might make an exception for me because I wished to stay with my family in Janesville, but he refused.

4. In 1991, I had a meeting with Mr. Morey and he told me I could join the management training program but that I would be required to relocate to the Whitewater, Wisconsin Wal-Mart Store, which I did. A few months later, after training, I voluntarily relocated again in order to become an assistant manager position in a new Wal-Mart Store in Ashland, Wisconsin.

5. In 1995, I transferred to an assistant manager position in a Wal-Mart Store in Anchorage, Alaska. While I was working in Anchorage, Alaska, a new male assistant manager, John Halpaus, was hired. I learned that he was making $6,000 more than I was. At the time, I had been an Assistant Manager for four years longer than he had been. I had always been told I would be fired for discussing salary issues so I never discussed this pay difference with anyone for fear that I might lose my job.

6. In the Summer of 1995, I initiated the development of a new scheduling program in the Anchorage, Alaska Wal-Mart. I had a meeting with District Manager David Carmen about the program. In that meeting, Mr. Carmen criticized the work I had been doing with the scheduling program but he did not give me any ideas about ways I could improve. He then told me I had been assigned a "problem" store and that I was never going to go anywhere in my career at Wal-Mart. I was surprised by these statements and, during the conversation, I got the feeling that Mr. Carmen did not like me and did not want me in my position. I then spoke with Store Manager Mark Divis about my meeting with Mr. Carmen and he told me not to worry about it and to just get the scheduling done. He also did not give me any information about ways in which I could get assistance developing this program. Finally, I decided to contact customer service managers in several Wal-Mart Stores in the lower 48 stores in order to get the guidance and support that I needed to develop and implement what eventually became a successful scheduling program.

7. In 1998, I was still interested in advancing in my career at Wal-Mart. In May 1998 I agreed to transfer as an assistant manager to another Anchorage, Alaska Wal-Mart Store because District Manager Mark Divis (recently promoted from Store Manager) told me it would improve my chances of promotion.

8. That same month, I also had a meeting with the store manager in my new store, Gary Harvey, about my career goals. I told him I was still interested in advancing in my Wal-Mart career. Mr. Harvey told me that I was not yet ready to move into co-manager position in part because I had come from a "bad" store. He did not elaborate on what that meant. He told me he wanted to "see what happens" in the future but he would make no commitments towards my future advancement or me.

9. In October 1998, I transferred to a Wal-Mart Store in Richland Center, Wisconsin in order to care for my ill mother. In August 2000, while an assistant manager in Richland Center, Wisconsin, I noticed a posting on the manager's computer system (The Manager's Workbench) for an assistant manager position in Anchorage, Alaska. I called Alaska District Manager (he had since been promoted from Store Manager) Gary Harvey to discuss the possibility of moving up in my career at Wal-Mart Stores in Alaska. Mr. Harvey was non-committal, only stating that he didn't know of anyone who had moved back into an Alaska Wal-Mart after having moved out and he wasn't sure if it was even possible. This statement led me to believe he was not interested in helping me advance in my Wal-Mart career in Alaska and I felt he was trying to discourage me from even trying. By this time, I had talked with at least five different managers over a period of nine years and not a single one had encouraged my interest.

10. Despite Mr. Harvey's discouraging words, I decided to apply for this lateral move. I had an interview with a female Regional Personnel Manager Stacey Simon. Within a week, she told me I was qualified and had gotten the position.

11. In September 2000, I asked for meeting with District Manager Harvey to discuss my career advancement at Wal-Mart. Despite having been an assistant manager for ten years and receiving excellent evaluations, Mr. Harvey told me he didn't think

I could "handle" being a store manager and that I would have to wait another three to five years before he might allow me to manage a "small" store. I found this extremely discouraging and demoralizing. At that time, I really started to doubt whether I was ever going to receive the management support necessary for me to successfully advance in my career at Wal-Mart. The following year, a position came open for a store manager in an Alaska Wal-Mart. In order to post for a position, I knew that I needed to have the approval of my district manager. Based on my conversation with Mr. Harvey, I was certain that he would not give his approval so I did not bother to apply.

12. A couple of months after my conversation with Mr. Harvey, I saw Regional Personnel Manager Stacey Simon at a management training about preventing union activity. During a break, I spoke with her about my interest in moving up and whether there she knew anything about available management positions. She told me there was nothing available at the time. She did not give me any information about ways in which I could improve my chances of promotion.

13. In 2001, Co-Manager Allen Manderson and I were in the manager's office in my store discussing whether an associate should be terminated. I disagreed with Mr. Manderson's opinion that the associate should be terminated and he responded, "You need to grow some balls." I felt this was a highly inappropriate, sexist, and offensive comment. At the time, I was afraid to tell my current Store Manager Todd Childers because he was a buddy of Mr. Manderson's.

14. By late 2001, it became abundantly clear to me that I was not going to be allowed to move up in my career at Wal-Mart and that I was not getting the support I needed from management and I began looking for other positions. In January, 2002, I left my employment with Wal-Mart for a position as a Branch Manager at Alaska USA Federal Credit Union. I felt that I needed to find a workplace where I would be encouraged to succeed. On my Exit Interview, I noted that I was leaving due to a lack of promotional opportunities. Attached hereto as Exhibit C is a true and correct copy of my Exit Interview.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Alaska that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on March 17, 2003, at Anchorage, Alaska.

DECLARATION OF IRMA MATHIS IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Irma Mathis, declare:

1. I am a current Wal-Mart employee.

2. I am a forty-three year old, single mother of three daughters, who are ages 15, 17 and 19. I am also helping to raise my grandchild who is three years old. I want to be a role model for daughters so that they will believe that they can get ahead in life. While working at Wal-Mart, I attended college and received a Bachelor of Arts degree from the University of Texas at San Antonio. I have been trying to turn my job at Wal-Mart into a career.

3. I worked for Wal-Mart as an hourly employee from January 1996 until August 2002. During that time, I worked as a cashier, as a sales associate in the softlines, domestics/bedding, fabrics, sporting goods, electronics, claims, courtesy desk and layaway departments, and as layaway department manager. I worked in Wal-Mart store no. 458 in Aransas Pass, Texas, Wal-Mart store no. 1198 in San Antonio, Texas, and in a Wal-Mart Supercenter no. 2864 in San Antonio, Texas.

3. I have tried to contribute to Wal-Mart in ways that go beyond the requirements of my position. While I was layaway department manager in store no. 1198, I compiled layaway procedures from Wal-Mart's Home Office into a training manual for the layaway employees and made checklists to assist them in learning the material. In Supercenter no. 2864, I volunteered to serve on the hiring committee. During set up of that store, I oversaw two teams and took responsibility for training new employees. For approximately one year, two co-workers and I wrote a newsletter for the employees in Supercenter no. 2864.

4. I received annual performance evaluations while working at Wal-Mart. On each of my annual evaluations, I was rated either "above standard" or "meets expectations." I have not been disciplined for my work performance.

5. I worked at Wal-Mart for more time than many of the other employees at Supercenter no. 2864. Store Manager Mark Antilley repeatedly referred to me and several other female employees as the store's "seasoned associates."

6. In approximately late 2000 or early 2001, I decided that I wanted to enter the First in Line training program. The First in Line program is a management training program for college students. At the time, I was studying at the University of Texas, so I believed that I would fit into the program well.

7. I had many discussions with Store Manager Mark Antilley about my interest in being promoted into the First in Line program. On one occasion, Mr. Antilley told me that I needed to develop "people skills." I do not know what he meant by that. I had overseen the work of other Wal-Mart employees as layaway department manager and during the store set-up. I was not disciplined or reprimanded for having a problems working with these employees. Mr. Antilley did not tell me what "people skills" I lacked or how I should go about developing "people skills." On another occasion when I spoke to Mr. Antilley about getting promoted into the First in Line program, Mr. Antilley told me that I needed to work as a merchandise department manager. I had already worked as manager of the layaway department. On one occasion, I asked Mr. Antilley for information about the First in Line program. Mr. Antilley told me that he would talk to District Manager Ron Kircher to find out how the program worked and get back to me. Mr. Antilley never got back to me. On an occasion when I approached Mr. Antilley for help getting into the First in Line program, Mr. Antilley told me that he would give a copy of my resume to Regional Personnel Manager Pedro Androtti. I gave Mr. Antilley a copy of my resume, but did not hear anything. After giving him my resume, I followed up with Mr. Antilley. He always told me that he did not have any information for me.

8. In spring 2002 after Plaintiffs' attorneys disclosed my name as a witness in this case, I contacted Regional Vice President Larry Williams by email. Because I was scheduled to graduate from college in August 2002, I was concerned that I would not be eligible for the First in Line program any longer. In that email message, I told Mr. Williams about the problems that I was having getting into the First in Line Program.

9. In response to my email message to Mr. Williams, a manager from Wal-Mart's People Division named Jill Wesbecher telephoned me. Ms. Wesbecher described the First in Line program to me and gave me some information about Wal-Mart's other Management Training Program. Shortly after my telephone conversation with Ms. Wesbecher, Regional Vice President Pedro Androtti called me. Mr. Androtti told me that he had not received a copy of my resume and asked me to send one to him. In approximately June or July 2002, I was accepted into the First in Line program.

10. After I was promoted, but before I transferred to the store where I was to do my training, Store Manager Mark Antilley spoke to me about the fact that I had contacted Wal-Mart's regional management. Mr. Antilley was visibly upset. He told me that store issues should be kept at the store level. He also told me that I would have to prove my loyalty to my new Store Manager.

11. Other than myself, I am aware of only one female employee who was promoted into one of Wal-Mart's management training programs from Supercenter no. 2864. I am aware of six male employees who were promoted into a management training program from Supercenter no. 2864. Their names are Roland Pacheco, Chad Brooks, Anthony Hall, Frank Gonzalez, Jason Caldwell, and Henry Diaz. As far as I am aware, none of these men had worked for Wal-Mart for as long as I had.

12. Store Manager Mark Antilley told me that women have to be "bitches" to survive in Wal-Mart management. I received a performance evaluation in approximately October 2000. In the section entitled "areas for improvement," I am described as "overbearing." A true and correct copy of this evaluation is attached hereto as Mathis Exhibit A. In approximately November 2002, I had a conversation with an Assistant Manager named David Ash. Mr. Ash told me that I needed to be more assertive.

13. I completed the First in Line program and am currently an Assistant Manager. As my first assignment as an Assistant Manager, I am working the overnight shift at a store that is located forty-six miles from my home. Driving over ninety miles daily and working during the night prevents me from spending as much time with my daughters as I would like. I am making these sacrifices because I want to have a career at Wal-Mart.

14. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Texas that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on 3-27-03, 2003, at San Antonio, Tx.

Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ

DECLARATION OF LORI B. MCCARTHY IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Lori B. McCarthy, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I am female. I graduated from Florida State University in April 1991 with a degree in clothing and textiles.

3. Prior to working for Wal-Mart Stores, I held positions as Intern for Neiman Marcus, Assistant Manager for Strawberry Fields, and Salesperson for Publix Supermarket, Coles Meat Wine & Cheese Shop, and Jordan Marsh.

4. Following my graduation from college, I had a ten-year career with Wal-Mart Stores from May 20, 1991 through August 31, 2001.

5. Throughout my tenure at Wal-Mart, I consistently received high ratings on my performance evaluations. I was asked to relocate eight times during my career; I did so because I believed it would increase my chances of being promoted to Store Manager. Nevertheless, between 1999 and 2001, my eighteen applications for Store Manager positions all were denied.

6. I entered the Manager Training Program in 1991 at the Fort Walton Beach, Florida Wal-Mart. Following my training, my supervisor commented in my performance evaluation that I would make an "excellent member of management." Attached hereto as McCarthy Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of my Management Trainee Ten Week Performance Appraisal and Plan of Action, dated August 19, 1991. I was promoted to Assistant Manager of the Fort Walton Beach Wal-Mart in August 1991.

7. I transferred to the Destin, Florida Wal-Mart in January 1992. My District Manager, Jerry Neal, frequently came into the Destin store to discuss business matters such as finance, budgeting, and profitability with the male Store Manager. He also included male Assistant Manager, Robert Browning, in these conversations. Although I expressed an interest in participating, Mr. Neal excluded me from these discussions.

8. Mr. Neal transferred me to the Sunrise, Florida Wal-Mart in August 1992. As the only female Assistant Manager at the Sunrise store, my two Store Managers, Steve Mastaler and Gary DeCoque, treated me more harshly than the other Assistant Managers. Mr. DeCoque scheduled me for overnight shifts, criticized the stockroom for which I was responsible, and generally was more abrupt with me than my male colleagues. In 1993, Mr. Mastaler denied my two-week vacation request for my honeymoon. I complained to my District Manager, Steve Daniel, about this because I knew another male employee [name unknown] who had been granted a two-week leave for his vacation. However, Mr. Daniel supported Mr. Mastaler's decision and denied my request for a two-week leave.

9. While at the Sunrise store, Mr. Mastaler commented on my performance evaluation, dated February 11, 1993, that I would be ready for a Co-Manager position in two to three years. Attached hereto as McCarthy Exhibit B is a true and correct copy of my Management Performance Appraisal and Commitment to Success. Similarly, on a performance appraisal dated September 30, 1993, Mr. DeCoque stated that in two years I would be ready for my own store. Attached hereto as McCarthy Exhibit C is a true and correct copy of my Management Performance Appraisal and Commitment to Success. Mr. DeCoque later noted on my performance appraisal dated February 17, 1994, that I had a good future with the company and was "an asset to the store." Attached hereto as McCarthy Exhibit D is a true and correct copy of my Management Performance Appraisal and Commitment to Success.

10. In April 1994, Mr. DeCoque transferred me to the Pompano Beach, Florida Wal-Mart. Eight months later, I requested a relocation to the Florence, South Carolina Wal-Mart. I believed moving to South Carolina would help me get promoted to Store Manager because two of my former colleagues, then

District Manager Ron Cook and Store Manager Robert Browning, were located there. I felt that their familiarity with my previous work would increase my chances for a promotion to Store Manager in the near future.

11. I was not promoted during the sixteen months I spent at the Florence store. In January 1996, I told my new District Manager, Jerry Cole, and my Regional Personnel Manager [name unknown] that I wished to transfer back to Florida. Five months later, after I consistently was told there were no available positions, I contacted District Manager Steve Mastaler in Florida directly. Mr. Mastaler said there was an open position and I transferred to the Port St. Lucie, Florida store in May 1996.

12. I was promoted to Co-Manager of the Port St. Lucie store in November 1997, after six years as Assistant Manager. My Store Manager, Jeff Smith, and I spoke a number of times about my interest in promotion. On my Management Performance Appraisal dated March 1, 1997, Mr. Smith stated that I was "ready to be Co-Manager [and I have] the capacity to be a Store Manager, or higher, with Wal-Mart." Attached hereto as McCarthy Exhibit E is a true and correct copy of my Management Performance Appraisal. During a regional team visit in 1997, Mr. Smith recommended to Mr. Mastaler and the Regional Vice President, Arthur Emanuel, that I be promoted to Co-Manager. I witnessed Mr. Mastaler shake his head vehemently against this suggestion. Mr. Smith also submitted a letter on my behalf that stated my "training was 100% up to date, [I] had participated in three store set ups, [I was] involved in store activities, [I] show that [I] care for the associates, and [I] participate in the community." Attached hereto as McCarthy Exhibit F is a true and correct copy of this letter. Mr. Emmanuel approved my promotion.

13. After I received my March 31, 1998 evaluation, Mr. Smith told me that Mr. Mastaler had instructed him to lower my performance score because the score that Mr. Smith initially gave me was too high. Mr. Smith gave me a copy of the evaluation he originally prepared, which had a performance rating of 4.23. In the copy that I received from Mr. Mastaler, my rating dropped to 3.68. Attached hereto as McCarthy Exhibit G are true and correct copies of the Management Performance Appraisal Mr. Smith gave me and the Management Performance Appraisal Mr. Mastaler gave me.

14. In August 1998, Mr. Mastaler transferred me to the Stuart, Florida store. By early 1999, I felt I was ready to manage my own store. I asked Mr. Mastaler about what I needed to do to be promoted to Store Manager. He responded that I should "lower my voice because it sounded too high." He did not elaborate when I asked for further clarification.

15. By April 1998, I had posted sixteen applications for Store Manager on Wal-Mart's Management Career Selection system. In the spring of 1999, my Regional Personnel Manager, Ethan Minkel, contacted me regarding my recent applications for promotion to Store Manager. While he did not offer me my own store, he told me accepting the Co-Manager position at the Florida City store would be good move forward for my career at Wal-Mart. He stated that the position in Florida City would enable me to learn more about the process of opening a new store as well as give me the opportunity to work in a Super-center, which would improve my chances of promotion.

16. Heeding the advice of my Regional Personnel Manager, I accepted the Co-Manager position in the Florida City, Florida store in July 1999. Wal-Mart sent me to the Home Office for three days to learn basic information about opening a store; however, I received no formal training when I arrived in the Florida City store.

17. My Store Manager at the Florida City store was Monte Marshall. Mr. Marshall often left me out of business discussions that he had with the other male Co-Managers in the store, Steve Pugh, Victor [last name unknown], and Mike Williams. Similarly, District Manager Dave Chmura ignored me and only discussed business issues with the Store Manager and the male Co-Managers. I voiced my concern about this lack of attention to Mr. Chmura in 2000, but he did not change his behavior.

18. Unbeknownst to me, Mr. Chmura administered Associate Opinion Surveys on two separate occasions to associates in the Florida City store. Only 36 of the roughly 213 employees I supervised offered feedback. Despite the lack of associate response, Mr. Chmura told me that I had received poor ratings from those who I supervised and that someone with my scores should receive a demotion. His actions shocked me because this was the first coaching I had received after nearly ten years at Wal-Mart Stores and because I previously had been praised for my strong people skills. Although I was not demoted, I felt he treated me unfairly because he was not following Wal-Mart's disciplinary procedures. Attached hereto as McCarthy Exhibit A, Exhibit E, Exhibit H, Exhibit I, and Exhibit J are true and correct copies of my Management Performance Appraisals.

19. After my coaching with Mr. Chmura, I met with my Regional Vice President, Rose Reza, to discuss my concerns. Ms. Reza confided in me that there were obstacles to overcome working with men at Wal-Mart and there was little I could do to change my situation. She recommended that I learn how to work within the system.

20. In January 2001, my District Manager, Freddie Miller, asked me to go to the Miramar, Florida store to assist with hiring new associates. Although the Miramar store was significantly farther away from my home, almost 70 miles, I agreed to help temporarily.

21. In 2001, I expressed to District Manager Miller my desire to run my own store. Mr. Miller responded that he would not promote me because he did not know me well enough. He also stated that he probably would promote Mike Williams, a Co-Manager with less experience than me, to Store Manager simply because Mr. Miller was better acquainted with Mr. Williams.

22. Despite my previous assertion to Mr. Miller that I did not want to transfer permanently to the Miramar store, he transferred me without my knowledge. I learned of this when I went online to apply for the Store Manager position at the Florida City store and discovered that I was not listed as a Florida City store employee. When I approached Mr. Miller about this, he informed me that he no longer needed three Co-Managers at the Florida City store. I told Mr. Miller, as well as my Regional Personnel Manager at the time, that I wished to be placed at a store closer to home.

23. I remained at the Miramar store from March 2001 through August 2001. My Store Manager at the Miramar store, Roosevelt Jackson, left the store two months after I began working there. I applied for the open Store Manager position, but Mark Kurkin, Co-Manager of the Hialeah, Florida Supercenter, received the position instead. Mr. Kurkin previously had worked closely with Freddie Miller.

24. I resigned from Wal-Mart stores on August 31, 2001. In my resignation letter, I stated that I was "leaving the company for various reasons but the main reason [was] my company's lack of confidence in me to be a Store Manager." Attached hereto as McCarthy Exhibit K is a true and correct copy of my resignation letter.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Florida that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 12, 2003, at Port St Lucie, Florida.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, EDITH ARANA, DEBORAH GUNTER, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, CLEO PAGE, KAREN WILLIAMSON, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiffs, v. WAL-MART STORES, INC., Defendant.	CASE NO. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF ALIX MCKENNA IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Alix McKenna, declare:

1. I am a 45-year-old female living in Lawrence, Kansas. I worked at three Wal-Mart stores during the following time periods: Manhattan, Kansas, store from April, 1996, until June, 1996; Bonner Springs, Kansas, store from March, 1998, to September, 1998; and Lawrence, Kansas, store from September, 1998, to March, 1999, and from August, 1999, to December 31, 2002.

2. I have been subjected to gender discrimination by Wal-Mart with regard to compensation, promotions and work assignments.

3. During my Wal-Mart career, I almost always received "Exceeds Expectations" ratings on my Performance Appraisals, but was never promoted to a level higher than a Department Manager position.

4. In August, 1999, I worked as a Sales Associate in the Sporting Goods Department at Wal-Mart's Lawrence, Kansas, store. In approximately October or November, 1999, the Sporting Goods Department Manager, Sal Cugno, transferred departments, which left a vacancy for this position. I applied for this position and was interviewed by Dean [last name unknown], a male Assistant Manager. On the same day that my interview took place, Dean informed me that Brian Garrett, a male Lawn and Garden Sales Associate with less seniority than me and no sporting goods or managerial experience, received the Sporting Goods Department Manager job. I complained to Dean that I was more qualified for the position, but he just said: "You don't want to work with guns." When I explained to Dean that I had been selling and handing guns for the past two months as an Associate in Sporting Goods and had no problem working with them, Dean had no response.

5. As a testament to my superior qualifications for the Sporting Goods Department Manager position, I trained Mr. Garrett in his new position for approximately two months. After training Mr. Garrett in the job, Mr. Garrett admitted to me that during his 90-Day Evaluation, Wal-Mart told him that he had been selected to be promoted into Support Manager and then Assistant Manager positions, but that he needed to be a Department Manager first.

6. In late 1999, I became the Pets Department Manager. I accepted the assignment and received a raise of $.50 per hour. I know that this $.50 per hour raise was much lower than the raise received by Dennis Lowe, a male, when he was promoted to this same position (as my successor) when I transferred positions. Mr. Lowe confided in me that he received a $1.00 per hour raise when he was promoted from a Sales Associate position in the Sporting Goods Department to the Pets Department Manager. This was the identical job path that I had taken, yet I only received half the raise that Mr. Lowe received.

7. When I assumed responsibility as the Pets Department Manager, the department staff was severely cut and I did not have any assistants to help me, thus making my job very difficult and stressful. I feel that this was discriminatory treatment because the two previous male Pets Department Managers both had sufficient staff and assistants to help them. It was not until I became the Pets Department Manager that staff and assistants were cut. I complained about having no assistants to Dean, the Assistant Manager, John Mercer, the Store Manager, and Tom Cundy, the District Manager, but all of these men ignored my complaints.

8. In approximately April, 2000, I transferred jobs to become a Claims Associate, which Richard Chappelle, the Store Manager, considered a "lateral move." Accordingly, Mr. Chappelle refused to give me a raise. However, Mr. Lowe (the male who succeeded me as Pets Department Manager) told me that when he made a "lateral" move from Pets Department Manager to the Hardware Department Manager, he received another $1.25 per hour raise. I now see how unfair and gender-biased Wal-Mart' s compensation system is when I compare myself directly with Mr. Lowe, who received much higher raises than I did for making comparable job changes.

9. Another male Wal-Mart employee, Jason Culver, a Sporting Goods Department Manager (a job that was comparable to my Claims Associate position), told me that he made a higher hourly wage than I did for doing comparable work.

10. When I was assigned to become an Instock Guarantor I only received a raise of $.50 per hour. I complained to Mr. Chappelle, the Store Manager, that I should receive a higher raise, but he responded that the highest raise he could provide me was $.50 per hour. I later learned from Connie Underwood, the Personnel Manager, that Mr. Chappelle had previously authorized raises higher than $.50 per hour for this position, including a raise for Dennis Lowe, a male.

11. I have utilized the Open Door Policy on numerous occasions, including sending e-mail communications to Lee Scott, Wal-Mart CEO, in August, 2000, and February, 2001, in which I and Dedra Farmer, a former fellow female Wal-Mart employee, addressed our concerns that women were not provided equal pay at Wal-Mart. During my employment at Wal-Mart, the company did not adequately respond to the gender-based pay issues raised by Ms. Farmer and me.

12. Wal-Mart terminated my employment on December 31,2002. Wal-Mart justified my termination by wrongfully concluding that I was guilty of "time theft," claiming that I took too many breaks during my shifts or that the breaks I took were too lengthy. Wal-Mart never provided me with a warning concerning the purported infraction. I used the Open Door Policy and appealed my termination to the Home Office, which investigated the situation and upheld the termination but stated that I was terminated for clocking in early, not for "time theft." I believe that Wal-Mart' s stated reasons for terminating me are without basis, and that the true reason Wal-Mart terminated me was in retaliation for both my history of complaints about sexual discrimination at Wal-Mart, including my participation as a class member in this lawsuit, and my support during the 2002 holiday season of a fellow female Wal-Mart employee's sexual harassment complaint against Wal-Mart.

13. If Wal-Mart reformed their discriminatory practices, I would consider returning to work at Wal-Mart.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Kansas that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 13, 2003 at Lawrence, Kansas.

I, Kim McLamb, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. My maiden name is Kim Gary and I was known by this name during the entire time that I was employed by Wal-Mart, Inc. I am female.

3. I was employed by Wal-Mart from 1991 to 2001. I started at the Gloucester, Virginia Wal-Mart store as a Department Manager, and I had several years of previous retail and supervisory experience elsewhere. I was eventually promoted to Overnight Assistant Manager at the Gloucester store in 1994. Later, between 1997 and 2001, I was an Assistant Manager at four other Virginia store locations. I almost always received "exceeds expectations" marks on my evaluations.

4. When I was hired in 1991, I started out making about $6.00 per hour. Two other newly-hired male Department Managers, Blake Fullen and Mike Sutherland, were each making about $8.50 an hour. Mr. Fullen told me how much he was making, and I discovered how much Mr. Sutherland was making when I trained as a Personnel Manager and saw his payroll records. As Mr. Fullen and Mr. Sutherland were hired at approximately the same time that I was, and each of us were Department Managers, I know of no legitimate reason that Wal-Mart paid the men more. More generally, during my training as a Personnel Manager, I saw that men were usually making more than women who were in the same jobs.

5. From the beginning of my employment with Wal-Mart, I often spoke with my Store Managers about my interest in being promoted. I spoke to the following Store Managers: Ken Greggs, George Joiner, Wayne Radcliff, Jerry Rand and others. I also spoke to Darryl Gun and Chris Mehler, who were my District Managers. Eventually, I was promoted to Overnight Assistant Manager at the Gloucester store in 1994, but only after agreeing, in writing, to work overnights at that post for a full two-year period. I knew of no male Assistant Manager at that store who was required to make the same written commitment. Each male Assistant Manager who worked at the store only had to rotate through the overnight position on a six-month basis.

6. In 2001, while I was working as an Assistant Manager in Hardlines A & B at the Newport News, Virginia store, I identified an opportunity to supervise the grocery area as an Assistant Manager, which I understood was a necessary step I needed in order to get promoted to the Co-Manager position. The Grocery Assistant Manager position was not posted, but I learned of it because the current Grocery Assistant Manager, Ed Hausmann, had been promoted to Co-Manager at another store. I told my Store Manager Wayne Radcliff and District Manager Chris Mehler of my interest in the position, and they each told me that I would be given the position. However, the position was ultimately filled by Tommy (last name unknown), who had only recently been promoted from a grocery stocker to Assistant Manager, and who had significantly less experience than me. Tommy had only been an Assistant Manager for three months while I had about six years experience as an Assistant Manager. When I complained to Mr. Mehler, he eventually moved me to grocery, but only after Tommy had left the store after getting another promotion.

7. Several times throughout my career at Wal-Mart, I complained that women working in the same job as men made less than the men. On three such occasions in 1993, while I was the personnel manager, three different male assistant managers -Lee Earle, Adam Harbach, and Dee Taylor -each told me that the reason why men made more than women was that the men "had families to support." No other response to my complaints were ever made.

8. The Open Door policy did not work for me and instead resulted in retaliation from my Store Manager. In April 2001, I and several other female Assistant Managers were working six days a week getting ready for inventory. At that same time, various male Assistant Managers were collectively involved in preparing for a triathlon, along with my Store Manager at the time, Wayne Radcliff. The men would bring their bikes to the store, would often leave the store early to train, and would rarely work the weekends. One Sunday, while a number of female Assistant Managers were in the store preparing for inventory, I used the Open Door policy in order to express my concerns about the situation to my District Manager, Chris Mehler. Only two hours later, Mr. Radcliff showed up at the store, in bike shorts, and angrily played back the message Mr. Mehler had left on his cell phone regarding my call. Mr. Radcliff did not address the substance of my complaint, but instead yelled at me in front of the other Assistant Managers, saying that I should not be worried about inventory and that he "couldn't believe" that I called our District Manager to complain. He then left the store without saying or doing anything else. No other response to my complaint was ever made by either District Manager Mehler or Store Manager Radcliff. I realized after this incident that my complaints of gender discrimination would not be taken seriously.

9. I was an Assistant Manager for a total of 7 years, and I was never offered a promotion to a Co-Manager or Store Manager position.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and of the State of Virginia, that the foregoing is true and correct. I signed this Declaration on April 11, 2003 in Yorktown, Virginia.

I, UMI JEAN MINOR, declare that,

1. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in this Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

2. I have been employed by Wal-Mart, Inc. in Alabama since June 4, 1990. I am an African American female.

3. I began my employment with Wal-Mart at a store in Selma, Alabama as a part-time sales clerk on the day shift at a pay rate of $3.85 an hour. At that time two of my four children were still at home and I needed full-time work. Several months later, when Wal-Mart started hiring seasonal help, I learned through the grapevine about a full-time opening on the night receiving shift. The job was not posted. I got it by talking the night shift supervisor who simply transferred me into the position. After receiving a standard evaluation on my ninety-day review, I received a $0.15 raise to $4.00 an hour.

4. In October 1993, a new Store Manager transferred to the Selma store from the Homewood store. I had recently separated from my husband and wanted to leave Selma. I was also interested in advancing with the Company and had observed that the Assistant and Store Managers at Wal-Mart changed stores frequently so I thought transferring to another store would be viewed favorably. I asked the new Store Manager if there were any openings at the Homewood store and he said he would call the Homewood Store Manager, Gary Jones, to be sure. Later the new Store Manager told me that Store Manager Jones had told him to tell me that there was a night receiving clerk position open and that I should go see him the next morning at 10 a.m. When I went to see Store Manager Jones, he told me I could start that very night at 10 p.m. I transferred to Homewood that very same day and began working the 10 p.m. to 7 a.m. shift. I stayed in a hotel for a few days until I found an apartment to rent. Even though I had now been with the Company for more than three years, my pay rate was only $5.60 an hour.

5. As a single mother, I could not support my family on this wage and was forced to take a second, full-time day job at Food Fair. At the time, I planned to work this second job only until I was able to move to a higher paying position at Wal-Mart. I had no idea that it would take me another seven years to obtain a management position at Wal-Mart and that I would be working two full-time jobs for this entire period.

6. During the almost seven years I was employed by Food Fair, I worked as a cashier and in the Bakery-Deli Department. My job duties included slicing meats, managing the hot food bar, baking and decorating cakes, and serving and ringing up customers.

7. During the time I worked in the Night Receiving Department of the Wal-Mart store in Homewood, I received "above average" performance evaluations. Despite my high quality performance, my annual raises were only in the $0.20 to $0.30 an hour range.

8. In 1995, I moved to the day shift at Wal-Mart and was promoted to Department Manager in the Accessories Department. This was an hourly position. This job was not posted and I did not formally apply for it. Store Manager Jones just told me that was the job I would be transferring to when I asked to move to the day shift. I changed my hours at Food Fair to the evening shift.

9. I worked as a Department Manager until 1998, and continued to receive "above average" performance evaluations. The annual raises I received during this period were still in the $0.20 to $0.35 cent range. After eight years with the Company, my pay rate was still well below $10.00 an hour at $7.32.

10. In late 1997, Wal-Mart converted the Homewood store into a Supercenter. Because of the bakery-deli experience I had gained at my second job at Food Fair, I expressed interest in working in the new Bakery Department. I told Store Manager Jones that I knew how to decorate cakes and run a bakery because I had learned these skills early in my career at a Piggley-Wiggley store and during my employment with Food Fair. Store Manager Jones told me that he was not the manager in charge of hiring for the Bakery Department.

11. When the new manager over the Bakery Department arrived at the store shortly thereafter, I told him about my past experience running the bakery-deli and my interest in the cake decorator position. He asked me for the phone number of my references and told me that he would get back to me. The job was not posted and I did not officially apply for it. About two days later, the Bakery Manager informed me that I had excellent references and that he would talk about pay with me later. I got the job and my pay rate was increased to $9.00 an hour.

12. The new Bakery Manager did not stay long at the Homewood store. After he left, two Caucasian women, Loretta Wireman and Debra Smith, were transferred in as Bakery Managers. Both of these women left the job and the company after just a few months. After Ms. Smith and Ms. Wireman left, two more males were transferred in to run the Bakery: Mike Blasi and Mike Rodocker. Mr. Rodocker left the Homewood store after about six months. Mr. Blasi stayed on for the next two years or so.

13. Throughout the two years that these various managers tried to run the Homewood Bakery Department, I was interested in becoming the Bakery Manager. I had expressed interest in this position to Store Manager Jones as well as the Food Merchandiser, Steve Mulford. I also told the new Bakery Managers I worked under that I was interested in moving up in the Company. However, even though my job duties had increased and I was actually performing the duties of a "lead" associate, I was not promoted. Finally, Mr. Blasi acknowledged my hard work and my job title was changed to "Bakery Lead Associate." As with my prior job moves, this position was not posted and I did not apply for the position. My hourly rate increased to $9.83 an hour.

14. In May 1999, I earned a "meets expectations" on my annual evaluation and my hourly rate was raised to $10.22 an hour. In March 2000, I received a 5% merit raise that brought my hourly rate to $10.73. I worked well with Bakery Manager Blasi and he supported me in my desire to become the Bakery Manager.

15. In approximately July 2000, Bakery Manager Blasi told me that he thought I was capable of running the Bakery Department and encouraged me to apply for his job. I understood from this conversation that he would be leaving his position. When I approached District Manager Johnson about applying for the Bakery Manager position, he told me that he was going to send me to the Bessemer store for training. When I told Bakery Manager Blasi that District Manager Johnson wanted me to train at the Bessemer store, he told me that I did not need any additional training to run the Homewood Bakery. I understood from this conversation with Mr. Blasi that if I went to Bessemer, I would not get the promotion to the Bakery Manager position at the Homewood store. Although I was interested in any training the company could provide that would help me perform better and increase my opportunities, I was never provided any training.

16. The District Manager never sent me to the Bessemer store because shortly after my conversation with Mr. Blasi, Mr. Blasi left the Homewood store and I was finally promoted to the Bakery Manager position in September 2001 without any additional training. As before, this job opening was not posted and I did not formally apply for it. Bakery Manager is a salaried position and I asked for a starting salary of $36,000 a year. They only agreed to pay me $28,500. With this pay increase, I was finally able to quit my second job at Food Fair.

17. As of this date, I remain the Bakery Manager in the Homewood store. Since my promotion, however, there have been three different new male Store Managers in the Homewood store. Aside from on-the-job training, these Store Managers have failed to provide me with the training I requested regarding the paper work associated with running the Bakery. Similarly, no one has provided me the staffing I need to keep the department running smoothly. As a result, I work between 10 to 18 hours a day. When I talk to District Manager Johnson about additional management training, he keeps assuring me that I can rely on Wal-Mart's computer-based programs for everything I need.

18. The Bakery Manager position in a Supercenter is the equivalent of an Assistant Manager position at a regular Wal-Mart. Nonetheless, none of the Homewood Store Managers, or District Manager Johnson, or Food Merchandiser Mulford has ever talked to me about Wal-Mart's Management Training Program or informed me about how to continue my management career at Wal-Mart.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Alabama that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 18, 2003 at Birmingham, Alabama.

I, Michella Minton, declare:

1. I am a 36-year-old female living in Fuquay Varina, North Carolina. I worked at four Wal-Mart stores in Cary, North Carolina, Raleigh, North Carolina, Palatka, Florida, and St. Augustine, Florida, from October 3, 1995, until I resigned from employment on April 2, 2001.

2. I have been subjected to gender discrimination by Wal-Mart with regard to compensation and work assignments.

3. I started working at the Wal-Mart store in Cary, North Carolina in 1995. I worked as a Pharmacy Technician for approximately two-and-a-half years, with a brief two month assignment at the Raleigh, North Carolina, store in 1996. I then became the Personnel Manager until March, 1999.

4. In March, 1999, I transferred to Wal-Mart's Palatka, Florida, store as a Personnel Manager. After approximately four months, I was then assigned to be a Support Manager. I had sought the Support Manager position, and wanted to progress professionally at Wal-Mart. During the years previous to my employment at Wal-Mart, I had gained extensive retail managerial experience in Store Manager positions at Revco and at a clothing store, and I wanted to pursue management positions at Wal-Mart. Accordingly, I had told my Store Managers and District Managers on numerous occasions that I desired to be promoted to an Assistant Manager position, and noted in the "Comment" section of my May 26, 1999 Evaluation that I wanted to enter the Management Training Program. I always received at least an "Above Standard" rating on my Wal-Mart Performance Appraisals and on at least two occasions received "Outstanding" ratings, the highest rating possible.

5. In May, 2000, I received a promotion to be an Assistant Manager at the St. Augustine, Florida, store. Although I was initially very excited to receive this promotion, soon after I transferred to the St. Augustine, Florida, store I began to experience gender discrimination.

6. My starting salary as Assistant Manager at the St. Augustine, Florida, store was approximately $29,500.00 per year. I am aware, however, that Judah Smith, a male with less managerial experience than me who started at an Assistant Manager position at approximately the same time as me at the Palatka, Florida, store, was paid a higher salary than me in 2001. I am also aware that male Assistant Managers with managerial experience comparable to mine at the Palatka, Florida, store (Nelson Alvarez, Tod Hunt and Colin Moore) and at the St. Augustine, Florida, store (Phil Joseph) made higher salaries than me for performing the same job duties. When I realized that these male colleagues made a higher salary than me for doing the same work, I became upset and angry that Wal-Mart treated me unfairly just because I was a woman. I used the Open Door Policy to complain to Ralph Kershaw, the District Manager, concerning gender-based pay disparities, but Mr. Kershaw ignored my complaints.

7. During my time as an Assistant Manager at the St. Augustine store, my Store Manager was Walter Lott. Mr. Lott was a gender-biased manager. Mr. Lott treated me and the other two female Assistant Managers much more poorly than the male Assistant Managers in the store. Mr. Lott frequently humiliated me and the other female Assistant Managers in the presence of customers by yelling at us that we could not do our jobs properly, but he rarely displayed this type of behavior toward male Assistant Managers. Mr. Lott also assigned me and the other female Assistant Managers to supervise departments such as cosmetics or softlines rather than high profile departments like Lawn and Garden, which were supervised by male Assistant Managers. Accordingly, because I did not supervise a high profile department, I was unable to realize my potential as a manager and show Wal-Mart what I could do in order to progress professionally. I was not receiving the training in all the departments that is necessary for promotion to a Store Manager position. I felt that Mr. Lott was discriminating in determining our assignments, and holding me and the other two female Assistant Managers back from success and further promotional opportunities. I again used the Open Door Policy to speak with Mr. Kershaw, the District Manager, about the way Mr. Lott treated me, but Mr. Kershaw failed to respond to my complaints.

8. Mr. Lott's verbal attacks and abrasive demeanor toward me took its toll on my health. In November, 2000, the effect of Mr. Lott's hostile behavior toward me caused me to take a medical leave of absence from my job when my doctor diagnosed that I suffered from severe work-induced anxiety and depression.

9. By February, 2001, my health had improved and I was interested in returning to work at Wal-Mart, but not at the St. Augustine, Florida, store. I spoke to a Florida District Manager, Bert [last name unknown], regarding my ability to return to a Wal-Mart store as an Assistant Manager. I explained to him that I desired to relocate to a store in North Carolina rather than work at the St. Augustine store for Mr. Lott, the Store Manager who was the primary source of my previous anxiety and depression. The Florida District Manager, however, informed me that I would have to return as an Assistant Manager at the St. Augustine store. I used the Open Door Policy to appeal to Rudy Eckerman, the Regional Personnel Manager, but when I explained my situation to him in numerous phone calls, he was evasive and did nothing to respond to my concerns. Even though my medical leave ended in March, 2001, the company did not assign me to a store. As I could see no reasonable employment options for myself at Wal-Mart, I resigned in early April, 2001.

10. I would be very interested in working for Wal-Mart again in the future, if Wal-Mart could promise me that my workplace would be free of gender discrimination and that I would be provided fair opportunities for professional advancement.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of North Carolina that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 14, 2003, at 1:54 pm, North Carolina.

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, CLEO PAGE, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, DEBORAH GUNTER, KAREN WILLIAMSON AND EDITH ARANA, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiff, vs. WAL-MART STORES, INC., Defendant	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF ELIZABETH MONROE IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Elizabeth Monroe, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I began working at a Wal-Mart Store in Aberdeen, North Carolina in 1996 as a sales associate in Electronics making $5.75 an hour working full-time. My annual salary was approximately $11,900. Prior to my hire at Wal-Mart, I spent 16 years as the owner and manager of a retail store. I discussed this previous experience during my initial interview with Personnel Manager Vicki Black and Training Coordinator Diana [last name unknown]. I later discovered that certain male cart pushers, some still in high school, had been hired at over $6.00 an hour. I had been told that I could be fired for discussing salary issues so I did not mention this information to anyone.

3. I have been in the same position in the same store for almost seven years and currently make $10.05. My annual salary is approximately $20,900. My evaluations have consistently been rated either "Meets Expectations" or "Exceeds Expectations" and I have received no disciplinary action in my time as a Wal-Mart employee.

4. In September 2000, my Department Manager Frances Jackson told me she had requested a merit raise for me because of my hard work in Electronics. At that time, Store Manager Brady Rowland agreed that I deserved this raise but I did not receive the increase.

5. In February or March 2001, I still had not received my merit raise and I asked Mr. Rowland about it. He responded that he needed more time to observe my performance. I reminded him that he had previously approved the raise when the department manager, who observed my hard work first hand, had recommended it. Store Manager Rowland did not respond.

6. In April 2001, I still had not received my merit raise. Ms. Jackson spoke with Mr. Rowland again and I understood that it would be taken care of. Over the next several months, I also spoke with District Manager Richard Hinkebein, and two Co-Managers about the merit raise but received no response.

7. In June 2001, District Manager Hinkebein was walking the store and Mr. Rowland told him that I was the person taking care of the whole Electronics Department while the department manager was out on leave. I told both Richard and Mr. Rowland that I would appreciate my merit raise even more than verbal praise. Richard gave me a "good job" pin but not the promised raise. During my June 2001 evaluation, I made it clear that I was still "looking forward [to my] merit (pay) [raise]." Attached hereto as Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of my Performance Appraisal dated June 1, 2001.

8. In July 2001, I was honored at a morning meeting for five years of excellent service at Wal-Mart. I received a plaque and a five-year pin. I still had not received my promised merit raise. I was making $8.64 an hour. At that same meeting, a male employee who had worked at Wal-Mart for only a few months, Joshua Neiber, was honored as Employee of the Month and received both a bonus and a raise. At this time, I raised my hand and asked what the qualifications were for this award. Mr. Rowland responded that one must go beyond the call of duty. I then stated that working in a department by myself for over a month with no department manager and no assistance should qualify. Several of my co-workers applauded at that time. Mr. Rowland and Co-Manager Gloria Williams then pulled me aside and Mr. Rowland told me that I was acting inappropriately. Later that day, I was finally given my merit raise beginning in August 2001, almost one year after it was originally promised. The raise was not retroactive.

9. I observed that men and women in my store who were interested in management training were treated differently. I know of at least two women, my sister-in-law Vivian Monroe and Barbara Gant, who were relocated to Fayetteville, North Carolina to complete management training. On the other hand, I know of at least two men, Jaime Jenkins and Julius Fore, who were hourly employees in the Aberdeen, North Carolina Wal-Mart Store and who were allowed to train and become assistant managers in the same store. In contrast, Frances Jackson and Patricia Monroe were not allowed to train in the Aberdeen Wal-Mart Store. They have remained hourly associates. I also observed that Mr. Jenkins moved from an hourly position to becoming a co-manager within the Aberdeen store in just a couple of years. This was significantly faster than either Vivian Monroe or Barbara Gant.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of North Carolina that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on March 29, 2003, at Marston, North Carolina.

I, Joyce Moody, declare:

1. My name is Joyce Moody. I am female. I am over 18 years of age and competent to testify in Court. The facts stated herein are based on my personal knowledge, and I could and would testify to these facts in a court of law if asked to do so.

2. I worked for Wal-Mart for over twenty years. I began working at a Wal-Mart store in Ripley, Mississippi in 1977. I worked there until 1978, when I left Wal-Mart for a short time. I then began working at the Wal-Mart in Corinth, Mississippi later that year. I remained at that store until 1984, working in a variety of non-management positions.

3. During the time I worked at the Corinth store, I asked for a promotion from Mr. Boling, the Store Manager; Mr. Reeder, the successor Store Manager; and Roy Flake, the next successor Store Manager. Mr. Reeder was willing to promote me to Department Manager, but no further. Mr. Flake actively discouraged me from seeking further promotions because he believed that I should be home with my son, who had a serious medical condition, rather than working. After my repeated requests, Mr. Flake was willing to promote me into the position of Office Training Supervisor.

4. In 1984, I transferred to a Store Planning Associate position. I remained in this position for six years, until 1990. In this position, my job was to travel from store to store and assist in training the new associates in preparation for store grand openings. While in this position, I traveled to literally dozens of stores in a variety of states throughout the country, working at each store for a period of weeks or months preparing the associates for their jobs before the store opened.

5. While in the Store Planning position, I used the same training format and materials to train all Wal-Mart hourly employees regardless of their location. I referred them to the same associate handbook, taught them the same standardized procedures and human resource policies, and used the same training materials at all of the dozens of stores at which I worked.

6. While in the Store Planning position, I observed that the store opening process and the human resources policies at the stores were communicated to the stores from Bentonville. These policies were not subject to change by individual managers at the store level. Indeed, it is my understanding that one reason Wal-Mart uses specialized store planning associates that travel from store to store to conduct training is to ensure that standardized training takes place and that standardized policies are communicated and taught to all associates at all stores, regardless of location.

7. In 1990, I decided to leave Store Planning because the constant travel had become difficult. I asked my field manager if there was an Assistant Manager job available in Mississippi where I was from. The Field Manager spoke to the Corinth store's Regional Vice President, Larry Fennell, and he got me a position as an Assistant Manager.

8. The District Manager over me, a Bill Wolfers, treated all the women in his district very poorly, alternately ignoring them and subjecting them to verbal abuse. Other female managers who I observed were treated badly by Mr. Wolfers were Judy Mays and Ada Faye Rucks. Mr. Wolfers was, however, quite friendly with the male managers. Mr. Wolfers, through his treatment of me, made it abundantly clear that he did not appreciate having a female Assistant Manager in his district. He even told me that I should transfer to a district four to five hundred miles north of where I was currently working if I wanted to remain an Assistant Manager. I refused, however, because I did not want to leave the area after so long away.

9. I informed Regional Vice President Fennell about the treatment, but he refused to move me out of the store or take any action against Mr. Wolfers. So, in 1990, I resigned. After my resignation, four women approached me about the possibility of filing an EEOC charge against Wal-Mart as a result of Wolfers' behavior, but I refused because I still thought they might have a career with the Company and I did not want to jeopardize that for them.

10. Approximately four and one-half months after resigning, unable to find other employment, I applied to work for Wal-Mart's Home Office in Bentonville, Arkansas as a Merchandise Coordinator with the Import Division. In 1992, after less than two years in that position, I was promoted to Merchandise Manager, a salaried position. Approximately one year later, I was told that they were restructuring the department and that my position was to be eliminated. However, my position was not eliminated and was instead given to David Ortiz, a Buyer from the Home Office. I was demoted to a position manning the employee hotline. A few months later, I was promoted to an hourly position as an Assistant to the Buyer in the Shoes and Jewelry department.

11. I remained in that position until 1995, when I again attempted to work in the retail stores, this time as a District Manager over the Shoes and Jewelry departments in Mississippi. Once again, I did not post for this position, but rather merely requested the job and it was given to me.

12. As a District Manager for the Shoes and Jewelry department, I had very little authority to change or deviate from Wal-Mart's human resources policies or practices — which were the same for Shoes and Jewelry as they were for the rest of Wal-Mart stores. For example, I could not hire or fire Department Managers without the approval of the Regional Manager. In addition, nearly all other human resources policies, from vacation policies to promotion and demotion policies, were dictated to me from the Home Office in Bentonville. While in the position of District Manager for Shoes & Jewelry, I observed that most of the other Shoes and Jewelry Managers were women, and that the salary scale for District Managers for Shoes and Jewelry was lower than that for Store Managers, who made considerably more than Shoes and Jewelry District Managers.

13. After less than one year as a District Manager of Shoes and Jewelry, I was told by my Regional Manager that in order to keep my job I would have to move my residence to a location that was in the center of my district. This move would have required me to move my entire family to an area of Mississippi that I did not feel was safe. To the best of my knowledge, I was the only District Manager who was told that I would have to move. As a result, rather than move, I stepped down from the District Manager position to work as the manager of a Tire, Lube & Express ("TLE") department. After I stepped down, I was replaced by a man — who was not required to move to the center of his district.

14. After stepping down, I began working as the TLE Manager in the Collierville, Mississippi store. In this position, I learned that the human resources policies and materials used in the TLE department are largely identical to those in the Shoes and Jewelry department. Associates in the TLE department are provided and rely upon the same associate handbook, are subject to the same human resources policies, and receive the same human resources training as associates in the shoes and jewelry department.

15. During the time I worked as the Manager for TLE, I worked for Jeff Avant. Mr. Avant routinely told me, rather than any of the male employees whom I outranked, to clean the stockroom, and did so with comments like "the stockroom needs a woman's touch." Because I found these comments offensive and his treatment of me unfair, I requested and received a transfer to the Wal-Mart New Albany, Mississippi.

16 Following my transfer, my new District Manager was James Harston. Shortly after moving to Mr. Harston's district, he informed me that he would be laying off certain employees in my department, and asked me to take a ride with him in his car to discuss the matter.

17. While we were driving, he asked me about my career and whether I would ever like to be a District Manager again. I replied that I would like to move up but that I believed I needed to reach certain sales numbers in order to do so. He replied that he would help me if I would help him. This comment made me feel uncomfortable because of the way in which it was said to me, although I admit I was not exactly sure what he meant. Therefore, I simply responded that all I needed was support in the business and I would be okay. As soon as I finished my response, without a word Mr. Harston angrily turned the car around and drove me back to the store in silence. This confirmed to me that the comment had been intended as an improper sexual suggestion.

18. Following this incident, Mr. Harston began treating me much worse even than before, singling me out for abusive tirades and mistreatment. It got so bad that I used the Open Door to talk to Scott McCarter, who was Mr. Harston's supervisor. I described what had happened with Mr. Harston in the car and I described how badly Mr. Harston was treating me since the event. Mr. McCarter replied that I "needed to be the bigger person in the situation" and that I needed to try to communicate better with Mr. Harston.

19. Following this conversation, I was so upset at the lack of response that I told Mr. McCarter that he could "have the store at the end of January." I later tried to rescind my verbal resignation because I needed a job, but Wal-Mart would not let me. I never submitted a formal resignation in writing; Wal-Mart, however, still ended my employment in January of 2001.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and the State of Georgia that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 17, 2003, in Calhoun, Georgia.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, EDITH ARANA, DEBORAH GUNTER, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, CLEO PAGE, KAREN WILLIAMSON, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiffs, vs. WAL-MART STORES, INC.,	CASE NO. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF DENISE MOTT IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Denise Mott, declare:

1. I am female and a former employee of Wal-Mart.

2. I worked at several Wal-Mart stores in Alabama and Florida from November 2, 1992 until January 11, 2002. I successfully completed four years of courses in finance at Troy State University while working at Wal-Mart. Throughout my career at Wal-Mart, I expressed interest in joining the Management Training Program to several different managers, and I even moved my home after I was told that would help my chances to join the Management Training Program. However, I was never promoted. I was told of false prerequisites which I met but which did not apply to men. Meanwhile, I saw men less qualified than me join the Management Training Program.

3. I started working as a Cashier at a store in Dothan, Alabama, soon after I graduated from high school. Shortly thereafter, I began to attend Troy State University part time in the evenings, working towards a degree in finance.

4. In early 1993, I applied for a lateral transfer to the Cash Office. The position was posted by the time clock. I was not interviewed, but I received the transfer.

5. In about 1994, I told the Store Manager, Bill Abercrombie, that I was interested in the Assistant Manager Training Program. Store Manager Abercrombie told me that a four-year degree was required to join the training program. This conversation occurred while Mr. Abercrombie was counting deposits with me in the Cash Office. I also told him during my next annual review that I was still interested in management training. He again told me that I needed a four-year college degree.

6. Store Manager Abercrombie never told me about the First In Line program, which is a company-wide program for college students to complete the Management Training Program while completing their college degrees. Mr. Abercrombie knew I was in college because I told him several times while we were discussing my work schedule and class schedule. I never saw any information about the First In Line program at the store. Had I known that I could receive management training while completing my college degree, I would have been very interested in this program. If applications had been available, I would have applied for the program.

7. In 1997, a new Supercenter opened in Dothan, Alabama. I was interested in working at a larger store in order to increase my promotion opportunities. I interviewed with Co-Manager Karen Bess and then with Store Manager Paul Lewellen. During my interview, I told Mr. Lewellen that I was interested in management. He told me that I needed experience in other areas of the business besides the Cash Office. He offered me a position in Claims, which I accepted. However, when I arrived at the Supercenter, I was assigned to a position in the Receiving Department. While working at the Dothan Supercenter, I continued to take classes towards my bachelor's degree. Mr. Lewellen knew that I was in college because we discussed my work schedule and class schedule several times. Mr. Lewellen never told me about the First In Line program for college students. The fact that Mr. Lewellen knew of my interest in becoming a manger is reflected on a Commendation Form I received on January 15, 1999, which he signed and which states, "Denise . . . is also cross-training on the front end with the intentions of becoming an assistant manager." (True and correct copy attached hereto as Mott Exhibit A.)

8. During this period of time, I searched on the internal computer system for the Wal-Mart policy requiring management trainees to have a four-year college degree, but I never found one. The internal computer system permits employees at the store level to review policies and guidelines generated by the Home Office in Bentonville, Arkansas. Store Manager Lewellen and employees in the Personnel Office told me that a college degree was required, but I never saw any written guidelines to that effect. I also never saw any written information about the First In Line program on the internal computer system.

9. In approximately October 1998, Robert Adkins was hired into the Dothan Supercenter as a Management Trainee. Mr. Adkins told me that he did not have a college degree, even though both Mr. Abercrombie and Mr. Lewellen had informed me that a college degree was a prerequisite for the Management Training Program. Mr. Adkins was hired into the Management Training Program without prior Wal-Mart experience, even though Mr. Lewellen had told me Wal-Mart experience was necessary.

10. In late 1998 or early 1999, Store Manager Lewellen transferred to a store in Kissimee, Florida. Mr. Lewellen told me that, if I transferred to Kissimee, he would promote me to Support Manager in preparation for joining the Management Training Program. This was the first I had heard that experience as a Support Manager was a prerequisite for the Management Training Program. Mr. Adkins, who was hired directly into the Management Training Program, had not worked as a Support Manager before joining the Management Training program. But, because I was committed to proving myself to the company, and because my husband's recent job transfer made the move convenient, I agreed to transfer to Kissimee. I transferred in spring 1999, with the intention of completing my bachelor's degree in finance at the University of South Florida. Unfortunately, the University's residence requirements made it impractical for me to transfer.

11. Two male employees from the Dothan Supercenter transferred to Kissimee at about the same time I did and both received immediate promotions. Douglas Alexander had been a Night Unloader at the Dothan Supercenter. At the Kissimee store, Mr. Lewellen immediately promoted Mr. Alexander to Night Receiving Manager. Andrew [last name unknown] had been a Sporting Goods Sales Associate at the Dothan Supercenter. At the Kissimee store, Mr. Lewellen immediately promoted Andrew to Support Manager. Although Mr. Lewellen had assured me a Support Manager job, I did not receive the promotion. Instead, Mr. Lewellen placed me back in the Receiving Department.

12. In June 1999, I saw an advertisement in the Orlando Times indicating that Wal-Mart was seeking to hire Assistant Managers. I was still very interested in a management position, so I submitted my resume and went to an interview at a hotel in the Orlando area. By this time, I had completed four years of college-level finance courses and I had six and a half years' experience at Wal-Mart. Andrew [last name unknown], from the Kissimee store, also attended an interview. I interviewed with a District Manager and with Regional Personnel Manager Ethan Minkel. During the interview, I was asked whether I was able to relocate. I said that I was relocatable, and I pointed out that I had already relocated once – from Dothan, Alabama to Kissimee, Florida – in order to be considered for jobs that would help me towards my goal of joining management. Neither interviewer told me that a college degree was required to join the Management Training Program.

13. Immediately after my interview, Store Manager Lewellen asked me if I had informed the interviewers that I was newly pregnant. I told him I had not informed the interviewers. I told him that I was early enough in my pregnancy that I could complete the training, take pregnancy leave, and then return to work as an Assistant Manager. Mr. Lewellen insisted that it would be "better" for me if I waited until after my child was born to join the Management Training Program. Mr. Lewellen then told me he was going to tell the interviewers that I was pregnant. He walked into the interview room, and I could hear him tell the interviewers that I was newly pregnant. I received no further response regarding the Management Training Program from Mr. Minkel or the other interviewer.

14. I worked at Wal-Mart for another two and a half years after that interview, but I was never promoted into the Management Training Program. Andrew was promoted into the Management Training Program shortly after his interview in Orlando. He trained in the Kissimee store, where he had worked as an hourly employee, even though I had been told that management trainees were not allowed to train in the same store where they had worked as hourly employees.

15. In October 1999, I transferred to a store in Prattville, Alabama, when my husband's job location changed. I was never told that I needed to remain at the Kissimee store in order to qualify for a promotion to the Management Training Program. In a telephone interview with Prattville Store Manager Vanessa Withrow and Kissimee Store Manager Lewellen, I told Store Manager Withrow that I was interested in the Management Training Program. Store Manager Withrow told me she had a position available in the Personnel Office. However, when I arrived in Prattville, Store Manager Withrow placed me in the Receiving Department, a department where I had already worked for more than two years.

16. In April 2000, I transferred to a store in Enterprise, Alabama, when my husband's job location changed again. I talked with Co-Manager Earl Preachers, and I described my eight years of experience and told him that I was interested in a Department Manager position or a Support Manager position. However, when I arrived at the Enterprise store, I was given a position on the inventory team. This position was never described to me as a promotion or as equivalent to a Department Manager position. I did not receive a raise when I started working on the inventory team, and I was not included in the store's regular Department Manager meetings.

17. In fall 2001, I applied for the position of Domestics Department Manager. When I applied for the position, Co-Manager Preachers said to me, "You don't want that job – you don't want to lift furniture – that's a man's job." I was never interviewed. I was denied the promotion in favor of a male employee named Nathan Stewart.

18. I lost hope that Wal-Mart would ever promote me, and I began looking for another job. When I left Wal-Mart after nine years, I was earning about $9 per hour.

19. During my employment with Wal-Mart, I received ten annual evaluations, seven of which were "meets expectations" and three of which were "exceeds expectations." I also received two merit raises. I never received a written coaching. In 2001, I received a verbal coaching for "attendance issues." I had taken several short medical leaves of absence that year because my young son had infant asthma and I needed to care for him. In my previous seven years at Wal-Mart, I had been absent a total of approximately seven days.

20. Other than the interview process in Orlando, which I knew about only because I saw it in the newspaper. I was unaware of any way to apply directly for management training. Had there been another way to apply for such training, I would have applied. If I was confident that I would be considered on my own merits and given an equal chance to do my best, I would consider returning to work at a managerial level with Wal-Mart.

21. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Alabama that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on 13 April (month and day), 2003, at Enterprise, AL (city and state).

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, EDITH ARANA, DEBORAH GUNTER, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, CLEO PAGE, KAREN WILLIAMSON, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiffs, v. WAL-MART STORES, INC., Defendant.	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF STEPHANIE ODLE IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Stephanie Odle, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I am thirty-one years of age, female and I was discriminated against by the male management of Wal-Mart who wrongfully denied me a promotion to Co-Manager, retaliated against me because I complained about gender discrimination and wrongfully discharged me to make available a managerial position for a male manager from another store.

3. On November 21, 1991, I was hired by Wal-Mart as an hourly associate to work at the Sam's Club in Lubbock, Texas.

4. I transferred to the Dallas, Texas, Sam's Club in 1992; to the Yuba City, California, Sam's Club in February 1993; and to the Vacaville, California, Sam's Club in June 1993.

5. When I applied for transfer to the Vacaville store to be closer to my husband who was in the U.S. Marines, stationed at Concord, California, I was told by Mr. David Blackwell, the Operations Assistant Manager for the new store in Vacaville, that he could not offer me a promotion to a full-time Check Out Supervisor (COS) position because I "made too much money." Even though I complained about this discrimination, in order to get the promotion, I was forced to take a $.50 per hour cut in my hourly rate. When I later helped out in the Personnel Department at the Vacaville store, I learned that two men who transferred when I did from the Yuba City store to the Vacaville store to become supervisors like me did not have their pay cut like mine was.

6. In late 1993, I became the Cash Office Lead in the Accounting Office in the Vacaville store. I was promoted into the Assistant Manager training program in September 1994. There was a shortage of managers in Vacaville and nearby stores because Wal-Mart had just acquired a number of PACE stores, and many of the PACE managers had left. Openings for these positions were not posted, so I went to the Operations Assistant Manager and inquired about the opportunity to become a manager. I was referred to Mr. Bob Alderman, Director of Operations. I then met with Mr. Alderman to request a promotion, which Mr. Alderman approved.

7. I relocated to Sacramento, California, to begin my assistant manager training at the Roseville, California, Sam's Club on September 4, 1994. After receiving only six of the 16 weeks of training. Mr. Alderman told me that he needed an Assistant Manager in the Receiving Department at the store in South Sacramento, California, so I accepted that position.

8. The General Manager at the Sacramento store was Mr. Chris Udderman who told racial and sexually-oriented jokes at managers' meetings. When I attempted to get Mr. Udderman to approve raises for two women in the Claims Department to make their pay equal to the men working in the Receiving Department, Mr. Udderman said, "Those girls don't need any more money; they make enough as it is."

9. I reported Mr. Udderman's discriminatory conduct to Director of Operations Alderman, but apparently no action was taken. I was not interviewed about Mr. Udderman' s conduct, and I was never told of any outcome. His inappropriate comments continued. Because nothing effective was done about Mr. Udderman's behavior, I requested a transfer to the Riverside, California, store and moved there in April 1995.

10. After about a year at the Riverside store, I was asked by the District Director of Operations, Mr. Phil Goodwin, to do a special project relating to clubs with high inventory loss or "shrinkage." In 1996, while I was at the Riverside store, I learned that another male Assistant Manager in my store, Mr. Mario Arenales, was making over $10,000.00 more than me (his W-2 tax form was given to me by an hourly associate who discovered it left in the Receiving Office), yet he had less experience with Wal-Mart than me. I complained about this gender pay disparity to Mr. Goodwin.

11. In response to my complaint, Mr. Goodwin said, "Mario supports his wife and his two kids." I told Mr. Goodwin, "I'm having a baby. I need to support my daughter." Mr. Goodwin then humiliated me by requiring me to provide him with my personal household budget so he could decide whether or not I deserved to receive pay equal to Mr. Arenales. I am unaware of a similar request ever being made of a male Assistant Manager. Nevertheless, I prepared my household budget and gave it to Mr. Goodwin and received a raise of only approximately $40.00 per week. This raise, of course, did not bring my salary anywhere near to parity with Mr. Arenales' salary.

12. In March 1997, I transferred to one of the Sam's Clubs in Las Vegas, Nevada, as the Assistant Manager for the Merchandise Department. Within a few days after arriving in Las Vegas, I was called back to the Riverside store for a meeting with Mr. Carlos Doubleday, Director of Operations; Mr. Carl Brown, Regional Loss Prevention Manager; and Ms. Chris Schilling, an Assistant Manager at the Riverside store, who was present as a "witness." During this meeting, I was wrongfully accused of making incorrect audit entries "understating shrinkage", even though these entries had been approved at the time by Mr. Brown and by Mr. Goodwin. Other male General Managers in the region had made similar entries. At the end of the meeting, Mr. Doubleday asked Mr. Brown and Ms. Schilling to leave the room, and then, Mr. Doubleday told me that he believed that I made the entries because Mr. Brown had told me to, adding, "I'm going to do everything I can to protect you." This later proved to be untrue.

13. In April 1997, I was aggressively questioned by my General Manager in Las Vegas, Mr. Ben Dolan, and by the District Director of Operations, Mr. Hank Geerling, about the same audit entries. I was then unfairly given a written "Decision Making Day", the penultimate discipline short of termination, for audit entries that I had been instructed to make by my male supervisors in California. To my knowledge, neither Mr. Brown nor any of the male General Managers who had made similar audit entries were ever disciplined. I feel that the men used me as a scapegoat to cover for their mistakes.

14. After I received this unfair and discriminatory written discipline, I used the Open Door and met with Mr. David Simpson, the Regional Vice President, who did not listen to what I had to say and did nothing but belittle me and treat me in a very condescending manner. Mr. Simpson did nothing whatsoever to remove the unfair discipline from my personnel file. In fact, Mr. Simpson told me, "You no longer have a position in Las Vegas; there is no position for you in Southern California. You do have a position with the company; however, it has to be where there is an opening. We will no longer create a position for you . . . Phil Goodwin has a position, and if I were you, I would take that position." Mr. Goodwin was still the Director of Operations for the Sacramento area, and I had no choice but to accept that position. Before I reported to the Sacramento store in the fall of 1998, I had to take a several-month medical leave of absence because I was emotionally decimated from the demeaning and discriminatory treatment I had endured from my male supervisors.

15. In the fall of 1999, I was transferred to the Sherman, Texas, store. Ms. Stephanie Selinger was the General Manager. After a few months, Mr. Bill Smithson became the General Manager of the store, and I became Assistant Manager of Merchandise.

16. Before Mr. Smithson had arrived at the store, Ms. Selinger and I had submitted a written proposal to Mr. Larry Alderson, Director of Operations, demonstrating that closing the tire shop earlier, at 7:00 p.m. instead of 8:30 p.m., would save Wal-Mart millions of dollars. Mr. Alderson rejected our proposal. However, after Mr. Smithson took over as General Manager, Mr. Smithson made the identical suggestion to Mr. Alderson who, this time, approved it. When I asked Mr. Smithson how he had convinced Mr. Alderson to change his mind when he had only recently rejected the suggestion when made by Ms. Selinger and myself, Mr. Smithson said, "I guess it's a man thing." When I asked, "What does that mean?", he replied, "Take it for what it's worth." I immediately knew from his remarks and the way he said them to me that Mr. Smithson had no respect for women. I also knew that Mr. Alderson would only implement a cost-saving suggestion if it was made by a man, not a woman.

17. On March 13, 1999, I was on vacation and stopped into the store to cash a check. Mr. Smithson came up to me and said, "If I'd known you were back in town, I would have had you work today." I told him he could not make me work because I was still on vacation. He then said, "I'm the General Manger, I can do whatever I want to do." I never saw him treat male managers with such disrespect.

18. On May 6, 1999, I was helping out at the front end and refunded a tax overcharge to a regular business customer in the amount of $250.00. I did not ask him to show proof of purchase since he was required to sign a tax refund log and because Mr.

Smithson had previously made a large refund to a regular customer based solely on the customer's word. After the customer left, I realized that I did not have the refund slip and had used the wrong code for the transaction, so I immediately informed the accounting office of my mistake and told them how to correct it.

19. Approximately one week later, I was accosted by Mr. Chuck Roberts, a Wal-Mart loss prevention investigator, who insultingly implied that I had stolen the $250.00. I was placed on suspension and told to "go home" while he contacted the customer to verify the transaction and that the customer had actually received the refund money. Mr. Roberts told me that it would only take him a "couple of hours" to contact the customer. I waited at home for at least five days before being cleared of suspicion of theft.

20. Even though Mr. Roberts finally verified that the customer did receive his $250.00 refund, I was not even allowed to set foot back into the store. On May 20, 1999, Mr. Smithson and Mr. Roberts met me at a Wal-Mart store across the street from the Sam's Club, and gave me a written "Decision Making Day" discipline because I had "circumvented refund procedures." They told me that I could never re-enter the Sherman store and that I had to relocate to a Sam's Club in either Lubbock or Amarillo, Texas. I chose Lubbock.

21. In early April 1999, before I was falsely accused of mishandling the tax refund, I had interviewed on the telephone with Mr. Shawn Baldwin, Director of Operations, for a Co-Manager position in Tulsa, Oklahoma. Mr. Baldwin said I was a strong candidate for the position and told me he would get back to me. Some time afterward, Mr. Alderson came into the store and told me that he heard I was going to get the job and that Mr. Baldwin should be contacting me to tell me. Mr. Smithson later told me that Mr. Alderson had indicated to him that I was going to get the position and asked me if I had heard anything yet. On May 19, 1999, after I had been suspended by Mr. Smithson, I called Mr. Baldwin who told me that a male General Manager from Florida was stepping down from his position "for personal reasons" and assuming the Co-Manager position in Tulsa which I should have gotten. I believe that Mr. Smithson sabotaged my promotion opportunity by unfairly suspending me and disciplining me even though Wal-Mart had verified that the refund I had made had actually occurred. Mr. Smithson simply did not want me to get the Co-Manager job in Tulsa because I am a woman.

22. I reported to the Lubbock store in June 1999. The General Manager was Mr. Duke Parrish.

23. On October 7, 1999, Mr. Parrish invited the three male Assistant Managers, Keith Musick, Jerry Ratliff and Ron Torres, to take a "skills assessment test" to assess their ability to perform the duties of General Manager. I was excluded from this opportunity to demonstrate my ability to perform as a General Manager, a position I had been seeking for a long time.. I approached Mr. Parrish and said, "How come the three guys get to take it [the skills assessment test] and I don't? Why can't one of the guys not take it and I can?" Mr. Parrish said there were only three tests which had been designated for only these three managers. I believe I was never allowed an opportunity to take this test because I am a woman.

24. On October 15, 1999, I discovered that Mr. Parrish failed to deposit approximately $3,000.00 in cash he had received for the sale of a company forklift and had instructed that the cash instead be placed in the office safe which was in violation of Wal-Mart's policy. I immediately directed the accounting office associate to deposit the money and made a report of Mr. Parrish's policy violation to Ron Torres, the Assistant Manager in charge of the store in Mr. Parrish's absence.

25. On October 16, the very next day, the store implemented a new "elite membership" upgrade program, and I was responsible for training the store's employees regarding the new procedure. I gathered several employees together to demonstrate the new system. Since there was no one to use as an example to demonstrate how to upgrade their membership to an elite membership, we searched the computer for an employee for whom it would cost very little to upgrade their membership, based upon a proration of their existing membership value. Our research revealed that an Assistant Manager, Keith Musick, would only have to spend $13.74 to upgrade his existing membership to an elite membership. Using him as an example for demonstration purposes, I showed the employees how to accomplish the upgrade process. I then instructed an associate in the accounting office how to reverse the transaction if, when we spoke with Keith, he did not want the upgrade. I also reported what had happened to Mr. Tones, the acting General Manager at the time. I later informed Mr. Musick what we had done, and he said he would let me know later that day whether or not he wanted the upgraded membership. Instead of hearing back from Mr. Musick later that day, Mr. Parrish called me into his office because apparently

Mr. Musick had complained about me using his membership account as a training example, and Mr. Parrish said he would have to consult with Mr. Alderson about "what action to take." Mr. Torres was also present and denied that I had informed him about the situation when it occurred. The next day, Mr. Parrish told me, "I talked with Larry [Alderson]; we have decided that we are going to terminate you for violation of company policy."

26. After being terminated by Mr. Alderson and Mr. Parrish, I learned from Ms. Suzanne Austin, an hourly associate at the Sherman store, that a male manager in a Phoenix, Arizona, Sam's Club, Wayne Backus, had already departed the Phoenix store on October 15, 1999, the day before my supposed "violation of company policy" on October 16, to move to Lubbock to replace me. I then recalled a telephone conversation between Mr. Parrish and Mr. Backus I had overheard on October 3, wherein Mr. Parrish told Mr. Backus, "Don't worry, I'll talk to Larry [Alderson]; he'll make room."

27. Because my termination was so obviously discriminatory and unfair, I then used the Open Door and called Mr. Greg Spragg, the Regional Vice President. Mr. Spragg told me that he had been told that I rang up Mr. Musick's membership because I "felt pressure to get an elite membership," which I told Mr. Spragg was totally false. I then confronted Mr. Spragg with the fact that Mr. Backus was already on his way to the Lubbock Store to take my job. Mr. Spragg admitted that he had authorized Mr. Backus' transfer and that the Lubbock store would then have more managers than were required for a store of its size. Mr. Spragg then said that he was going to send a person from loss prevention to contact me. I never heard from loss prevention, but I did receive a call from Mr. Steve Rodriguez, the Regional Personnel Manager. I told him about the harmless training exercise that had occurred. On October 29, 1999, I received a call from Mr. Spragg who said he was going to uphold my termination.

28. I believe I was terminated because I am a woman, because I complained to Mr. Parrish about gender discrimination regarding his refusal to allow me to take the skills assessment test, because I challenged Mr. Parrish's authority when I reported his failure to deposit the cash sale funds in accordance with Wal-Mart policy, and because Wal-Mart had already made the decision to replace me with a male manager from Arizona and therefore needed to fabricate a reason to terminate me.

29. Since I knew that I had been discriminated against because of my gender, I filed a Charge of Discrimination with the EEOC through my attorney on October 25, 1999. See Exhibit A attached hereto and incorporated herein. I filed an EEOC Charge of Discrimination form, dated January 4, 1999 [sic 2000]. See Exhibit B attached hereto and incorporated herein. I filed an Amended Charge of Discrimination with the EEOC, dated April 3, 2000. See Exhibit C attached hereto and incorporated herein.

30. If I could be assured that I could work at Wal-Mart free from gender discrimination and retaliation, with equal opportunity for promotion and pay, I would consider re-employment with Wal-Mart as a manager.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and the State of Oklahoma, that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 10, 2003, at Tulsa, Oklahoma.

I, CLEO PAGE, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I am a 34 year old African American woman and I currently work as a teacher for a disabled student in Sappala, Oklahoma. I have held this position since August 2001.

3. I was hired at the Tulsa, Oklahoma Supercenter in July 1997 and worked there until July 1998. When I applied to work at Wal-Mart in the summer 1997, I had prior retail experience working in several retail stores including Foley's, Lane Bryant and T.J. Max over a period of several years. Despite my prior retail work experience, I was placed as a cashier and stayed in that position throughout the entire period that I worked at the store. I observed that women mostly worked as cashiers and in departments that included clothes and lingerie, while men staffed the automotive, meat and produce departments. I was not given the opportunity to expand my knowledge of the various departments in the Tulsa store.

4. In approximately June or July 1998, I made the decision to move to California. I attempted to transfer from the Tulsa store to a store in California. I contacted the store manager Wes Morris, who informed me that I was not eligible for transfer because of information concerning written coachings in my personnel file. Wal-Mart denied my request so I resigned my employment at the Tulsa store in July 1998. I applied for a position at a Wal-Mart store in Union City, California, in August 1998 and was hired to work in the return center accepting returned merchandise. When I began working at the Union City store, I observed that the store operated the same as the Tulsa store except that there had been a larger food section in Tulsa because it was a super center. The application process and orientation at the Union City store were similar to what I had experienced at the Tulsa store.

5. Within weeks of my hire at the Union City store #2031, I found a place to live in Livermore, California that required me to commute 30 to 40 minutes each day one way. I requested and received a transfer to the Wal-Mart store in Livermore, California in October 1998 where Monique Taylor was store manager. When I transferred to her store, Monique Taylor told me that if I had come to her store initially, she would have arranged to transfer me from Tulsa to her store. Monique Taylor's statement made it clear to me that exceptions could be made to any Wal-Mart policy or procedure as long as someone in management took the steps to do so. However, I discovered that such exceptions were made only for those who management favored and wanted to see advance within the company.

6. My first position in the Livermore store was at the return desk where I worked for one to two months. In December 1998, I applied for and was promoted to Customer Service Manager ("CSM"). As a customer service manager, I was responsible for supervising employees and overseeing the operations of the front end of the store. I worked as a customer service manager until approximately November 1999. During that time, the cashiers and accounting employees voted me the best customer service manager in the store. I performed well in the position and my colleagues recognized and acknowledged me for it. I received an above standard evaluation for the year.

7. While I was a CSM, I applied for a support manager position between December 1998 and November 1999. A support manager assists assistant managers in managing different areas of the store. The position provides associates with the opportunity to get experience in all parts of the store and prepares an employee to perform the duties of an assistant manager. For these reasons, support manager is a stepping stone to promotion to the assistant manager in training program. Because I wanted to be selected for the assistant manager in training program, I expressed interest in promotion to Monique Taylor to support manager and applied for an available position. However, a less qualified male CSM Jason Luna was promoted to the position despite my above standard rating and recognition as the best customer service manager in the store.

8. After I was denied the position of support manager, I continued to express interest in promotion and eventually was selected for promotion to department manager of the Mens' Wear Department in November 1999. Shortly after I was promoted to Mens' Wear department manager, Store Manager Taylor informed me that I had to transfer to the Boys Department because of a requirement that new department managers start with a smaller department. It seemed odd to me that Store Manager Taylor was unaware of this requirement when she selected me for the Mens' Wear position in the first place. I had never heard of this requirement before nor did I find it in writing on the Pipeline or elsewhere. I transferred to the Boys Department and remained in the position until I resigned in November 2000.

9. Throughout the remainder of my time at Wal-Mart, I expressed interest in promotion to the support manager position and to the assistant manager training program to store managers Monique Taylor and then to Hahn Seraypheap, who replaced Ms. Taylor in early 2000. When I spoke to Store Manager Taylor specifically about a promotion to assistant manager training, she informed me that if I wore blouses and tops with collar, I would be a good candidate for promotion. However, I was never selected for the assistant manager training program while she was store manager although my evaluations reflected that I dressed appropriately. I applied for another support manager position between January and November 2000 while I was department manager in the Boys Department. After the selection was made, I spoke to Store Manager Seraypheap about why I had not been selected for the support manager job or for the assistant manager program. She told me that she wanted me to work in a bigger department before I was promoted to support manager because, if I could run a large department, I could run the store effectively. However, Ms. Seraypheap never provided me with the opportunity to manage a larger department so that I could get the experience that she told me I needed.

10. While I was at the Livermore Wal-Mart store I observed, as I had in the Tulsa Supercenter, that there were certain departments where men were selected to manage as department managers. I specifically recall that men were assigned to work in the automotive and sporting goods departments. At a meeting in late 1999 or early 2000, in which I was present with other department managers, Store Manager Seraypheap stated that she was going to give an available sporting goods department manager position that was posted to a man because she "needed a man in the job."I did not apply for the position because I understood that the store manager had already made up her mind about the gender of the successful applicant. True to her word, Store Manager Seraypheap promoted a male associate, Curtis Koonce, who had been hired a year after I was in the Livermore store and who had been employed by Wal-Mart for only a few months, to the department manager of sporting goods. The sporting goods department is a large department in the store and I would have been interested in the job because it would have given me the experience that I had been told I needed to be promoted to support manager or assistant manager trainee.

11. I also learned that Curtis Koonce earned a higher salary than I did although I had been with the company longer and had been in various supervisory positions.

12. In October 2000, I received a written coaching from the store manager, and assistant manager Matt Mayland after I left shopping carts along the wall of my department. I was surprised by the coaching because I had seen Ms. Seraypheap the day before. She had seen the baskets and never indicated that there was a problem. During my employment at Wal-Mart, I observed that other departments had not only left baskets but also unsightly trash and I am unaware of anyone being written up in the same manner. I was also aware that the written coaching was not in compliance with Wal-Mart policy, which requires a verbal coaching prior to a written coaching. This had been my first coaching in the Livermore store.

13. After I received the coaching, it became clear to me that, despite my repeated expressed interest in promotion and the efforts that I had made to improve my chances for promotion, I was not going to be promoted to support manager or assistant manager trainee. The store manager was making no effort to ensure that I was getting the experience that she said I needed to move up in the company. I was particularly frustrated after I was denied two support manager positions, as discussed above, that I was qualified to fill. It was also discouraging to observe that a less qualified man could be promoted to a larger department and earn more money than I although I had worked well as a customer service manager and department manager and was qualified for advancement to management. It became clear to me based on my experiences that I would never be promoted to support manager or assistant manager trainee.

14. As a result of the coaching and my frustration and disappointment after I was denied promotions to support manager and assistant manager trainee, I resigned from Wal-Mart in November 2000.

15. I decided to become a named plaintiff in this action because I was denied promotions to management positions I was qualified to fill and was paid a lower salary than less qualified men despite my qualifications. I also observed how women were assigned to departments that were less likely to lead to promotion while men were promoted to departments that were larger and provided them with greater opportunities for advancement within the company. My primary goal is to make sure that Wal-Mart can no longer stop the progress of women who want to be promoted to management and that Wal-Mart's discriminatory practices be changed, to ensure fair and equitable treatment of female employees. I understand the responsibilities of a named plaintiff and I am prepared to fulfill my duties to the women in the class.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Oklahoma that the foregoing is true and correct.

I, CAROLYN E. PERKINS, declare:

1. I worked at Wal-Mart from November 1998 to September 2001. I worked at two stores in North Carolina, the Aberdeen store and the Laurinburg store. Both were Supercenters. I am female.

2. I was hired in November 1998 as a sales associate in softlines at a pay rate of $5.75/hour. This low hourly wage was given to me despite the fact that, on the job application, I requested a starting wage of $6.50 to $7.00/hour. I thought that I should have been paid more because I had prior retail experience. I had most recently been making $7.50/hour managing a convenience store. I asked the personnel manager, Tina [Last Name Unknown], why the starting wage was so low, and she said that's just what the starting wage was.

3. While I was working in softlines at Wal-Mart, I alerted store management to 13 customers who were shoplifting in the store during a three-week period. Because of these efforts, I was transferred to loss prevention in August 1999. My starting pay in loss prevention was $7.50/hour.

4. For two years, I worked as a loss prevention associate. I always received satisfactory performance evaluations.

5. During those two years, there were up to six other employees, all men, working loss prevention in the same District. One of them, James Watkins, kept telling me that he made a lot more money than I did. He started saying this about three months after I was transferred to loss prevention. He said he made almost twice what I was making.

6. In about December 2000, when I was making $9.00/hour, I complained to my supervisor, Jeff Cope, about the pay difference. He said he would check into it and get back to me, but he never did. I kept after him to raise my pay. Sometimes he just said it wasn't in the budget. Other times he said that he would have to ask his supervisor, Tim [Last Name Unknown], the Regional Manager for Loss Prevention, but then he would never get back to me.

7. In about April 2001 I became aware that many of the men working loss prevention in our district were making more per hour than I was, including James Watkins, Steve Maim, Chad [Last Name Unknown], Jason Evans, Vince Bustillo, and Derek "Keith" Todd. Some of these men had been working at Wal-Mart less time than I had. I learned about the pay differences because James Watkins had a special code to get into the computer and sometimes he would pull up all the pay rates. He showed them to me as well as several other people. I recall that the male loss prevention associates made at least $1 to $4 more per hour than I did.

8. I complained to Loss Prevention Manager Cope after this happened. I told him I did not think it was fair that I should be making so much less money than all the men, especially because I usually made more apprehensions (caught more shoplifters) than they did. In fact, there were many months in which I exceeded my quota. However, Manager Cope would take some of my apprehensions away from me on the monthly report and give them to some of the guys to bring them up to their quotas. After I complained about my pay, Cope said he would check into it. He also said he would talk to Regional Manager Tim [Last Name Unknown] about it. When I hadn't heard anything back, I reminded him again three or four weeks later, but he never got back to me.

9. One time I spoke directly to Regional Manager Tim [Last Name Unknown] about it. He said he could understand why I was upset at not getting paid as much as the men, especially because I was working in a Supercenter. However, he did nothing to correct the pay difference.

10. In about May 2001 I called the Wal-Mart "800" number. I told the person I spoke to about the pay disparities. She took my name and telephone number and said she would get back to me, but I never heard from her. Within days of that phone call, I received a coaching for unintentionally working more than 40 hours in a week resulting in a small amount of overtime. I had never received any discipline or coaching before and I don't think the timing was a coincidence. During the same pay period, James Watkins and Steve Mann had both worked more than 40 hours, and as far as I know neither one of them got coached for it.

11. In June 2001, Jeff Cope wrote me up again. He claimed that I was not making enough apprehensions. As noted above, a number of male loss prevention associates did not meet their apprehension quotas but, as far as I know, they did not get written up for it. I had also missed my quota previously, but I had never been disciplined for it before.

12. In September, 2001, I was terminated. I stopped a boy whom I observed taking a pair of earrings off a display and putting them in his right front pocket. The boy refused to admit he had taken the earrings when I stopped him, and his mother later complained about to management. My supervisor, Jeff Cope, claimed this was a questionable stop and terminated me for it. I was aware of male loss prevention associates making similar or more "questionable" stops and they were not disciplined for it, let alone fired. For example, on one occasion Steve Mann, who was also working in the Laurinburg store, stopped a young male whom he had observed shoplifting a watch. When Mann approached the young man outside the store and questioned him about having taken the watch, the man denied it, caused a big ruckus, and threatened to sue. I was at the store that day and heard about the incident from Mann. Assistant Manager Jimmy Atkins informed Jeff Cope about the incident, but as far as I know Mann was not disciplined for it and he certainly was not fired.

13. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of North Carolina that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 9, 2003, at Raeford, N.C. 28376.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, EDITH ARANA, DEBORAH GUNTER, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, CLEO PAGE, KAREN WILLIAMSON, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiff, vs. WAL-MART STORES, INC., Defendant	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF LORI PIDICH IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Lori Pidich, declare:

1. I am a woman and a former Wal-Mart employee. After working for Wal-Mart for six years, I was fired because I would not relocate my home.

2. I began working at Wal-Mart in 1994 when I was twenty-three years old. Prior to working at Wal-Mart, I worked for more than four years as a front end supervisor at two different retail stores. I had also earned an Associates degree in applied retail science. At my interview to work for Wal-Mart, I told Assistant Manager John Kramer that I was interested in a career with Wal-Mart because I had heard that the company provided advancement opportunities. I love the retail environment and was excited to work for Wal-Mart. I had heard of Wal-

Mart's reputation as our country's up-and-coming retailer.

3. From 1994 until 2000, I worked as an hourly employee in the following positions: customer service manager, jewelry department manager, electronics department associate, accessories department manager, girls department manager, and infants department manager. During this period, I worked in a Division One Wal-Mart store in West Miflin, Pennsylvania and in a Wal-Mart Supercenter in Mount Pleasant, Pennsylvania.

4. In 1995, after having worked as jewelry department manager, I was transferred to the electronics department. At the time, there was no department manager in electronics. I assumed the responsibilities of department manager, but was not given the title. While I was working in the electronics department, I received an annual evaluation. I was rated "above standard." A manager wrote on the evaluation that "Lori will be a department mng [manager] someday." A true and correct copy of that evaluation is attached hereto as Pidich Exhibit A. After I began working in the department, a male employee, named Eric Deutsch, transferred into the department and became the department manager. Mr. Deutsch did not know how to run the department. I trained Mr. Deutsch to be the electronics department manager. I never saw a posting for the electronics department manager position that Mr. Deutsch filled, and I was never offered the position.

5. During my career as an hourly employee of Wal-Mart, I repeatedly told my supervisors that I wanted to be promoted to a support manager or Assistant Manager position. I saw male department managers being promoted more quickly than I was.

Eric Deutsch, the electronics department manager that I trained, was promoted to support manager and then to the management training program. Brian Lemley, the chemicals department manager, was promoted to support manager and later to Assistant Manager. Scott Stanley, the sporting goods department manager, was promoted to support manager and later to the management training program. Bob Mathers, a receiving department employee, was promoted to support manager and then to the management training program. Chad Mathers, the food department manager, was promoted to support manager and then to the management training program. These five men were promoted to support manager, management training, and Assistant Manager positions years before I was invited to enter management training.

6. After becoming Assistant Managers, Bob Mathers and Brian Lemley continued to work in the West Miflin Wal-Mart store. Mr. Mathers and Mr. Lemley were not required to relocate. As Assistant Managers, Scott Stanley and Chad Mathers were assigned to Wal-Mart stores in the Pittsburgh area. My home is within commuting distance of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.

7. I received an annual evaluation in October 1997. Assistant Manager Krista Bobnar wrote on that evaluation that I "would make a good support manager." A true and correct copy of that evaluation is attached hereto as Pidich Exhibit B. I saw a support manager position posted in the store where I worked on only one occasion. I applied for the position, but was not selected. Despite the comment on my evaluation, I was never promoted to the position of support manager.

8. When Bob Mathers was promoted to support manager, I asked Store Manager Herman Enderle why Mr. Mathers was promoted instead of me and why the position was not posted. Mr. Enderle told me that it was his decision, that I should just keep working hard, and that there would be other opportunities in the future. Because Mr. Enderle did not tell me that I could do anything to get promoted, other than working hard as I was already doing, I did not think that using the "open door" would be effective when Chad Mathers, Brian Lemley, and Eric Deutsch were promoted to support manager positions instead of me.

9. I began working at the Mount Pleasant Supercenter in September 1999. Although I was classified as a UPC clerk, I frequently performed special assignments. I trained department managers. I traveled to different stores in the district to perform STAR audits. I worked on a "high shrink review" at the Belle Vernon, Pennsylvania store. I helped prepare the Uniontown store for an inventory. I worked at the Washington, Pennsylvania Wal-Mart store while it was being converted to a Supercenter, helping Assistant Manager Michelle Jones to run the Division One store while the new Supercenter was being set-up. I assumed the responsibilities of the softlines Assistant Manager in the Mount Pleasant store when the Assistant Manager was on a leave of absence. In that capacity, I prepared the softlines department managers for a scheduled inventory.

10. In the summer of 2000, District Manager David Rulli asked me if I wanted to interview for the management training program. Mr. Rulli told me that Mount Pleasant Store Manager Delia Gerdes had recommended me. Ms. Gerdes was the first and only female Store Manager for whom I had worked at Wal-Mart. Ms. Gerdes became Store Manager of the Mount Pleasant store only a few months before Mr. Rulli approached me about entering the management training program.

11. I told Mr. Rulli that I wanted to be promoted to management, but I did not want to relocate my home. I have lived in the same area of western Pennsylvania all of my life. All of my family lives there, including my grandmother who resided in a nursing home. I was willing to drive to any store within the district and to stores outside of the district that are within commuting distance. Mr. Rulli told me that I would not have to relocate my home and that, as an Assistant Manager, I would be placed in a store within the district.

12. Mr. Rulli completed a form that showed that I was being promoted to the management training program. He told me that he had written on the form that I could not relocate. A true and correct copy of that form is attached hereto as Pidich Exhibit C. "No Relo" is written on the bottom left-hand corner of the form.

13. On the same day, I signed another form stating that I agreed "to move" following completion of the training program. A true and correct copy of the form is attached hereto as Pidich Exhibit D. I understood my signature to mean that I would have to move to a different store after completing the training program. I did not understand my signature to mean that I would have to move my home. I trusted District Manager Rulli's promise that, as an Assistant Manager, I would be assigned to a store within his district.

14. I transferred to the Belle Vernon, Pennsylvania store to do my training. I began the training program later than planned because, at the time that I was scheduled to begin, I was I performing the duties of softlines Assistant Manager in the Mount Pleasant Supercenter. The Store Manager in Mount Pleasant would not let me leave the Mount Pleasant Supercenter.

15. As I was nearing completion of the management training program, Belle Vernon Store Manager Jim Lowe informed me that I was assigned to work as an Assistant Manager in a Wal-Mart store in Shrewsbury, Pennsylvania. Shrewsbury is about a four or five hour drive from my home. It is not in the district where I was working.

16. I spoke to District Manager Rulli about my assignment to Shrewsbury. I reminded Mr. Rulli of the paper on which he had written that I would not be relocated. Mr. Rulli denied writing that.

17. I used the "open door" policy to contact Regional Personnel Manager Kirk Garza. After I explained the situation, Mr. Garza replied that it was my word against Mr. Rulli's word, and that he believed Mr. Rulli. I told Mr. Garza that a male in the management training program, Charles "Vince" Garufi, had been assigned to work in the Wal-Mart store in Uniontown, Pennsylvania, within Mr. Rulli's district. To my knowledge, Mr. Garufi had never worked for Wal-Mart before entering the management training program. Mr. Garza told me that he would not discuss other trainees' assignments with me. Mr. Garza told me that my only options were to transfer to Shrewsbury or to resign. I asked Mr. Garza if I could step down to an hourly position. Mr. Garza refused to permit me to step down, even though doing so would enable me to continue working for Wal-Mart. I found that the "open door" policy was ineffective.

18. After I was told of my assignment to Shrewsbury, I learned that there was an opening for a girls department manager in the Belle Vernon, Wal-Mart store where I was doing my training. I applied for the position. I had managed the girls department at the West Miflin store, and I had years of experience managing other softlines departments. I was not interviewed for, or offered, the position.

19. On January 19, 2001, I was fired from Wal-Mart because I refused to transfer to Shrewsbury. A few weeks after I was fired, I received a call from Belle Vernon Store Manager Jim Lowe. Mr. Lowe told me that he would permit me to call Store Managers outside of Mr. Rulli's district to find out whether there were any openings for hourly positions. Mr. Lowe told me that I could not ask those Store Managers if there were any Assistant Manager openings.

20. After I was fired, I filed a complaint with the Pennsylvania Human Relations Commission. In that complaint, I alleged that Wal-Mart discriminated against me on the basis of my gender by assigning me to Shrewsbury while assigning a male employee, Vince Garufi, to a store within the district where I worked. A true and correct copy of that complaint is attached hereto as Pidich Exhibit E.

21. At my deposition, Wal-Mart produced a response to my discrimination complaint. A true and correct copy of the response is attached here to as Pidich Exhibit F. The response is verified by Robert C. DeMoss, Corporate Counsel of Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. In paragraph 5 of the response, Wal-Mart "denies employing a male associate, Mr. Garufi." That statement by Wal-Mart Corporate Counsel is false.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Pennsylvania that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 10 (month and day), 2003, at Monessen PA (city and state).

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, CLEO PAGE, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, DEBORAH GUNTER, KAREN WILLIAMSON AND EDITH ARANA, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiff, vs. WAL-MART STORES, INC., Defendant	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF SUE MCFARLAND RAMIREZ IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, SUE RAMIREZ, declare:

1. I make this declaration on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I was employed by Wal-Mart, Inc. from August 1989 until September 2001. I am female. While I was employed by Wal-Mart, I was known as Sue McFarland.

3. I began my career at Wal-Mart as a Customer Service Manager in the Wagner, Oklahoma. I moved on to be a District Assistant where I worked in approximately fifty stores. I was then a District Manager in the Shoes and Jewelry Specialty Division over seven stores. I spent my last three years with the Company as a Co-Manager at a Supercenter in El Paso, Texas. I was never disciplined at any time during my employment with Wal-Mart and my performance evaluations were always at least "above average," "exceeds expectations," or "outstanding." I was never offered a Store Manager position.

4. I first applied to Wal-Mart after Store Manager Joe Swenson recruited me to apply for the Customer Service Manager (CSM) position at Store No. 63 in Wagner, Oklahoma. At that time, I had been the Store Manager of Arrow Printshop for five years and I believed Wal-Mart would offer me greater opportunities for advancement. In my initial interview with Personnel Manager Amy Prime, I expressed interest in a management career even though I knew I was applying for the CSM position. Ms. Prime did not provide me with any information about Wal-Mart's Management Training Program or how to apply for management opportunities. Instead I learned from Ms. Prime, and others after I started working, that you advanced at Wal-Mart by working your way up the ladder.

5. I tried to do that at the Wagner store. However, there was no formal posting or application system for moving to positions within the store or seeking a promotion. Instead, I learned about open positions by observing, or hearing from co-workers, that certain employees were quitting or being fired, transferred or promoted. After about a year as CSM, I became the UPC Clerk simply by asking male Store Manager Gary Dickens for the position when I learned it was vacant. I was "tapped on the shoulder" to be the UPC Assistant about a year later by the new male Store Manager, Mike Altemueller, when the current UPC Assistant left the position. Mr. Altemueller just asked me if I wanted the position and I said yes. I remained in this position for about eighteen months when I learned that a new district was being created and that the new District Manager was going to be housed in the Wagner store. I asked the current male Store Manager, Greg Epps, if he would recommend me to the District Manager to be the new District Assistant. The new District Manager, Carl Simpson, interviewed me and gave me the position. The job was not posted and I did not apply for it other than asking my Store Manager to tell the District Manager that I was interested in it.

6. I was interested in getting a job at the District level because I believed it would offer me more advancement opportunities than the Wagner store had. After more than four years of employment at the store level, my pay rate had only increased from $5.25 to $7.70 per hour despite my good performance evaluations, various promotions, and merit raises. Moreover, I had observed that each of the jobs in the front end where I worked was comprised almost exclusively of women. I had also observed that the Store Manager had changed four times and each time a man had been transferred into the position. Finally, none of the Store Managers or Assistant Managers was mentoring me or in any way developing me for management opportunities.

7. I was promoted to District Assistant in November 1993. This is an hourly position and my pay had to be increased twice to bring me up to the Company pay guideline of $8.80 an hour. My job duties included budgeting, doing audits in the individual stores' offices, and assisting the District Manager in the operational end of his work with the stores in his district.

8. Mr. Simpson's district initially included about seven stores. However, the district was constantly changing as Wal-Mart expanded. My job duties required me to visit all the stores in the district on a regular basis. This required extensive traveling. After about three years, Larry Wilcockson replaced Carl Simpson as the District Manager. The district continued to change and I was exposed to many different new stores. During the five years I was District Assistant, I also worked with District Managers Buddy Caldwell and David Carmen and had an opportunity to visit the stores in their district as well. I believe that I worked in over fifty stores while holding the position of District Assistant. I observed that each of the stores under District Managers Simpson, Wilcockson, Caldwell and Carmen operated similarly and followed the same policies and practices that I had learned as an associate in the Wagner store.

9. As District Assistant, I reviewed the daily, weekly and monthly financial and personnel reports that the Home Office prepared for each of the stores in my district. These reports were available to me from the Company-wide computer system that linked each store to corporate headquarters. The District Manager would review these reports with each Store Manager in the district on a regular basis, either through an individual telephone call or store visit, or through weekly conference calls with all the Store Managers in the district, or during district-wide meetings held at various stores. I frequently attended these meetings and participated in the conference calls.

10. I observed that my own job was gender-segregated. I did not meet any male District Assistants during the five years I was a District Assistant and I did not met any after I left that position. I also observed that men holding jobs with much less responsibility, such as grocery stocker or a grocery department manager, were paid more than I was. Despite an outstanding evaluation my last year as a District Assistant, my hourly rate was still only $11.50 an hour in 1996, seven years after I began my career at Wal-Mart. I wrote on my 1996 evaluation, as I had written on earlier evaluations, that I was interested in advancing in the Company: "Enjoy my job, working with Larry and each of the stores. Would like to continue to learn operations and more merchandising skills. Want to understand all company functions. Definitely want to grow with Company." (Attached hereto as Ramirez Exhibit A is a true and accurate copy of my 1996 annual performance evaluation.)

11. In May 1997, I talked with District Manager Wilcockson about my future with the Company. He told me that the only way to get promoted would be to become a salaried member of management. By now I was very well qualified for a management position and eager to move up. My ultimate goal was to become a Regional Personnel Manager. Mr. Wilcockson was supportive and several days later the male Regional Personnel Manager, Rod Thurston, called me. We discussed the job responsibilities of an assistant manager and he asked me to take a drug test. As soon as the results were in, Mr. Thurston told me that I was being promoted to Assistant Manager at Store No. 41 in Bartlesville, Oklahoma. The position was not posted and I did not apply for it. I was paid an annual salary of approximately $29,500. However, I was told not to transfer to the Bartlesville store until I had finished opening up several new Supercenters in my district and assisting the Regional Loss Prevention team with high shrink issues. I was also instructed to begin reporting to male Store Manager Rick Rubiken in the Bartlesville store and to complete the Assistant Manager Training Program through Wal-Mart's computer-based learning system.

12. Several months later, before I ever transferred to the Bartlesville store as an Assistant Manager, the Regional Manager for the Jewelry and Shoes Specialty Division, Cindy Marsh, visited the District Office looking for Assistant Managers interested in going into the Specialty Division Management Training Program. I started talking to her about it and indicated that I was interested in that opportunity. I was next interviewed by the Divisional Manager for the Jewelry and Shoes Specialty Division, Jim Wake, and accepted into the program. I was sent to train with a female District Manager, Jody McAnnally, in the Tulsa area.

13. I completed the Jewelry and Shoes Specialty Division District Manager Training Program in October 1997. I was promoted to District Manager in the St. Louis, Missouri area after Divisional Manager Wake called me about the opening. I went to corporate headquarters in Bentonville, Arkansas for further interviews. Mr. Wake informed me that I was being promoted. My salary only increased to approximately $32,000. I was required to relocate my home to St. Louis, Missouri to begin training. As District Manager in the Jewelry and Shoes Specialty Division, my duties included ensuring that the seven stores in my district were operationally correct regarding the inventory and staffing of the Jewelry and Shoe Departments, and controlling shrink in these departments due to theft. I held this position for about ten months. My direct supervisor was the Regional Manager over the Jewelry and Shoes Specialty Division. At first this was Ional Duval. Later, the position was filled by a male, Lenny Fulcher. The Regional Manager reported to the Divisional Manager, Greg Wake. This is the same reporting structure used by the main Wal-Mart stores.

14. During the time I was a District Manager in the Specialty Division, I observed that the Jewelry and Shoe Departments in each of my stores operated similarly and followed the same policies and practices as the other departments in the Wal-Mart store even though they were technically in the Specialty Division. Thus, I used the same Company guidelines and forms for hiring, evaluating, promoting, disciplining and terminating employees in the Specialty Division as had the District Managers I worked for when I was a District Assistant. I also attended the same Company-wide year-end and holiday meetings in Bentonville that the non-Specialty Division managers attended.

15. As a District Manager in the Specialty Division, I had available to me the same daily, weekly and monthly reports from corporate headquarters regarding the financial and personnel operations of the Jewelry and Shoe Departments in each of my stores as I had used when I was a District Assistant. I would review these reports with the Jewelry and Shoe Department Managers in my stores on a regular basis through telephone calls, store visits, or district-wide meetings held at various stores.

16. After about six months in the District Manager position, I decided that I wanted to return to the main Wal-Mart division because it had become clear to me that the Specialty Division was also segregated by gender and that my current position was not such a good stepping stone for achieving my goal of Regional Personnel Manager. In particular, I observed at the district level that women were assigned almost exclusively to the Jewelry and Shoes Division while men were most often assigned to the Tire Lube Express Division, the Pharmacy, and the Photo Lab.

17. I called the Regional Personnel Manager who had promoted me to Assistant Manager, Rod Thurston, and told him that I was interested a co-manager position. I was really worried that the District Manager position in Jewelry and Shoes would be a dead end for my career. Mr. Thurston and I discussed the responsibilities of the co-manager position, base pay, and the fact that I would need to relocate to another store. About four months later, Mr. Thurston informed me that I could begin co-manager training at Store No. 271 in Eureka, Missouri.

18. I transferred to the Eureka store and trained for approximately three months under male Store Manager Bud Gardner. In approximately November 1998, Regional Personnel Manager Thurston called me about an open co-manager position at Store No. 2612 in El Paso, Texas. We discussed whether El Paso would be a good place for me and my daughter and the moving arrangements. I told him that I was interested in the position so long as I did not have to relocate again until after my daughter graduated from high school, which would be in May 2000, about eighteen months away. I was recently divorced and very much wanted a stable environment for my daughter.

19. Mr. Thurston called me back a day or two later and told me that I definitely had the job in El Paso. This job was not posted and I did not apply for it. I did not interview with anyone else besides Mr. Thurston. However, I would not have accepted the El Paso position if I had not understood from Mr. Thurston that the District Director in El Paso had agreed that I would not need to relocate until after my daughter graduated.

20. In approximately January 1999, after I had been working as a Co-Manager for approximately five months, Store Manager Lorenzo Nava told me that District Manager Rick Klein had told him that I was promotable and that I should start looking for a Store Manager position. I started looking for an open Store Manager position at this time but I also reminded Store Manager Nava and District Manager Klein that I could not look outside the El Paso area.

21. Over the next eighteen months, at least five Store Manager positions became available in the El Paso area in Stores Nos. 512, 500, 964, 1015, and 2612. Three of these positions were not posted and one was posted for a mere 24 hours before it was filled. I was not allowed to apply and/or was not considered for any of these positions, as detailed below.

22. In the fall of 1999, I learned through the grapevine that the current male Store Manager of Store No. 512, Rick Espino, was leaving. I wanted to apply for the job but it was not posted on Wal-Mart's Management Career Services computerized program. I called District Manager Klein to let him know that I was interested in the position but he was not in so I left a message with his Assistant that I needed to speak with him. I also expressed my interest in the position to my Store Manager, Lorenzo Nava. Mr. Nava told me that Wal-Mart was filling the position with a male Co-Manager from Houston, David Watts. District Manager Klein never returned my phone call and shortly after my conversation with my Store Manager, David Watts did, in fact, become the Store Manager in Store No. 512.

23. During this same time period, I also learned through the grapevine that Store No. 500 was losing its current Store Manager. Again, the job was not posted on the Wal-Mart computer so I called District Manager Klein to let him know I was interested. He was not available but I left a message with his Assistant requesting him to call me. I never received a call from Mr. Klein and later learned that Rick Espino, the former Store Manager at Store No. 512, had transferred there.

24. Some time later but before my daughter graduated, another male Store Manager, James Zepeda, left Store No. 964. As before, I wanted to apply for this position but it was not posted on Wal-Mart's computer. I called District Manager Klein to apply for the job but he was again unavailable and never returned my call. I learned later that another male, Jose ("Harvey") Ayala, got the job.

25. I was extremely upset that District Manager Klein had not advised me of, allowed me to apply for, or interviewed me for any of the positions discussed above so I decided to use Wal-Mart's "open door" policy to discuss my concerns with the Regional Personnel Manager Tom Gallegos. I met with Mr. Gallegos privately during a company-wide meeting in Bentonville and informed him that I thought I had not been treated fairly when I was not interviewed for these three positions, that I was aware of an upcoming opening for a Store Manager in the El Paso area at Store No. 1015, and that I would like an opportunity to apply for it. I understood from his response that I should go ahead and apply and that I would be considered. However, the very next day, District Manager Klein approached me and told me that he knew I had been petitioning for a store and that he did not appreciate it. I understood from this that District Manager Klein did not want me to apply for the position and that if I did, I would not be considered.

26. Unlike the prior Store Manager openings described above, the vacancy at Store No. 1015 was posted on the computer. However, the notice advised only current store managers to apply and it remained on the computer for only one day. Although I had expressed my interest in this position to Regional Personnel Manager Gallegos, I did not apply on the computer because I was not a store manager. Later I learned that a female Co-Manager, Liz Gonzalez, had been promoted to this position.

27. The day after I returned from a vacation after my daughter's graduation, District Manager Klein told me that I needed to apply for stores outside the El Paso area or step down from my position as Co-Manager. Although I was applying to stores outside of El Paso, I told District Manager Klein that I still preferred to remain in the El Paso area as I had made a new life in El Paso. I did not feel my request to remain in El Paso was unreasonable given that I had already relocated on numerous occasions for the Company and the El Paso area was a growing market for Wal-Mart. Also, I did not observe District Manager Klein insisting that the male Co-Managers in his district leave El Paso or step down. When I complained to my Store Manager about how differently Mr. Klein was treating me, Mr. Nava responded that it was to be expected since I was not part of the "good 'ole boy" network. Later I learned from another female Co-Manager in the district, Sheryl Sink, that District Manager Klein had told her that she needed to find a store outside of El Paso or be demoted. Although Ms. Sink had been working at different stores in the El Paso area since 1984 when she first joined Wal-Mart management, and although she was the primary caretaker for her ailing mother, she was not promoted to a store manager position until she relocated to Store No. 829 in Santa Fe, New Mexico.

28. My daughter graduated in May 2000. Over the next year, I applied for store manager positions in Kingsport, Tennessee; Tucson, Arizona; Hilo, Hawaii; Alamagordo, New Mexico; Santa Fe, New Mexico; Las Vegas, Nevada; Sulphur Springs, Texas and Tahlequah, Oklahoma. Although I was interviewed over the phone for some of these positions, I was not selected for any of them.

29. Sometime in early summer 2001, I was recruited by KMart to join their Company as a Store Manager in El Paso. I shared this information with my Store Manager, Lorenzo Nava. Shortly thereafter, the new male Regional Personnel Manager, Brian Cabal, and the Regional Vice President, David Carmen, called me and asked me why I was considering going to another Company. I shared with them my frustration at the limited opportunities I was experiencing in trying to achieve my goal of being a Store Manager at Wal-Mart. They assured me that, if I stayed with Wal-Mart, I would have an opportunity to apply for the next store that opened in El Paso. I told them that I would trust their word and stay. Relying on their representation that I would be considered for a Store Manager position in the El Paso area, I turned down the job with KMart.

30. The next Store Manager position to open in El Paso was at my own store, No. 2612, when Mr. Nava left his employment with Wal-Mart. The job was posted and I applied. Even though I was in charge of the store during the weeks after Mr. Nava left, I was not even interviewed for the position. It was given to another male, Roy Mendoza.

31. I called Regional Personnel Manager Cabal to complain that I had been denied an interview. I reminded him that I had turned down an opportunity and that I hoped I had not made a grave mistake. He responded that he hoped I had not, too. Meanwhile, District Manager Klein continued to pressure me to move out of his district or step down. Several months later I left Wal-Mart to take a Store Manager position at KMart because it was clear to me that I was not going to be promoted to a Store Manager position in El Paso or anywhere else in the country, much less reach my goal of becoming a Regional Personnel Manager.

32. After I left Wal-Mart, at least three male Co-Managers in Mr. Klein's district were allowed to remain in their stores as Co-Managers and not demoted for failing to obtain a Store Manager position: Dale Schier, Willie Huerta, and Fernie [LNU]. I believe District Manager Klein denied me the position of a Store Manager in his district because I am a woman.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Texas that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 11, 2003, at ______________________.

I, Sandra Ratliff, declare:

1. I am a female from Mustang, Oklahoma. I have worked for Wal-Mart in its Oklahoma City Neighborhood Market store since November 1999. During my employment at Wal-Mart, I have repeatedly attempted to get into the Management Training Program, but so far Wal-Mart has chosen to promote and hire males into the Management Training Program instead of me because I am a woman. I used the Open Door to complain about the disparate treatment of men and women in my store, which resulted in retaliation from my store manager and district manager.

2. I was hired at the Neighborhood Market in November 1999, as a meat cutter. Right away, I was introduced to several company polices, including personnel policies. The same personnel policies that are employed by Wal-Mart in its general merchandise stores apply to the Neighborhood Markets. Every personnel policy that I have seen is labeled as a "Wal-Mart" policy, not a "Neighborhood Market" policy. For example, the benefits handbook and the associate handbook that I received at Neighborhood Market are "Wal-Mart" handbooks. I was also taught the Wal-Mart cheer during my orientation.

3. In fact, it was during the extensive presentation on Wal-Mart history and Wal-Mart values that I was inspired to aim for a long-term career and management track at the Neighborhood Market store. I took my interest in a management position to my Store Manager, Keith Smith, and my District Manager, Mike Moore. By April 2000, I had told them that I would like to develop a career with Wal-Mart and I would like to become an Assistant Manager, preferably in the meat department, which was one of my areas of expertise. Prior to working at Wal-Mart, I had spent six and a half years in grocery store management, five years as a meat department manager and one and a half years as a produce manager at an Oklahoma grocery store chain.

4. Mr. Smith and Mr. Moore initially responded to my interest in promotion with apparent encouragement. They told me there was a great potential for me to move into a management position at Neighborhood Market. They explained to me that I would first have to complete the Management Training Program. They told me they would let me know when an opening was available.

5. In April 2000, I was promoted to Lead Associate of the Meat Department. I took the position so that I could learn more about Neighborhood Market operations to help prepare me for a management position in the store.

6. For months after speaking to Mr. Smith and Mr. Moore about becoming a Wal-Mart Assistant Manager, neither of them provided me with any new information regarding how or when I could enter the Management Training Program. When I spoke to Mr. Smith, he said he would get back to me after he talked to Mr. Moore. When I spoke to Mr. Moore, he told me he would get back to me after he talked to Mr. Smith.

7. In August 2000, a male, Corey Zumbro, was promoted into the Management Training Program in our store. Mr. Zumbro had been a meat cutter, like me, in Oklahoma City Wal-Mart supercenter. However, unlike me, Mr. Zumbro had no prior management experience. The opening was not posted. Mr. Smith and Mr. Moore never informed me or approached me about this open trainee position before they gave it to Mr. Zumbro.

8. I was disappointed that a less experienced male was placed in the program instead of me, but nevertheless, I continued to express my interest in promotion to Mr. Smith and Mr. Moore. They continued to tell me they would "get back to me." Finally, in October 2000, Assistant Manager Shari Kinsey, who was the Area Manager over the meat department, approached me and told me that Mr. Moore had scheduled me to enter the Management Training Program. Assistant Manager Kinsey told me I would start after the holiday season, in the beginning of 2001.

9. I was very excited to finally begin the program. I had been living over two hours away from the store and decided that, since I was entering the program, I would commit to living closer to Oklahoma City. In reliance on the increase in salary that I would receive as a Trainee and later as an Assistant Manager, I bought my first home, closer to the Neighborhood Market store.

10. The year 2001 began and I was not promoted to the Management Training Program. By February 2001, a male, Jeff Miller, had entered the Management Training Program. District Manager Moore did not offer me any explanation for failing to promote me and instead promoting Mr. Miller. When I asked Store Manager Greg Hobbs, who had replaced Mr. Smith in the fall of 2000, how this had happened, he acted surprised and said he did not know that I was supposed to be entering the program.

11. I continued to ask Mr. Moore when I would start the program. I also talked to Mr. Hobbs about entering the program. They never gave me any guidance about what I could do to achieve the promotion. They only reiterated that there were lots of opportunities in management because Neighborhood Market stores were expanding, and on one occasion, Mr. Hobbs handed me a print-out which described what a great career opportunity the Management Training Program provided.

12. In May 2001, another male, David Wilcox, was picked for the Management Training Program. Again, I was not put in the program. Mr. Moore or Mr. Hobbs never gave me an explanation for why I was not being promoted to a Management Trainee and Mr. Wilcox was being placed in the program.

13. For over two years, I persisted in pursing a Management Trainee position, by constantly expressing my interest to Mr. Hobbs and Mr. Moore. By September 2002, I was overwhelmingly frustrated. I was on the verge of bankruptcy, because I could not afford the payments for the house that I had bought in reliance on being paid a management salary. I used the Open Door and wrote to Lee Scott, CEO of Wal-Mart, because I was not getting anywhere within my district. Attached hereto as Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of the letter that I sent to Lee Scott. I explained to Mr. Scott that I had been deprived of promotion opportunities to Management Trainee. I explained that I was frustrated with making less money than a male employee in my department while I was working harder than male employees in my department. Joe Mains, a regional employee, responded to my letter, but he soon stepped down from his position and I was never contacted regarding my complaints again.

14. Within a month of my Open Door letter, my third annual performance evaluation was completed in October 2002. For the first time ever, I received only a "meets expectations" on my performance evaluation. My prior ratings were all "exceeds expectations."

15. A few days after I received the rating, Store Manager Mr. Hobbs and District Manager Mr. Moore brought me in the store office. They told me I was not ready for the Management Training Program and cited as proof my "meets expectations" rating on my recent evaluation.

16. My performance had, as usual, "exceeded expectations" so I was very upset about receiving the less desirable and undeserved rating. I believe that Mr. Hobbs and Mr. Moore gave me this rating in retaliation for my using the Open Door to complain about the different treatment of males and females in my store. Additionally, I feel that Mr. Hobbs and Mr. Moore gave me the lower rating to provide themselves with an excuse for keeping me out of the Management Training Program.

17. I also believe that I was denied entrance to the Management Training Program during the past two and one-half years because I am female. Before I reported the gender discrimination to Lee Scott and subsequently received a "meets expectations" rating, my performance had been evaluated as excellent. I had over six years of management experience. However, not only did I not make it into the program, no female in my store has been promoted into our Management Training Program. Since I began working at the Neighborhood Market in November 1999, every employee promoted into the Management Training Program in the Oklahoma City store has been male. Every employee hired into the Management Training Program has also been male. To my knowledge, at least eight males have been Management Trainees in my store since I have been working for Wal-Mart.

18. In January 2003, Store Manager Greg Hobbs announced that those who were interested could apply on the store computer for the Management Training Program. He assured us that everyone who applied would be interviewed for the position. I applied. In March 2003, I was called for an interview. The interview was conducted by the District Manager Lynn Pearsy, a male. He asked me scripted, canned questions. None of the questions were geared toward my work performance, my contributions to the company or what I could offer the company in a management position. I left the office feeling like the interview was staged and that Wal-Mart was not truly considering me for a Management Trainee position.

19. A week later, the District Manager called me and told me that there had only been a "few" positions available, and I did not get one of them. It is now April 2003, and I am still not in the Management Training Program. I have had to declare bankruptcy because I could not afford my house payments. I am resigned that I will not be given a fair opportunity to advance within Wal-Mart because I am female. However, to survive financially, I must continue working here.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Oklahoma that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 10, 2003, at Mustang, Oklahoma.

I, Donna Reed, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I am female and a former Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. employee. I worked for the Sam's Club in Chesapeake, Virginia from April 1994 until February 1998.

3. Prior to working for Sam's Club in 1994, I took several college level courses in business management. Between 1985 and 1993, I had six years of management experience at McDonald's and Wing King.

4. While at Sam's Club, I worked as a Team Lead from 1994 to 1997 and as a Receiving Area Manager from 1997 to 1998.

5. My performance evaluations were consistently above average. I worked well with my peers and maintained good relationships with my managers.

6. During my four years at Sam's Club, I often expressed my interest in pursuing management positions. My General Manager, Mike Manahan, always rebuffed me. He stated there were no openings for management positions and that I was not ready to move into a management position, despite my previous management experience.

7. In 1996, a male Team Lead, Chris Logan, received management training after my request for training had been denied. We were equally qualified.

8. In May 1997, Assistant Manager Regina White informed me of an opening for Receiving Area Manager. The position was not officially posted in the store and Ms. White told me that several other male employees had been offered the position but had turned it down. I applied for the position because I believed it would facilitate future promotions within the Company. However, after a year in the position, I did not receive a promotion to management.

9. In August 1997, I learned that Mr. Manahan was fraternizing with another Sam's Club employee. Their relationship was affecting the workplace in a negative way and I used the Open Door to report the affair to my Regional Manager, Ron Borga. Shortly after this conversation took place, Mr. Manahan began to treat me more harshly than he had before. I felt that Mr. Borga breached my confidentiality and informed Mr. Manahan of my concerns.

10. While working an overnight shift in December 1997, Assistant Manager Jim Burton distributed Christmas gifts to each of the approximately thirteen night crew members with whom he worked. The next morning, Mr. Burton instructed me to ring up the roughly $100 worth of merchandise he had distributed to employees the night before. Mr. Burton was not reprimanded for his actions.

11. Later that month, while working an early morning shift, I became ill and required medication. All the registers were closed at the time my pain began, so I saved the product label and, because I left my employee badge at home, paid for the item the next morning under a co-worker's name. Two months later, Mr. Manahan informed me they were investigating the incident and asked for my badge and keys. Despite my proof of purchase and the electronic computer records maintained in the store, I was fired and escorted out of the store on February 4, 1998. I feel that my termination was retaliation for my use of the Open Door six months earlier.

12. I filed a complaint with the EEOC alleging gender discrimination and received a Right to Sue letter in February 1998.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and the State of Illinois that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on 3-28-2003, 2003, in Chicago, Illinois.

DECLARATION OF CLAUDIA RENATI IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Claudia Renati, declare:

2. In 1993, I began working in a Pace Store in Roseville, CA that was bought soon after by Sam's Club. In 1994, while I was Marketing Membership Team Leader, the Regional Sales Manager Ken Elton left and I became responsible for running the region and doing all the ads and marketing programs. I completed all the tasks of a Regional Sales Manager for two years without the proper title or pay. When I asked Director of Operations Bob Alderman to promote me to this position, he refused because I had not gone through the management training program. When I asked about getting into the program, he told me that I would have to be willing to sell my house and move to Alaska. It seemed remarkable to me that the only way for me to obtain management training was to relocate to Alaska since there were many Sam's Clubs in California. I told him that I could not relocate to Alaska. Shortly thereafter, Mr. Alderman hired his neighbor, Michael Hasley to be the Marketing Manager. Mr. Hasley had no managerial experience and had not gone through the management training program. Mr. Hasley was hired to be my supervisor yet I was responsible for training him.

3. By 1995, I had trained 10 associates in my area and was responsible for supervising 24 employees. I consistently spoke with General Manager Lovina Kirkpatrick about moving into other positions such as claims in order to improve my opportunities for promotions. Ms. Kirkpatrick was unresponsive. That same year, Mr. Hasley (Alderman's neighbor) left the Marketing Manager position. I again asked Mr. Alderman about moving into this position or into management training. Mr. Alderman told me that the position had been filled. He had hired another neighbor, a male, Kirby Jessen who was trained as a Microbiologist. He also had no management experience and had not gone through the management training program. Once again, I had to train a man who was hired to be my supervisor. Mr. Jessen quit one year later because he was unable to handle the responsibilities.

4. I continued to inquire to Ms. Kirkpatrick and the new Director of Operations Phil Goodwin about opportunities to attend training classes in order to assist in my chances of getting promoted. Mr. Goodwin and Ms. Kirkpatrick told me that training classes were only available for managers.

5. Throughout my career with Sam's Club, I always received "Above Standard" or "Exceptional" ratings on my evaluations and I continually expressed my interest in career advancement and the MIT program in my evaluations.

6. By 2000, I had trained almost 20 managers in Marketing, all of whom were male, and many of whom never went through the management training program nor were never required to relocate. Some of the men I observed who got into management or the management training program without having to relocate were: Dan Dugger—started as a Meat Cutter in my store later than I did and is now a General Manager; Dennis Costa—promoted to Meat and Bakery Manager; Mike Medina—promoted to Bakery Manager; Ed Walker—promoted to General Manager; Rick Biegacki—promoted from Floor Team Leader to General Manager; Matt Johnson—promoted to Merchandise Manager; Larry Monroe—promoted from Team Leader to Merchandise Manager; Chad Hague—promoted from Floor Team Leader and is now Center Floor Manager. Even so, I continued to express an interest in advancing into management and was eager to learn all I could in order to increase my chances of promotion.

7. In 2000 while still Marketing Team Leader, I was out for six weeks getting knee surgery. While I was out, Ms. Kirkpatrick and Regional Sales Manager Theresa Hagensen called to tell me that they were combining marketing departments and getting rid of my position. I asked about becoming Manager of the department that was being created but they told me that the position had been given to a male, Larry Turner. I was told I could return only as a Cashier, Meat Wrapper, Cart Runner or Telemarketer. I chose Meat Wrapper. Later that year, I was out sick for a few days due to a cold. When I returned, Meat Manager Jim Ross and Ms. Kirkpatrick informed me they had hired a young male, Rusty Ocheltree, to replace me as Meat Wrapper and that they were moving me to the Membership Desk. I discovered that my supervisor at the Membership Desk was someone whom I had previously supervised for six years. I was extremely frustrated at the way I had been treated at Sam's Club, particular regarding career advancement. In September 2000, I left Sam's Club and noted in my Exit Interview that it was due to a lack of promotional opportunities.

8. In May 2001, Ms. Kirkpatrick contacted me and asked me to return to Sam's Club to sell credit at the Membership Desk. I specifically inquired about opportunities for future advancement, making it clear that this was a condition for my return. She assured me that, with my experience, I would definitely be given opportunities for promotion. I returned in June 2001 to sell credit.

9. In early 2002, I applied for a position for Photo Manager. I did not receive an interview and a male, Brett [last name unknown], who had no management experience and who had only been with Sam's Club for six months as a Cashier, got the position. A few months later, Brett left and the position came open again. The position was not posted. I spoke with Assistant Manager over the Photo Department Michael Hasley (Director of Operations Bob Alderman's neighbor who had originally been hired as Marketing Manager and who had since been promoted) about this position and he told me I was qualified and he offered me the position. About one month later, a male [name unknown], who transferred from another Sam's Club, was given the position. I spoke with Mr. Hasley about why I didn't get the position and he told me it was up to the General Manager. I spoke with Ms. Kirkpatrick and she just told me that the position had been filled.

10. I spoke with Director of Operations Phil Goodwin again about my desire to move into management and the fact that I had spent nine years working at Sam's Club with little advancement. All of my evaluations (including those before I left in 2000 and after my return in 2001) were excellent. I had also never received any coachings. Mr. Goodwin then asked me if I could stack 50-pound bags of dog food. When I told him I could not repeatedly lift 50 pounds, he told me there was nothing he could do for me because, before I could become a manager, I would have to be Floor Team Leader and that requires stacking 50-pound bags of dog food. I know of several males, including Mr. Hasley and Mr. Jensen who never had to become Floor Team Leader and stack 50-pound bags of dog food before going into management. I had also never seen any written job description with this lifting requirement nor do I believe that one exists. I believe that this was an excuse for keeping me from advancing.

11. In April 2002, after repeated attempts to move up at Sam's Club, I again spoke with Ms. Kirkpatrick about career advancement. In that conversation, she conceded that it was unlikely that I was going to advance in my career at Sam's Club. I tried to speak with her again a month later but she stated she was too busy. I left Sam's Club in August 2002 and made it clear that I was leaving Sam's Club due to a lack of promotional opportunities. Attached hereto as Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of my Exit Interview dated August 28, 2002.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of California that the foregoing is true and correct.

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, EDITH ARANA, DEBORAH GUNTER, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, CLEO PAGE, KAREN WILLIAMSON, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiffs, v. WAL-MART STORES, INC. Defendant.	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF KARLA ROJAS IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Karla Rojas, declare:

1. I am a 41 year old female living in Dallas, Texas. I worked at numerous Wal-Mart stores in Texas as well as in Wal-Mart's Home Office in Bentonville, Arkansas, from June 11, 1983, until March 1, 2000. Although I was one of the few women to make it into Wal-Mart management, I was a victim of Wal-Mart's gender discrimination in the work assignments I received and the company's failure to promote me and adequately train me.

2. I started my Wal-Mart career in the Management Training Program in the Longview, Texas, store. When I first met Bob Madden, the Longview, Texas, Store Manager, he said: "I don't like college graduates, and I don't like female managers." Considering I had just graduated in May, 1983, from the University of Arkansas (Fayetteville) with a BSBA in Marketing and was reporting to him to commence the Management Training Program, my introduction to the Wal-Mart "family" was extremely hostile.

3. Although the Management Training Program was designed to last several months, I was pulled from the program after only one month by an order from the Home Office so that I could assume the responsibilities of the "Manager in Charge of Hardlines" at the Longview, Texas, store. I was never promoted to Assistant Manager during my time in this position and never received a pay increase above the hourly wage I was supposed to receive during the "training" period.

4. When I completed my unofficial "Manager in Charge of Hardlines" position at the Longview, Texas, store in February, 1984, Wal-Mart assigned me to an Assistant Manager position at the Henderson, Texas, store. Because I had received only one month of the training typically provided to Assistant Managers, I made a request to both Jerry Wade, the Store Manager, and Frank Boren, the District Manager, that I be provided more training so that I could perform all of my job duties. Mr. Wade and Mr. Boren denied my request and commented that training would not help me because I was "incompetent."

5. After I had been working for a while as an Assistant Manager at the Henderson, Texas, store, Mr. Boren called me into his office for a meeting. Mr. Boren suggested that I resign from my position and find a husband to settle down with and have children to relieve my "work-related stress." I was shocked and upset to hear this from my District Manager and immediately wrote a letter to Harry Green, Regional

Vice-President, wherein I recited Mr. Boren's remarks. Mr. Green called me on the telephone within a few days and told me not to worry because I would not lose my job and that Mr. Boren would apologize to me for his remarks. Although I did not lose my job, I never received an apology from Mr. Boren.

6. After working as an Assistant Manager at the Henderson, Texas, store in 1984 and 1985, I was assigned to work in Assistant Manager positions at the Canton, Texas, and Marshall, Texas, stores in 1985 and 1986, respectively. In 1986, I moved to Bentonville, Arkansas, and worked at the Home Office for three years. During my time at the Home Office, I held positions of Fashion Distributor and Associate Buyer. In the three years I worked at the Home Office, I only observed two females in supervisory positions.

7. In 1989, I relocated to the Duncanville, Texas, store as an Assistant Manager, where I worked for two years. After I had worked at the Duncanville, Texas, store for about a year, the Store Manager, Larry Statton, took medical leave, which opened up a vacancy for the Store Manager position. At the time, I was the lead Assistant Manager and had expressed to Mr. Statton my desire to be placed into the Store Manager position. Ed Nagy, the District Manager, and Mr. Statton, however, decided to place David Bickell, a male Assistant Manager, into the Store Manager position. Mr. Bickell had three or four months experience at the Duncanville store – compared to my year of experience at the store – and had less Wal-Mart and managerial experience than me.

8. I had repeatedly made it known to all of my Wal-Mart District Managers that I wanted to become a Store Manager. Mr. Nagy, the District Manager, told me that in order to become a Store Manager, I had to first work as an Operations Assistant Manager. Believing that this was the track I needed to follow to become a Store Manager, I agreed to be assigned to an Operations Assistant Manager position. After Mr. Nagy was replaced by Brent Allen as District Manager, Mr. Allen informed me that Wal-Mart was eliminating the Operations Assistant Manager Program, and that if I wanted to become a Store Manager, I needed to first work as a Co-Manager.

9. I continued to be denied a promotion to a Store Manager position from Wal-Mart. In 1991 at the Duncanville store, I was next in line for a promotion to a Co-Manager position when Wal-Mart eliminated the Co-Manager position at the store. I then took an Operations Assistant Manager position at the Allen, Texas, store, but in 1992, Mr. Allen, the District Manager, told me that my Operations Assistant Manager position was being eliminated and that I would be required to accept an Assistant Manager position at the Garland, Texas, store. I took the Assistant Manager position in Garland, and while there, was told by Mr. Allen that I would have to relocate if I wanted my name to be placed on the "Promotable List," which he told me was a prerequisite to becoming a Store Manager. I complained to the Regional Vice-President about this relocation requirement, and was finally placed on the "Promotable List." I understood that the Home Office maintained this "Promotable List," which was a list of Wal-Mart employees that were deemed by Store Managers, District Managers or Regional Managers to be worthy of promotion to management positions at the level of Store Manager or higher.

10. In 1995, Wal-Mart assigned me to be a Store Manager in The Colony, Texas, store. When I arrived as Store Manager in The Colony store, I found that the store was in terrible shape and employee morale was very poor. For example, the store was dirty and signs were outdated, the stock room was too full and unorganized, store record-keeping was shoddy and had been manipulated in the past, the personnel office was dysfunctional and previous store management had not followed Wal-Mart policies and rules. In an effort to improve conditions at this store, I requested from Dale Neighbors, the District Manager, more employees, storage space and funds to pay overtime wages. My requests were denied, and when the store conditions did not improve, Wal-Mart unfairly placed me on probation. After six months in the job, I could tell that it was a no-win situation for me, and I asked to step down from the Store Manager position. Wal-Mart accepted my request, but kept me on as the Store Manager for another nine weeks before replacing me with Lincoln Williams, a male. After I left The Colony store, Wal-Mart authorized the new male Store Manager to pay overtime wages to improve the conditions at the store.

11. My next assignment, in 1995, was as an Assistant Manager in the Lancaster, Texas, store. At one point during my two years at the Lancaster store, David McKenzie, the Store Manager, and Janet Hatfield, the District Manager, asked me to perform the role of Acting Store Manager at the Irving, Texas, store in approximately May, 1997. I accepted this assignment and managed the Irving, Texas, store very well by improving employee morale, cleaning out receiving overstock and improving overall store standards. On numerous occasions, I expressed my desire to be promoted into the permanent Store Manager position at the Irving, Texas, store to Janet Hatfield, the District Manager. Wal-Mart denied my promotion request and placed a male into the permanent Store Manager position at the Irving store. My belief is that Wal-Mart did not want a female Store Manager at the Irving store because the store received frequent visits from Wal-Mart executives and vendors and was thus considered a high profile store.

12. Later in 1997, either Gary Loafman or Janet Hatfield, the incoming and outgoing District Managers, respectively, told me that Wal-Mart had reinstated the position of Co-Manager and that I would have to serve in this position before I could become a full-time Store Manager. Because of what I was told regarding Wal-Mart Store Manager promotion policies, I returned to the Duncanville, Texas, store and accepted an assignment as Co-Manager with the goal of eventually becoming a full-time Store Manager.

13. Wal-Mart, however, made an exception to its alleged "policies" when it promoted Charles Thomas to a Store Manager position at the Balch Springs, Texas, store in 1997. I knew Mr. Thomas from my time at the Lancaster, Texas, store, when we were both Assistant Managers. At the Lancaster store, Mr. Thomas was lower on the Assistant Manager hierarchy scale than me. Wal-Mart promoted Mr. Thomas directly from an Assistant Manager position into a Co-Manager position, then into a Store Manager position, without requiring him to serve as an Operations Assistant Manager. Moreover, Mr. Thomas held these three positions at the same store in Balch Springs, Texas. After observing Mr. Thomas' promotion to Store Manager. I concluded that Wal-Mart applied their Store Manager promotion "policies" differentially in order to exclude me from Store Manager positions because I am a woman.

14. On nearly all of my Performance Appraisals I received a performance rating of at least four out of five, indicating that I "Exceeded Expectations." Two exceptions to this were the Performance Appraisals I received on September 12, 1995, and March 2, 1998. The 1995 Performance Appraisal referred to my time in The Colony store as Store Manager when I was set up to fail. In fact, my District Manager stated in the "Comment" section of the appraisal: "I myself accept responsibility" for the poor performance of the store. See Annual Performance Appraisal dated September 12, 1995, a true and correct copy of which is attached hereto as Exhibit A. The 1998 Performance Appraisal was the last appraisal I received from Wal-Mart before I resigned. I received a "Below Expectations" on the 1998 Performance Appraisal, and in the "Comment" section I wrote the following objection to the very unfair rating: "I believe I have been set up to fail because my concerns are not being addressed and because there has been a conflict over what my responsibilities are. I feel like the Open Door Policy has failed me." (Emphasis in original) See Annual Performance Appraisal dated March 2, 1998, a true and correct copy of which is attached hereto as Exhibit B.

15. I consistently and repeatedly made it known to Wal-Mart that I desired to be promoted into high-level management positions. In the "Comments" or "goals" sections of my Performance Appraisals, I almost always stated that I wanted to be promoted into the next level of management, including Co-Manager, Store Manager and District Manager positions. See Comment pages of Annual Performance Appraisals dated December 20, 1984, September 8, 1989, March 22, 1990, August 9, 1990, March 8, 1991, August 15, 1991, April 8, 1992, October 18, 1992, January 28, 1993, September 15, 1993, February 15, 1995 and February 1, 1997, true and correct copies of which are attached hereto collectively as Exhibit C. On at least two occasions, my District Manager or Director of Operations commented on my Performance Appraisals that I was capable or ready to manage my own store. See Exhibit C, Comment pages of Annual Performance Appraisals dated August 9, 1990 and February 15, 1995.

16. In approximately January, 1999, I took a medical leave of absence. Due to the debilitating nature of my medical condition, I did not return to work at Wal-Mart and was terminated in March, 2000, in accordance with Wal-Mart's policy that the time limit for employee medical leave was one year.

17. I would consider returning to work for Wal-Mart if I were assured that I would be provided fair opportunities for advancement and a non-discriminatory working environment.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Texas that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 8, 2003, at Dallas, Texas.

I, Kathleen Schmeida, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I am female. I worked at three Wal-Mart stores in Ohio from 1998 through 2001. In all three stores, I noticed that the policies and practices regarding hiring, training, and discipline were the same.

3. I began working at Wal-Mart in Macedonia, Ohio, on May 23, 1998 as an Assistant Manager. Throughout my time at the Macedonia store, I told my Store Manager, Rodney Bowden, that I was interested in learning how to make myself promotable because my goal was to become a Store Manager. In response to my question, Store Manager Bowden told me that in order to advance I would have to relocate to another state. He also told me that any additional information on training for advancing within the Company was "available on a need-to-know basis" and that I did not need to know.

4. In June of 1999, District Manager Paul Beno transferred me to the Streetsboro, Ohio Wal-Mart. While at the Streetsboro store I continued expressing my interest in advancing within the Company, and even wrote my goal of becoming Store or Co-Manager on my annual performance evaluation. A true and correct copy is attached hereto as Exhibit A. I spoke with Store Manager Franklin Cottrill about my goals but never received the additional training I needed in order to be considered for Co-Manager and Store Manager positions. It was common, however, for Store Manager Cottrill to provide on-the-job mentoring and computer training to male Assistant Managers such as Glenn Fry and Jim (last name unknown). I was not given the opportunity to participate in these informal mentoring sessions.

5. In May 2000, District Manager Paul Beno transferred me again to the Wal-Mart in Stow, Ohio. I requested additional training and information about being promoted to Store Manager from my Store Manager Scott Bernard but he never followed up with me.

6. In May 2001, I terminated my employment with Wal-Mart because I was dissatisfied with promotion opportunities.

I declare under the penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Ohio that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on the 2 of April, 2003, in Ohio.

I, Ramona Scott, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I was employed by Wal-Mart, Inc. from October 1990 until September 1998. I am female. Throughout my tenure at Wal-Mart, I was never disciplined or coached, and I received good evaluations.

3. I was hired by Wal-Mart as a Customer Service Manager (CSM) for a new store that was opening in St. Petersburg, Florida. I already had experience as a manager at a supermarket and video store, so I accepted the CSM position. As CSM, my duties included supervising cashiers, among other things. When the store opened, I immediately became aware of departmental gender segregation. All the cashiers were women, while the electronics and sporting goods departments were predominantly staffed by men. Additionally, I realized that men were primarily in charge of the store; there was only one woman among the five Managers.

4. In July 1991, I received a promotion to Personnel Manager. I did not apply for this position, I was asked to take it. As Personnel Manager, I was responsible for hiring procedures, new employee orientation, distributing payroll, keying evaluations and merit raises, and ensuring compliance with Occupation Safety and Health regulations, and more. The actual paychecks came bi-weekly from Home Office in Bentonville, Arkansas.

5. On or about October 1991, I was transferred to a Wal-Mart in Pinellas Park, Florida, after I used the Open Door to complain about my Store Manager. I asked to stay at the St. Petersburg store, but the District Manager, David Bonar, said that it was better for me to move.

6. The departments at the Pinellas Park store were also largely segregated by gender. Most cashiers were women and men worked in electronics, sporting goods, and the garden center. The Store Manager was male, as were two of the four Assistant Managers.

7. In my capacity as Personnel Manager at the Pinellas Park store, I had access to payroll records. I noticed that generally men made more than women, and that men were able to get most of the overtime that was available.

8. Sometime in 1993, I sought approval for a merit raise for a female cashier, but the Store Manager, Gary Currens, denied my request. I responded that men were making more than women and asked why that was the case. Mr. Currens replied: "Men are here to make a career and women aren't. Retail is for housewives who just need to earn extra money." Some time in 1995 or 1996, I asked the male Assistant Manager for electronics, Anton Modrich, why he was giving one of his male employees a merit raise because I didn't think the employee had earned it; Mr. Modrich responded, "He has a family to support." I pointed out that I too had a family to support -- I was a single mother -- but he just walked away. I did not receive a raise.

9. As Personnel Manager, I was also involved in hiring hourly associates. Sometime in 1995 or 1996, Store Manager Currens directed me to hire a custodian to clean the employee lounge and store restrooms. He specifically told me that I had to hire a woman. Thereafter, whenever the custodial position opened up, he would reiterate that we needed to hire a woman for that position.

10. In about 1995 or 1996, I spoke with the District Manager, David Bonar, about getting into the Assistant Manager Training Program. Mr. Bonar said there were no openings. I knew of no posting or application process for the training program; to my knowledge, asking the District Manager was the only way to become an Assistant Manager. Mr. Bonar gave me no other assistance or guidance as to how to get into the program, how to find out when openings occurred, or whether there were in fact openings available.

11. Sometime in 1997, Nick Batista transferred from the Largo store to become the new Store Manager of the Pinellas Park store. When Mr. Batista saw my pay rate, he laughed and told me that the male Personnel Manager of the Largo store made "a lot more" than I did. He did not give me a raise after that.

12. In about 1997, I spoke with the Mr. Batista about getting into the Assistant Manager Training Program. Mr. Batista told me he had other plans for me, but never said what those plans were. Shortly after that, he told me that in order to get along with him, I needed to behave like his wife. From his description of his wife, I understood Mr. Batista to mean that he wanted me to wait on him and fix him his coffee. In fact, when the District Manager visited, Mr. Batista would tell me to go get them coffee. After this second instance of being rejected for admission into the Assistant Manager training program, I decided to give up on further promotion.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Florida that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 1st, 2003, at St. Petersburg Fl.

DECLARATION OF DAWNIA SELF IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Dawnia Self, declare:

1. I am a 33 year old female living in Madill, Oklahoma. I worked at Wal-Mart's Fort Collins, Colorado store for approximately two years, starting on April 22, 1998. I then transferred to the Wal-Mart store in Durant, Oklahoma for approximately nine months. After working at the Durant, Oklahoma store, I transferred once again to Wal-Mart's store in Madill, Oklahoma for seven months before moving to Sanger, Texas and working at a Wal-Mart distribution center until October, 2002.

2. During my employment at Wal-Mart, I encountered discrimination based upon my gender with regard to my compensation and work assignments.

3. When I worked as a Softlines Sales Floor Associate at the Fort Collins, Colorado store, I made requests for merit raises on numerous occasions to Ed Holt, the Store Manager, David Headrick, my immediate supervisor, and Jack Gunn, another Manager. My requests were always denied.

4. I know that other male employees at the Fort Collins store in 1998 and 1999 received merit raises and/or made an hourly wage that was higher than mine even though their experience and jobs at Wal-Mart were comparable to mine. Included among these men was John Brailsford, who worked in the Electronics Department. Mr. Brailsford told me what his hourly wage was.

5. I also know that other males who had experience comparable with mine made a higher wage than me for doing similar work when I worked at the Durant, Oklahoma store in the second half of 2000 and the first half of 2001. I am aware, for example, that John Branch was hired into a Day Receiving job at a very high hourly rate that exceeded my hourly wages.

6. During my employment at the Durant, Oklahoma store, I had to ask Mike Snell, the Assistant Manager, and Buddy Sherryl, the District Manager, repeatedly for a differential pay increase when I switched jobs from Cashier to Night Receiving. My husband, who also worked for Wal-Mart at the same store, received a differential pay increase when he switched jobs to Night Receiving, even though he did not have to ask for it. Wal-Mart eventually approved my differential pay request, but I should not have had to even ask for it, as it was Wal-Mart policy that Night Receiving positions received differential pay increases.

7. After working in the Night Receiving position, I moved into a Department Manager position in the Shoe Department. Mr. Snell, the Assistant Manager, gave the order that I would not be able to keep the pay differential I had in the previous Night Receiving position, even though my husband was able to automatically, without asking, keep his pay differential when he moved into Department Manager and Support Manager positions from Night Receiving. I spoke at length to both Mr. Snell and Brenda Logan, the District Manager, about my desire to keep the differential. My request was finally approved, but I was never compensated for the pay differential I was entitled to receive in the Shoe Department Manager position for the first few weeks of the job.

8. I transferred to the Madill, Oklahoma store in the fall of 2001 to be closer to where my ailing father lived. Males at the Madill store who had experience comparable with mine made a higher wage than me for doing similar work. One such person was Larry Bums, who had an Unloader position.

9. During my time at the Madill store, I had discussions with Tim Owen, the Store Manager, regarding my desire for merit raises, more hours per week, to be placed on full-time status and to be placed in the Management Training Program. Mr. Owen only laughed at me in response to my requests. I also met with Bill White, District Manager, to discuss being placed in the Management Training Program, but he ignored my request. In the "Associates Comments" section of my Annual Performance Appraisal in February, 2002, I asked to be promoted to a management position. See Annual Performance Appraisal dated 2/11/02 and identified as WMHO 1042861, a true and correct copy of which is attached hereto as Exhibit 1. No one in management, however, responded to my requests.

10. When I moved to the Sanger, Texas store in approximately May, 2002, Wal-Mart assigned me to a Break Pack position. During my orientation at the Sanger, Texas store, out of the 18 people in orientation, there were only three women present. Greg Carpenter, a Maintenance Manager, attended one of my initial orientation sessions, and pointed around the room at each employee making comments about the positions to which he thought each employee would be assigned. When he pointed at me and the two other women, he said that he "knew where we were going," implying that the only job we were capable of doing was Break Pack. The following day, Jose Perez, orientation leader, was discussing company policies and stated that anyone who stereotyped people at Wal-Mart would be fired. After Mr. Perez said this, I told Mr. Perez about the stereotype Mr. Carpenter had used during our orientation. Mr. Perez told me that he would handle the situation. Mr. Carpenter was neither disciplined nor fired, but shortly thereafter received a promotion.

11. When my father died in August, 2002, I took a leave of absence. My husband automatically received bereavement pay without requesting it. I, however, had to request bereavement pay for my own father's death. At first, Wal-Mart refused to give me the bereavement pay, but only after I insisted, they finally agreed to give it to me.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Oklahoma that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 11, 2003, at Kingston, Oklahoma.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, EDITH ARANA, DEBORAH GUNTER, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, CLEO PAGE, KAREN WILLIAMSON, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiffs vs. WAL-MART STORES, INC., Defendant	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF SUSAN SERVATIUS IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Susan Servatius, declare:

1. I have personal knowledge of the facts contained in this declaration and, if called as a witness, am competent to testify to those facts.

2. I was employed by Wal-Mart Stores from January 14, 1991 until I resigned on March 7, 2001. I started as a management trainee and rose to the level of District Manager. I was one of only a handful of female district managers at the time that I left, a few months before this lawsuit was filed. During my ten years with Wal-Mart, I observed that the small group of women who actually reached the position of store manager were frequently given the smallest and most troubled stores in the Wal-Mart system. As a result, women had a much harder time succeeding because the financial performance of store managers is based exclusively on the financial performance of their stores. My supervisors repeatedly told me that high volume and profitability were necessary for promotion.

3. I graduated from Fresno State with a B.A. in English and was recruited by Wal-Mart into the management training program. I started in January 1991 and was placed for training in a store in El Centro, California. Among Wal-Mart management, this was considered a very undesirable assignment because the store is in a poor community on the border with very few local amenities. It is Wal-Mart practice not to place a trainee as an assistant manager in the same store in which they trained. In discussion with assistant managers and with my store manager, I discovered that the company could not get anyone to transfer in to replace the assistants who arrived "temporarily" to open the market. I was placed in the El Centro store and stayed there eighteen months.

4. One of the male assistant managers in El Centro, Steve Markey, took an extended leave of absence and I assumed his responsibilities, in addition to my own and with no pay adjustments. I discovered that his areas were not functioning well and I put in place a number of steps to train his direct reports and improve overall functioning. When Steve Markey returned from his leave of absence, he was promoted to co-manager a few months later.

5. The store manager in El Centro was Norm Banwarth. He was only in his 20s but he was married to the Chief Financial Officer Paul Carter's niece. Banwarth had advanced from sales associate to store manager in only three years. He was made a store manager at the age of 25.

6. Over a 12-month period, the store had three district managers, Ron Smoot, Rick Klein, and Larry Thompkins. Larry Thompkins, rarely came to our store because it was a long drive from his home store. On one of his rare visits to the store, six months or more after I started, I asked him whether I could transfer to a store in San Diego. He told me that there were no openings there and that I "needed more experience." I attended a company meeting shortly thereafter and met an assistant manager [name unknown] who complained to me that he had been transferred involuntarily to an assistant manager slot in San Diego. It was clear to me that Mr. Thompkins has lied to me about the availability of openings. Because there was no system for posting assistant manager openings, I had no access to information about what assistant manager positions were or might be coming available. Instead, I had to rely on Mr. Thompkins for such information; and found him to be dishonest in his communications.

7. I continued over the next year to request a transfer out of El Centro. When I heard nothing from my district manager, I decided to use the Open Door policy. I had to ask Store Manager Norm Banwarth about how to use the policy after which he gave me the direct contact of a Regional Personal Manager. I subsequently talked to the Regional Personnel Manager, Greg Samuelson. He was willing to move me to New York but told me that if it did not work out, I would be obliged to reimburse the company for my relocation costs (approximately $3,000). While I saw this requirement as unfair, I agreed. I am not aware of any other Assistant Manager who was told he or she would have to reimburse relocation costs and, indeed, when I reached higher management, I found that the company had no such policy.

8. In August 1992, I transferred as an Assistant Manager to the Watertown, New York, a store near the Canadian border. The company was having trouble getting people for New York stores at that time. It was a new store and did not yet have a Store Manager.

9. Another female Assistant Manager, Tracy Schankle, moved from a Pennsylvania store to take the position of Co-Manager in Watertown, which she had been promised. Tracy was quite open in her communications regarding this situation and, as professional colleagues, we shared communications about our careers. When Ms. Schankle arrived, there was already a male Co-Manager in the store and she was placed as an Assistant Manager. I worked with two other male Assistant Managers, Dan Alcard and Dennis [last name unknown], both of whom made more money than I did

10. Eventually, Lance Delarossa, was assigned as the Store Manager. The District Manager was Mike Holigan. Mr. Holigan could not remember my name and frequently referred to me as "Tracy" (the other female assistant manager in the store) or "girl." I remember clearly that, on one occasion, I was so annoyed with being called "girl" that I asked Mr Holigan "what am I, Lassie?"

11. I went to District Manager Holigan and told him that I felt I was underpaid. He did increase my pay by $3,000-4,000. However, Mr. Holigan did not tell the store manager that he had given me a raise. When he find out, Store Manager Delarossa asked me "how the hell did that happen?"

12. I received an "exceeded expectations" rating for my evaluation in November 1992. In the section concerning career goals, I wrote that I wanted to be a store manager and "[eventually, within 3 years, I believe I will be capable of running a 90,000 or larger store. I hope to contribute to the company as a store manager." I was well aware of the practice of pigeonholing women managers into small square footage stores with low bonus potential and had not yet seen a female store manager running a high volume store. Attached hereto as Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of my November 1992 evaluation.

13. The other female assistant manager, Tracy Schankle, was offered a store manager position over Hooeksett Wal-Mart, the worst store in New Hampshire. Ms. Schankle was told about the problems in the store after she accepted the position. I drove with her to tour the store and its problems were apparent to both of us. Later, when I worked in the market, it was a store that was the butt of numerous jokes at our district meetings.

14. In May 1993, I was transferred to the Vestal, New York Wal-Mart as the Assistant Manager for Operations. This store also had problems – it had high shrink and a weak Store Manager, Jim Peck. On one occasion, Regional Vice President Jim Dowdy visited the store and inappropriately yelled at myself and the rest of the management staff in front of customers and hourly associates. The female Co-Manager, Shannon Craig, used the open door policy with then CEO Don Soderquist to complain about Dowdy's visit. Jim Dowdy returned with Divisional Vice President Larry Williams and gave the store an acceptable rating, although months later I learned from the district manager that Jim Dowdy brought his supervisor to "prevent him from strangling her (Shannon)." Sometime after that, Shannon Craig was promoted to a small store in upstate New York, although she had already been promised a bigger and better store. Her experience made me very wary of using the Open Door.

15. In September 1993, I again received an "exceeded expectations" rating on my evaluation. I noted that my career goals were "within 1 year a co-manager in a 116,000 [sq. ft.]or higher so I'd be able to run within 2 years a 120,000 [sq. ft. store] as a Store Manager." Attached here as Exhibit B is a true and correct copy of the September 1993 evaluation. I was very specific about the size of the store because I had seen two other women managers, Tracy Schankle and Shannon Craig, sent to small or problem stores, where their careers effectively dead-ended.

16. In January 1994, I was promoted to Co-Manager for a store in Concord, New Hampshire, another problem store. I was told by the district manager that I would need to "light a fire" under the Store Manager David Dorfner. When I arrived, Dorfner was not welcoming and, in fact, did not at first give me a store tour or keys. Within a few months, I discovered that Dorfner was padding the inventory and violating payroll requirements. I reported this to the district manager, Joe Woods. Rather than terminating him, Woods sent Store Manager Dorfner to a Dale Carnegie course for "re-training."

17. The district supervised by Joe Woods included the small store that Tracy Schankle was running. When I addressed concerns over my ability to work with Mr. Dorfner, Woods often ridiculed Ms.

Schankle's performance to me and claimed she was a "snake" who could not be trusted Woods held a regular poker game for the managers and co-managers in his district Tracy Shankle and I were not invited to these games.

18. Because I had reported Mr. Dorfner's misconduct, I asked District Manager Woods to move me out of David Dorfner's store. He offered me a store manager position in the most remote part of Maine. I declined the move because I knew that that store could never be profitable and my career would go nowhere. I also reminded Mr. Woods that by performing as a co-manager I had fulfilled the prerequisite for receiving a 120,000 square foot store. I recognized at the time that it was very risky to turn down a promotion but I knew that, to fully develop equally with my male colleagues, I needed an equal challenge.

19. I was promoted to store manager over the Utica, New York store in December 1994. I received above standard visits from Bill Fields, then CEO, Lee Scott, then President of Merchandising, Mark Schwartz, the president of Super Centers, and my then-Divisional Vice President Larry Williams. I received an "exceeded expectations" review in October 1995. In February 1996, I was promoted to store manager for the Hudson, New York store. Tom Coughlin visited the store; and it was the Divisional Store of the Year for 1998. I also received the Samuel M. Walton leadership award for my work in this location. In March 1998, I received an "exceeded expectations" rating on my evaluation from my district manager, Dexter Hammer.

20. In our region, there was only one female district manager, Jerrie Awtry. I was aware that she left the company after raising an open door complaint with Tom Coughlin. At the Year End meeting in either 1996 or 1997, diversity was discussed and the need to promote women. My then District Manager knew that I took offense to discussions that indicated that a quota system was the only reason that I was running the highest volume and profit store in the region at that time.

21. In September 1998, I was promoted to the position of District Manager. I was given a very poor district with three out of the five stores posting high losses and two stores decreasing. The district was a "bottom feeder" district (lowest in the region). The district went from bad to worse when the previous district manager stripped the stores of five assistants managers and left them short staffed, over inventory, and dirty. I expressed concern to my Regional Vice President, Greg Samuelson, but he laughed at me. I was determined to succeed and I set out to turn the district around. I lowered turnover, improved associate satisfaction or "UPI" indicators, reduced losses, improved profits over 100%, and ran for 18 months the highest increasing market in the company. I received accolades from my peers and my supervisor, Mike Huffaker, for my work.

22. As a Wal-Mart district manager, my chief responsibility was to ensure that each store in my district operated according to all company policies. The Bentonville headquarters has systems in place to closely monitor the sales performance and personnel in each store. I received, on a daily and weekly basis, a wide range of reports about each of my stores' performance on a variety of measures. Based on these reports, I would focus my activities on the store or stores that were not meeting company standards. Within the company, this was known as "management by exception." The oft-repeated goal was to have as little variation as possible with respect to how the stores would administer company policies and practices.

23. My district suffered an enormous blow when Wal-Mart purchased a retail chain known as Caldor's, which had a number of stores in my district. These locations were not given to me but instead managed through a special Regional Manager and his own district manager. These stores needed to be converted to Wal-Mart stores. Rather than incorporating the former Caldor's stores into existing districts, they were set up as a separate district, which overlapped geographically with my own. Lance Richards was put in charge of the district. Richards had previously been caught for fraternization/sexual harassment, terminated for 90 days and then rehired. Richards bragged openly about his indiscretions and the company's lack of response to them. I also learned from Mike Huffaker, Divisional Vice President, that Richards' irresponsible behavior caused the company to be sued for discrimination.

24. Richards immediately recruited 75 of the best managers and employees out of my stores, without any input or consultation with me. He was allowed to identify the individuals and offer them a 5% pay increase or more, even though the employees would be doing less work as the Caldor's stores were quite small in footage and volume. When I contacted the Regional Vice President Castural Thompson to discuss the issue, he told me to "shut up or you'll get yourself fired. Tom Coughlin is very big on this project." I then telephoned the Divisional Vice President, Mike Huffaker, to discuss the issue. Mr. Huffaker told me that I did not understand the big picture, that I needed to support the "agenda," and that the company was well aware of the financial impact and toll this would take on myself and my managers.

25. In October 1999, my father was scheduled to have life threatening surgery in New York. I followed all procedures necessary to obtain a few days of family medical leave through the Regional Personnel Manager Marie Hoag. I also arranged for another district manager to watch my district. While I was gone, Regional Vice President Thompson apparently claimed not to know where I was and directed the regional staff to call around and locate me in New York. He also ordered the district manager who was watching my district to stop doing so. When I returned from the leave, Mr. Thompson harangued me for not being available 24 hours a day, seven days a week and that he did not know where I was.

26. Regional Vice President Thompson scheduled annual deep sea fishing trips for the district managers in the region as a "team building" exercise. There was only myself and one other woman present. We were required to attend but we had to pay for the event ourselves. I attended the first two years but had little contact with Mr. Thompson who generally arranged for his friends to be in his boat. I was aware that the male district managers would "talk shop" but I was not generally included in these discussions. While I would have enjoyed an informal retreat with other district managers, this event seemed more like a "male-bonding" weekend and very little like a corporate retreat.

27. On a number of occasions, Mr. Thompson scheduled regional meetings in Atlantic City. The meeting schedule left a half-day for gambling and drinking. We would have dinner as a group, and then Thompson would disappear with some of the other men. At other times, he scheduled regional meetings to coincide with major sporting events that would be taking place in the location of the meeting. (e.g. Pittsburgh Steelers and Patriots football games). I was aware that Mr. Thompson would attend these events with some of the male district managers after the meeting was completed. I was not invited or otherwise included in these after meeting activities. One such time, he spent the day touring with me and spent the evening in New York City with a male District Manager. The next day, he would continue to tour my market.

28. I was required to conduct a quarterly anti-union training for my store managers. Over four times, I scheduled the required union training for my store managers only to have Regional Vice President Thompson set up a regional meeting at the same time, so I would have to cancel it. I informed the labor team in Bentonville and others that I had not conducted the labor meeting for my store managers. A year later, Thompson accused me of lying about the fact that I had conducted the meetings and told me that I needed to be coached. I went to Divisional Vice President Huffaker about this incident. His response to me was that it sounded like he [Thompson] "just doesn't like white women." After a long discussion with Mr. Huffaker regarding Mr. Thompson's continual and constant harassment, Mr Huffaker assured me that it was confidential and that there would be no retaliation. One hour later, Mr. Thompson issued me a written warning, which I refused to sign, as it indicated I had purposely altered company information in order to lie to him.

29. I recall another example of the lack of support that I received as a district manager. I had an assistant manager whom I thought was not right for the store she was in. I wanted to move her to a smaller volume store to fill in gaps in her training. I called to check with Mr. Thompson about the proposed move. He refused to tell me whether or not it should be done – instead, he said "do what you think is best." Once I did it, however, Mr. Thompson became furious with me and told me that I did not have authority to make the decision. The woman filed a lawsuit against the company but I believe that it was ultimately dismissed.

30. The continuing problems that I had with Mr. Thompson prompted me to contact Divisional Vice President Mike Huffaker in the summer 2000. I recounted to him a number of the incidents and problems described above. I also told him that I did not feel that RVP Thompson was supporting me but, in fact, that his behavior had reached the point of harassment. Mr. Huffaker apparently immediately contacted Mr. Thompson about my complaints because, shortly thereafter, I received a phone call from Mr. Thompson thanking me for using the open door.

31. In August 2000, I received the Best District Manager of the Year award in my region.

32. At around this time, Divisional Vice President Huffaker started pushing me to transfer to New Hampshire. He told me that my current district was not a sufficient challenge and I needed more. He felt that, as a single woman, I should not plan to purchase a house in this new market because he indicated this district would lead to yet another promotion. I suspected that he was trying to solve the problem with Regional Vice President Thompson, simply by removing me from his region.

33. I received a phone call from Charlyn Jarrells-Porter, a People Vice-President, who advised me that she was investigating the issues that I had raised about Thompson. I was told not to discuss the investigation with anyone else, which I did not. In September 2000, Ms. Jarrells-Porter telephoned again. I assumed that she was calling to advise me of the status of her investigation. Instead, she chastised me for discussing my problems with Mr. Thompson with other district managers in my area and for being insubordinate to him. After that phone call, I never heard from Ms. Porter again and she never informed me of the outcome of her investigation.

34. Two months went by and, in November 2000, [title] Tom Coughlin called to tell her that they were going to be changes. Soon after, Regional Vice President Thompson was taken out of his position as Regional Vice President.

35. At the same time that Mr. Thompson was removed, Divisional Vice President Mike Huffaker called and wanted to meet with me to "coach" me. I had no idea what I had done or would be coached for. In my nine years with Wal-Mart, that was only the second time that I had received a coaching. It was, moreover, only two to three months after receiving the District Manager of the Year Award and after Mr. Huffaker had encouraged me to move to a larger district since I needed a bigger challenge.

36. I met with Mr. Huffaker and he coached me for gossiping and for swearing. He claimed that he "didn't like some of the things I said or did" and that I needed to support the position, if not the man. He presented no examples of inappropriate statements.

He also claimed that he had conducted an investigation on my leadership and my support for the "Open Door Policy." I considered both of these criticisms (gossiping and swearing) to be extremely sexist. I was well aware of my male colleagues often gave direct and sometimes negative direction to their teams with no consequence. I was somehow expected to be nice and nurturing. I had never heard of any male manager or district manager being criticized for "gossiping." I was, moreover, aware of many other male managers who swore much more than I did. Clearly, Mr. Huffaker had a mindset about how women managers should act and that did not include swearing or showing aggressive, assertive behavior to direct managers.

37. Regional Vice President Frank Washburn replaced Mr. Thompson. Encouraged by colleagues to be open with him about what he would expect from me, he claimed that "he was giving me a fresh start." On the very first conference call with the district managers, Mr. Washburn started out by saying "OK, guys. . ." He then stopped himself and apologized to me, telling the group that he "had never supervised women before" and that he would have to get used to it. I was the only female district manager in the region at that time and felt that the comment was unnecessary. In the ensuing months, I had little help and much criticism from Mr. Washburn, who also seemed angry with me about Mr. Thompson's demotion. He refused to give me any autonomy to allow me to fix the problems caused by the Calder location acquisition, claiming that perhaps I did not know how to do my job. Although a few short months before I had been given the District Manager of the Year award, Mr. Washburn suggested that I was the worst District Manager he had. He also realigned my district giving my top two performing stores to my male colleague who later I learned received accolades for his district's financial performance.

38. In March 2001, I resigned my position with Wal-Mart. I became convinced that I would not receive fair treatment and support to succeed at Wal-Mart; and that I could no longer work within the company's double standards. Attached hereto as Exhibit C is a true and correct copy of my resignation letter. I discussed with Mr. Washburn how his business decisions made it impossible for my stores to survive the impact the Caldor's acquisitions had upon the districts financial performance; and that they would need additional resources which he refused to give me. Attached hereto as Exhibit D is a true and correct copy of the Exit Interview form from my personnel file, which I did not sign nor was discussed with me.

39. I recall attending district manager training in 1998 or 1999. The trainer distributed a handbook entitled "The Self-Interest in Diversity for Straight, White American-Born Male Managers (SWAMMs)" by Chuck Shelton. There was very little actual discussion or training about diversity and my impression was that they had passed up the handbook so that they could say that diversity had been covered.

40. On another occasion in 1998 after I was newly promoted to the District Manager position, I attended a meeting in Bentonville at which Wal-Mart's Chief Operating Officer Tom Coughlin was discussing the need for more women in management. He asked the managers present in the room to stand up and for the women to go to one side of the room and for men to go to the other. There were approximately 30 women and 290 men. I found it very embarrassing because everyone in the room was staring at our small contingent of women. While Mr. Coughlin decried the small number of women, it was not at all clear what steps would be taken to address the imbalance. Again the implication among our male colleagues was that our primary qualification for promotion was our gender and our ability to fulfill a company quota. More importantly, in my experience as a district manager, I received very hostile treatment by my Regional Vice President. The lack of support from higher management ultimately prompted me to leave the company.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the State of Connecticut that the foregoing is true and correct. Executed this 19th day of April, 2003 in Madison, Connecticut.

I, Jody Shearer, declare:

1. I am female and a former employee of Wal-Mart. I reside in Ohio.

2. I was hired at a Wal-Mart store in Wooster, Ohio on February 2, 2000. I had about two years of previous retail experience working for K-Mart and for JoAnn Fabrics.

3. I was assigned to a position as a Sales Associate in the Lawn and Garden Department. Shortly after I started working, I found out that two male Sales Associates in the Garden Center, who had both been hired after I was, were making a higher hourly wage than I was. I was hired at $6.50 per hour. Gregory Via was hired as a Sales Associate in about May 2000 at $6.75 per hour. Arthur Berry was hired as a Sales Associate in approximately June 2000 at $6.75 per hour. I know their wages because both Mr. Via and Mr. Berry told me what they earned.

4. I used the Open Door to complain about the differences in our wages to Assistant Manager Jerod Strong. Mr. Strong told me I must be mistaken and he also told me not to worry about the difference. I asked him for a pay raise at that time, which he denied. After Mr. Strong told me I must be mistaken about the pay difference, I asked Mr. Via and Mr. Berry again what they earned. They both confirmed that they earned $6.75 per hour. I know of no legitimate explanation for the difference in our wages.

5. At my 90-day evaluation in May 2000, I received a 35-cent raise to $6.85 per hour. However, if my starting pay rate had been the same as Mr. Via's and Mr. Berry's, my 90-day raise would have been to $7.10 per hour.

6. At the same Open Door meeting with Mr. Strong, I told Mr. Strong that I wanted to be considered for the Management Training Program. I knew about the program from a meeting in the store and from reading a poster that listed the requirements, which included a high school degree. When I asked Mr. Strong about the Management Training Program, he replied, "Management's not for you." He did not explain what he meant by that statement. I knew that approval of a manager was required to enter the Management Training Program. Mr. Strong's statement led me to believe I did not have his support and discouraged me from taking additional steps to get experience that would qualify me for a management position.

7. Of the four Management Trainees who trained at the Wooster store while I worked there, only one was female.

8. I was never disciplined while I worked at Wal-Mart. I received two performance evaluations. On my 90-day review, I received an "exceeds expectations" rating. (True and correct copy attached hereto as Shearer Exhibit A.) On my annual evaluation, I received a "meets expectations" rating, and I wrote in the comments section, "I am interested in becoming a department manager." (True and correct copy attached hereto as Shearer Exhibit B.)

9. Even though I expressed interest in management positions both to Assistant Manager Strong and during my annual review, I was never given the opportunity to apply for the Management Training Program. I was never told what qualifications were necessary for the Management Training Program or what the application process was. I never saw applications for the Management Training Program. If I had seen applications, I would have applied.

10. I left Wal-Mart in December 2000 to accept a position as a management trainee at McDonald's. In my exit interview with Wal-Mart, I specified that I was leaving due to my dissatisfaction with pay and to accept a management position with another company. No one in Wal-Mart management made any effort to dissuade me from quitting. (True and correct copy of Exit Interview attached hereto as Shearer Exhibit C.) Currently, I am an hourly supervisor at Lowe's Home Improvement Warehouse.

11. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Ohio that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 15 (month and day), 2003, at Wooster Ohio (city and state).

I, Barbara Steele, declare:

1. I am a woman and a former employee of Wal-Mart. I reside in Arizona.

2. I worked for Wal-Mart for 16 years as an hourly employee, an Assistant Manager, a Co-Manager, and a Store Manager. I held field management positions in several different states.

3. I was hired in 1986 as an hourly employee at a Wal-Mart in Carthage, Missouri. Within a year and a half, I had been promoted to Department Manager and then to Support Manager. In approximately 1988, Store Manager Lou Amato asked me what my career goals were, and I told him I was interested in a management position. Mr. Amato told me that the District Manager's approval was required for me to join the Management Training Program, and he told me that he would recommend me to District Manager Dave Simpson. My co-worker Sherrie Lambeth also expressed interest in management during the same conversation, and Mr. Amato said he would recommend her also. I also expressed my interest in management on my 1988 performance evaluation, on which I received an above-standard rating: "My goal is . . . to advance myself to the highest possible position." (True and correct copy attached hereto as Steele Exhibit A.)

4. During the next year, Ms. Lambeth and I tried to arrange interviews with Mr. Simpson whenever he was in the store, but he was completely unresponsive. In autumn 1989, I asked Mr. Amato why my promotion was being delayed, and he told me that Mr. Simpson refused to recommend me or Ms. Lambeth for the Management Training Program because he did not believe women should have management positions.

5. In October 1989, I was finally promoted into the Management Training Program by District Manager Jim Lund. Mr. Amato and Mr. Lund both told me that managers were required to be available to relocate anywhere in the country. I expressed my availability to work anywhere Wal-Mart needed managers.

6. I was assigned to a store in Joplin, Missouri, for management training. When my training was complete, I again told District Manager Lund that I was willing to move my residence if necessary for an Assistant Manager assignment. Shortly thereafter, Regional Personnel Manager Marie Hughes offered me a position as Assistant Manager at a store in Atascocita, Texas, which I accepted.

7. I worked as an Assistant Manager at the Atascocita store for two years, and was then transferred in 1992 to a store in Porter, Texas, where I worked another year as an Assistant Manager. By this time, I had been an Assistant Manager for three years, and I was becoming concerned that I would not be promoted to Store Manager, despite my positive evaluations and hard work.

8. I called Regional Personnel Manager Hughes to tell her my career felt stalled. Ms. Hughes suggested that I take an assignment as Assistant Manager at a "problem store" in Silver City, New Mexico. I then spoke with that store's District Manager, Rick Klein, who told me that if I could get the store "under control," I would get promoted to Store Manager. I accepted the assignment.

9. I started at the Silver City store in September 1993. During the two years I worked in Silver City, I was frequently assigned to set up new stores in other states, including North Dakota, South Dakota, and Missouri. I was always told that I needed to accept these "opportunities" in order to improve my chances for promotion. However, no matter how many such assignments I accepted, I continued to work as an Assistant Manager with no promotion in sight.

10. I was finally promoted to Store Manager of a store in Winslow, Arizona, 1995, by District Manager Charles Balentine. I had been an Assistant Manager with positive evaluations and no coachings for six years.

11. Throughout my career at Wal-Mart, I observed many male Assistant Managers obtain promotions to Store Manager after spending less time as an Assistant Manager than I had. For example, Gary Freeman was promoted to Store Manager of the Atascocita, Texas store in 1990 after only three years as an Assistant Manager. Richard Bourget was promoted to Store Manager of a store in Scarborough, Maine, in 2000 after only three years as an Assistant Manager and nine months as a Co-Manager. I also learned that Sherrie Lambeth, my co-worker from Carthage, Missouri, spent ten years as an Assistant Manager before she was promoted to Store Manager.

12. In the two years I was Store Manager in Winslow, my management team and I improved the store's overall performance rating from second or third-worst in the region to one of the top ten percent.

13. In 1997, I obtained a transfer as a Store Manager to a larger store in Lewiston, Idaho. In the two years that I was Store Manager in Lewiston, my management team and I improved the store's overall performance rating in the region from the bottom quarter to the top quarter.

14. Nonetheless, in 1999, District Manager Alan Schamber demoted me to Assistant Manager and transferred me to a store in Yakima, Washington, for allegedly backdating the evaluation date for one of my employees. I felt strongly that my demotion for such a minor infraction was unfair, and I used the Open Door to complain to Regional Vice President Bob Erickson. Mr. Erickson told me that the demotion would stand but that I could start applying for promotion again to Store Manager after 90 days.

15. Over the next three years, I applied more than twenty times for Store Manager positions using Wal-Mart's new computerized Management Career Selection system. I was never reinstated to a Store Manager position. I learned that many of the Store Manager positions that I applied for went to men with equal or lesser qualifications than I had. In 2000, Richard Bourget was chosen over me for promotion to Store Manager in Scarborough, Maine. Mr. Bourget had only three years' experience as an Assistant Manager and nine months' experience as a Co-Manager. I had four years' experience as a Store Manager and six years' experience as an Assistant Manager. Also, In 2000, John Clifton was chosen over me for promotion to Store Manager in Salem, Oregon, even though Mr. Clifton had only five years' experience as an Assistant Manager and less than one year's experience as a Co-Manager. Also, in 2000, James Sexton was chosen over me for promotion to Store Manager in Edmond, Oklahoma, even though Mr. Sexton had only four years' experience as an Assistant Manager and two years' experience as a Co-Manager. Also in 2000, Michael Kelly was chosen over me for promotion to Store Manager in Vancouver, Washington, even though he had only two years' experience as a Store Manager.

16. I also saw male employees, who had been demoted or terminated for more serious misconduct than I had been accused of, granted promotions in violation of the 90-day rule. For example, Mr. Schamber, the District Manager who had demoted me, was terminated for fraternizing with a female Store Manager shortly after my demotion. He applied for and received the position of Store Manager at a store in Vancouver, Washington, even though fewer than 90 days had passed since his termination. I had just passed the 90-day mark, and I also applied for that Store Manager position. I never received an explanation as to how Mr. Schamber had access to the Management Career Selection system during a period when he was not a Wal-Mart employee.

17. In total, I know that men with equal or lesser qualifications than I had received most of the Store Manager positions I applied for via the Management Career Selection system. I never received any information about why I was not chosen, other than a form letter via Wal-Mart's internal e-mail system stating that another applicant had been offered each position. During this time period, my evaluations were consistently "above standard" or "exceeds expectations."

18. After my demotion, I worked as an Assistant Manager in Yakima for one year. In approximately 2000, Store Manager Shannon Horton (male) asked District Manager Don Schulties, in my presence, why I had not been promoted to Store Manager. Mr. Schulties replied, "Home Office won't let me re-promote her." When I heard Mr. Schulties' comment, I finally realized that I was unlikely to ever regain a position as Store Manager. However, because I was the sole wage earner for my family, I continued to work at Wal-Mart for another two years as Grocery Co-Manager. During that time, I continued to use the Management Career Selection system to apply for Store Manager positions, but I was never promoted to Store Manager.

19. In January 2003, District Manager Dennis McMillan told me that he was assigning me the position of Co Manager of Softlines and the Front End in addition to my existing position of Grocery Co-Manager. No raise was included with this "offer." To me, the message was clear: I was qualified to do all the difficult work of store management, but I was not ever going to obtain a promotion back to the level and salary rate of Store Manager.

20. I left Wal-Mart in late January 2003, out of frustration with Wal-Mart's failure to promote me. I am a Store Manager at Fry's Grocery in Arizona.

21. In my 16 years at Wal-Mart, I never worked with a female Store Manager, and I only knew of one other female Store Manager. I never worked with or knew of any female District Managers.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Arizona that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by, me on April 18, 2003 (month and day), 2003, at Phoenix, Arizona (city and state).

Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ

DECLARATION OF SANDRA STEVENSON IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Sandra Stevenson, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I am a 50-year old woman who worked at the Sam's Club in Gurnee, Illinois from November 1996 until June 2000. I currently am employed with the United States Postal Service where I work part-time as a substitute mail carrier.

3. When I joined Sam's Club, I intended to stay with the company until I retired. I thought it was a place where if I worked hard and performed well, I would advance and succeed in the company. My experience, however, reflected a different reality.

4. My first assignment at Sam's Club was in the position of cashier. I worked as a cashier for approximately six weeks and then requested to be transferred to the night shift where I worked as a receiver. I did this so that I could earn additional income during the day by painting and wallpapering homes. Furthermore, the night shift paid $ .50 more per hour.

5. In approximately October 1997, it became apparent to me that women were not welcomed in management positions, as I observed the lack of women in management. Most of the managers in the Gurnee store were men and it was referred to as the "Boy's Club" by women who worked in the store as well as women who worked at other Sam's Clubs in the area. I continued to work hard in the hopes that I could somehow get past the obvious limits on women's advancement opportunities in the store.

6. In the fall of 1997, management decided to fill the position of overnight supervisor, which had been open for several months. The job was not posted and I heard about it through word of mouth. The acting General Manager James Allen, Grocery Team Leader Aaron Tinsley and Team Leader Lauren Young Loderek informally interviewed me after I verbally expressed interest in the position. I was promoted to overnight supervisor in approximately December 1997.

7. In mid-to-late1998, I repeatedly verbally expressed my interest in becoming a manager to General Manager Poulin, Merchandise Manager Roberts and Merchandise Manager Brent Fairmen. I received no meaningful response.

8. In the spring of 1999, it was apparent to me that if I wanted to be promoted I had to transfer to the day shift. I informed Acting General Manager Orences Christian and Merchandise Manager Jennifer Glowiak that I wanted to transfer. Despite my continued efforts to be promoted, I observed that male partners were being promoted to positions for which they were not qualified or for which they were less qualified than I. For example, in approximately October or November 1999, I observed as Acting General Manager Orences Christian told Jonathan Williams, a stocker in the freezer/cooler area that he would make a good team leader in the produce area. Mr. Williams had no prior experience in the department and no supervisory experience. I was very upset that Acting General Manager Christian had not offered the position to me even though he was aware that I wanted to transfer to the day shift and wanted a promotion. I pulled him aside to discuss this. His response was, he was sorry, but he did not think I would be interested in that position. I was quite upset with his response and stated that I would be the judge of that, and furthermore, I was interested in any position that would be or lead to a management position. Not surprisingly, Mr. Williams did not stay in the position for very long and, eventually, resigned from the store.

9. Also, I watched as male employees including David Jordan and Kelly Walker were groomed for management while I was at a complete standstill despite my supervisory experience and obvious interest in promotion. Kelly Walker was promoted to Team Leader for Hardlines in 1999 although he had only worked in the Tire Mounting Area and had no prior experience in Hardlines. He was, eventually, selected for New Coach Development, Sam's Club's management training program. Kelly's brother, Randy Walker, whom I had supervised when he worked overnight, was promoted to the Team Leader for the freezer/cooler section although he had no prior supervisory experience in the area. I was not offered any of these open positions despite my prior experience as overnight supervisor and obvious interest in promotion.

10. At the end of 1999, or the beginning of 2000, a Produce and Floral Team Leader position was available. It was not posted and I verbally expressed interest in it to Merchandise Manager Jennifer Glowiak. I told her that I wanted to be the next Produce Team Leader or Produce Manager, that I had worked hard to become overnight supervisor and that when I started with Sam's Club I had planned to retire from the company. I also informed Merchandise Manager Glowiak during a meeting in January 2000 that either I would be considered for the Produce Team Leader position or I was going to leave the company. A few days later, Merchandise Manager Glowiak called me at home on my day off to offer me the Produce and Floral Team Leader position.

11. After I transferred to Produce, and Floral Team Lead in January 2000, Merchandise Manager Glowiak informed me that that I needed to become familiar with the department and how it ran in order to be promoted to Produce Manager. She also told me that General Manager Todd Christian and Fresh District Operations Manager Brian Grossi would make the decision about whether to promote me to Produce Manager. Shortly after I transferred to produce, it was apparent to me that management had no intention of promoting me to Produce Manager. Whenever I asked a manager about promotion to Produce Manager, I, again, got the runaround. Merchandise Manager Lauren Loaderek joined the management team in February 2000. She told me in the spring of 2000 that the decision to promote me was up to Fresh District Operations Manager Grossi and General Manager Christian. General Manager Christian said it was up to Fresh District Operations Manager Grossi and District Operations Manager Greene. Every time I attempted to talk to a manager in the store, each would direct me to speak with someone else. No one seemed to be able to give me a straightforward answer.

12. In late spring of 2000, once again, I repeatedly expressed my interest in becoming promoted to the position of Produce Manager. I called District Operations Manager Greene on the telephone to exercise the Open Door Policy. However, Mr. Greene never returned my call. I was also discouraged from using the Open Door when Area Bakery Manager Dave Ashmore advised me not to go over General Manager Christian's head. I performed many of the responsibilities of Produce Manager while I was in the position of Produce and Floral Lead. The department was seriously understaffed and at times I was forced to work off the clock to complete my job duties throughout the time I was team leader. Despite this obstacle, I was able to increase the department's percentage of total store sales and led a company-wide contest in the sale of oranges for a number of weeks.

13. Despite these accomplishments, management continued not to support me in my efforts to perform my job duties as team lead. On a holiday weekend, when there was a great deal of produce to stock General Manager Christian fired the only employee I had in the department. Mr. Christian did not discuss it with me prior to firing the employee and made no effort to find a replacement for him. I was forced to load the produce myself and worked off the clock with management's knowledge to get the job done. The incident was particularly frustrating and upsetting because I had been scheduled to attend the wake of a family member, which I was forced to miss in order to complete loading produce.

14. I finally had gotten the message. Management would not support or encourage me in my goal to join management. On June 21, 2000, I resigned from Sam's Club.

15. During my employment at Sam's, open positions were not posted. The only time I can recall any position being posted were the two instances in which I posted for open positions in produce and floral when I was team lead. In all other instances, open positions were communicated by word of mouth.

16. I also worked in the Evanston Sam's Club in the latter part of 1999 and the Vernon Hills Club in 1999 temporarily. I had the opportunity to observe how each one operated and observed that they operated the same way as the Gurnee Club.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Illinois that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 23, 2003, at Lake County.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, EDITH ARANA, DEBORAH GUNTER, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, CLEO PAGE, KAREN WILLIAMSON, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiffs vs. WAL-MART STORES, INC., Defendant	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF ANNA STUMPF IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Anna Stumpf, declare:

1. I have personal knowledge of the facts contained in this declaration and, if called as a witness, am competent to testify to those facts.

2. I grew up in Versailles, Missouri, the site of one of the original five-and-dime stores run by Bud Walton. Wal-Mart and particularly the Walton family were very important in the town. As children, my classmates and I were excused early from school if Sam or Bud Walton came to town. Several family friends were employed by Wal-Mart.

3. I obtained a bachelor's degree in Marketing from Southwest Missouri State in 1993. I was recruited on campus by Wal-Mart for the Assistant Manager training program and started work on May 17, 1993, three days after my college graduation. I was very excited for the opportunity because I had seen Wal-Mart grow from a local business in my hometown to a retailer of national importance. My parents were also very proud that I was going to work for Wal-Mart.

4. I understood from the outset of my employment with Wal-Mart that I was expected to be 100% relocatable, meaning that I might have to move anywhere in the United States at any time. Since 1993, I have been assigned to nine different locations in four different states (Missouri, Florida, Virginia and Kentucky). I was also sent at various times to do short-term store set-ups and clean-ups at stores in Tennessee and North Carolina.

5. From the time I was hired, my goal was to advance as far as I could within Wal-Mart management. I was initially interested in becoming a store manager and, later, developed an interest in becoming a Regional Personnel Manager. Because of my strong work ethic, good people skills and consistently excellent reviews, I believed that I could reach these goals. For eight years, I sacrificed many important things in my life – a stable home and community, friends and family – for Wal-Mart. For example, I could not attend holidays with my parents and extended family and I missed the funerals of a number of friends and family members. I was unable to join and participate in any church where I lived because of my long hours, weekend schedule and frequent moves.

6. At the beginning of my tenure with Wal-Mart, I trained for four months in the Osage Beach, Missouri Wal-Mart store and was made an Assistant Manager in the store in October 1993. I was transferred in March 1994 to a Jacksonville, Florida store. During the year that I was there, the Jacksonville store went through a remodel, the holidays and inventory. During one period, I worked 63 overnights in a row (a minimum 12-hour shift) without a day off. When I was not working in my own store, I was often called in to help on my day off with the remodeling in neighboring Wal-Mart stores.

7. I received a "meets expectations" rating on my evaluation in February 1995. However, District Manager, Charles Durr, told me that my performance was "above standard," but that I had not been an assistant manager long enough to receive anything above a "standard" rating. The size of my raise was determined by the evaluation rating. I wrote on my evaluation that "I hope to eventually go on to Supercenters - and have my own store within four years." Attached hereto as Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of my February 1995 evaluation.

8. In May 1995, I requested a transfer back to Missouri, preferably to a supercenter where I felt that I could best advance my career. I was placed in a Jefferson City, Missouri supercenter. When District Manager Durr learned of my impending move to Missouri, he told me that he would have given me the above standard rating had he known he would not be paying me for the entire year. In other words, Mr. Durr made it clear to me that he underrated my evaluation in order to lower payroll expenses in his district despite his recognition that I was performing at a higher level and deserved higher pay.

9. My district manager in Jefferson City was Charles Benzoni. A few weeks after I arrived, he approached me on the sales floor to talk. He told me that I was one of the hardest working, most talented assistants that he had but also that I was the lowest paid assistant manager in the district. He arranged for a pay adjustment for me, although I do not know whether the adjustment brought me to a pay level that reflected the quality of my performance or was equal to my male peers.

10. In March 1996, I interviewed at the Wal-Mart Home office for a position as Regional Trainer. I received the position and was required to relocate to Brooksville, Florida, although I was considered a Home Office employee. As a Regional Trainer, I was responsible for conducting field training programs for Assistant Managers and other store managers, primarily the 3 1/2 day Leadership Foundation training. This training program, developed in the Bentonville headquarters, had a standard curriculum and was administered company-wide. I was required to make a two-year commitment to the position. During this time, I became interested in obtaining a position as a Regional Personnel Manager.

11. While working as a Regional Trainer, I received an "exceeds expectations" performance rating in March 1997. About my personal goals, I wrote: "This time next year my goal is to be a co-manager in a Supercenter, a step toward my ultimate goal of becoming an RPM for the Supercenter division." Attached hereto as Exhibit B is a true and correct copy of my March 3, 1997 evaluation.

12. As a regional trainer, I became acquainted with Regional Vice President Leroy Schuetts and I discussed with him my career goals at Wal-Mart. I considered this new relationship to be extremely important for me because I had always understood the importance of having a mentor in a corporation to help guide one's career. I felt that Mr. Schuetts was willing to give me this help. I told him that I had become interested in the Regional Personnel Manager (RPM) position. He urged me to get back into store management if I wanted to meet my goal.

13. At Mr. Schuetts' recommendation, I accepted a temporary position as a Co-Manager in the Kissimmee, Florida store in September 1997. Mr. Schuetts wanted me to work there through the holidays and then move to a store in Valdosta, GA that was slated to open. I was designated a "Co-Manager in Training" in Kissimmee although I was doing the same work as the other co-managers and was in no sense in training. In my past experience, the position of Co-Manager in Training was ordinarily used only for brand new management employees to Wal-Mart, which I plainly was not. I learned that I had been given this designation so that I would be paid out of the Home Office training account rather than the store account. As a result, the store would show higher revenue figures (ensuring the bonuses for existing store managers) but I would not receive a bonus as all the other male Co-Managers in the store did. It also put me at a disadvantage later in my career in applying for store manager positions, which often carried a requirement that one have first completed 12 - 18 months as a Co-Manager. I am not aware of any male employee in a comparable position that has been designated a "Co-Manager in Training."

14. After a month in Kissimmee, I was moved in November 1997 to Plant City, Florida as a third Co-Manager. Regional Vice President Bob Erickson told me that the store was in bad shape because the store manager had just been fired and the holidays were fast approaching. Leroy Shuetts, who had now been promoted to Divisional Vice President, told me that the Plant City assignment would be temporary and that I would soon be placed in a newly opening store in Valdasta, Georgia. I still had the Co-Manager in Training designation and was not entitled to receive a bonus, although I was working 70 to 80 hours per week.

15. I prepared and submitted comments in connection with my performance evaluation (which once again was "exceeds expectation") about the unfairness of the "in training" designation. I stated in part: "I feel that for the five months that I was left in the Co-Manager training account I was not utilized to my potential, challenged or developed in an effective manner. . . . decisions and placements done in dealing with my career this year have put me at a disadvantage." Attached hereto as Exhibit C are true and correct copies of my evaluation and my comments. My district manager, Guy Peshek, strongly encouraged me not to include these comments with my evaluation, which he implied would hurt my image in the company. He also suggested to me that the comments were unnecessary and would not make any difference. To me, this was a clear message that the Open Door Policy was not intended for use by managers and that using it might, in fact, be perceived negatively.

16. Just after the holidays, I learned from my Regional Personnel Manager and my Regional President, Bob Erickson, of an opening for a Regional Personnel Manager. Knowing my keen interest in the position, they submitted my name for consideration, after consulting with Leroy Schuetts. Several weeks went by and I did not hear anything about my application so I faxed a letter to Maxie Carpenter, who was the hiring authority for the position, on January 19, 1998. I still heard nothing so, on January 23, I telephoned Mr. Carpenter. He told me that I was ineligible for the position because I had not "run a store," meaning that I had not been a store manager. Within weeks of my conversation with Carpenter, I learned that an RPM position went to a male employee, Joshua Ramsey, who ran the documentation department in the Home Office. Mr. Ramsey had never served as a store manager.

17. In February 1998, I was making plans to move to Valdasta, Georgia when I received a call from the new Regional Vice President Arthur Emmanuel. He told me that the company needed me to stay at the Plant City, Florida store. Mr. Emmanuel felt that the troubled store was "turning around" and he needed me to stay there. Perhaps recognizing the difficulty of the assignment, Mr. Emmanuel promised me that I would have my own store (e.g. be promoted to store manager) by the end of 1998 or beginning of 1999. He reassured me that I was a Rising Star in the region and on the promotable list.

18. In August 1998, I attended the company-wide holiday meeting and ran into Divisional Vice President Leroy Shuetts. Mr. Shuetts assumed that I had gone to Valdasta, Georgia but I told him that I was still in Plant City. He told me that Wal-Mart was opening a store in Lexington, Kentucky and he wanted me to move there as a third co-manager to assist with the opening. He then said: "you'll have your own store right after we open this one, we've moved you around enough and if you can help us, we'll take care of you." I subsequently received a call from the RPM over the Kentucky store, Debbie Moody. She advised me that DVP Shuetts and the RVP for the store, Bill Dillehea, had talked and agreed that there would not be a third co-manager in the store after the first of the year, and that I would then be promoted to store manager.

19. In September 1998, I moved to the Lexington, Kentucky store and assisted with the enormous effort of opening the store. I was not promoted to a store manager position after the first of the year, as had been promised. In January 1999, I checked the MCS job posting system for store manager openings. I found an opening at a supercenter in Venice, Florida. As required, I sought and received the approval of my district manager, Gerry Gant, before posting. I also spoke to Divisional Vice President Schuetts, who encouraged me to post and described the position as a "perfect first store."

20. After posting, I did not hear anything and telephoned the RPM in Florida, Steve Schulteis. He told me that I could not be interviewed because RVP Bill Dilleahea had entered a "no" recommendation next to my name (i.e. vetoed my application). I was outraged and telephoned RPM Debbie Moody to find out the reason that Mr. Dillehea was standing in the way of my promotion. Ms. Moody advised me that Mr. Dilleahea would not move any of the managers out of the Lexington, Kentucky store for six months after the opening, precisely the opposite of what I had been told before moving to Kentucky, four months earlier.

21. I telephoned Mr. Dillehea in early February to discuss it. Wal-Mart policy (the "Sundown Rule") requires management to return phone messages from customers and employees on the same day that they are received. He did not return my call for over a month. Attached hereto as Exhibit D is a true and correct copy of the chronology of key events that I kept on my computer.

22. Before I heard from Mr. Dillehea, however, I received my written performance evaluation for 1998, which was again very high (4.1 - exceeds expectations) based on the excellent turn-around work that I had done in Plant City. While the evaluation had been prepared by the district manager over the Plant City store, Greg Ley, Mr. Gant told me that he wholeheartedly agreed with its strong endorsement. Attached hereto as Exhibit E is a true and correct copy of the performance evaluation dated February 19, 1999.

23. Despite the very high score, my district manager, Jerry Gant, then changed his tone and told me: "I am supposed to tell you that you are not promotable and do not post." Mr. Gant then read to me from a list provided to him by Debby Moody (RPM for Bill Dillehea) of three areas in which I purportedly needed to improve (i.e. get organized, be more firm, hold myself accountable, take on a mentor). Ironically, these were the three key areas of strength identified in the written performance evaluation that Mr. Gant had just given me. Mr. Gant could not offer any examples of inadequate performance on my part and, to his credit, he told me that he did not agree with the list. I was told not to post for store manager openings for six months and not to call Leroy Schuetts to express interest in being promoted. I told Mr. Gant that I felt that I had been lied to and that "the Open Door had been closed." Mr. Gant told me candidly that he agreed with me and that he would support me if I took further steps because he did not feel that I was being treated fairly.

24. RVP Dillehea finally returned my phone call on March 9, 1999. He told me that he would not put me on the promotable list and there were many others ahead of me on his list, people that he had known longer and to whom he "owed favors." I objected that I was already on the promotable list and he responded: "not in my region." He encouraged me to move laterally out of his region. I knew from my past experience that there were not different promotable lists by region. Rather, the promotable list was company-wide and was maintained on a wall in the Home Office. It was plain to me that Mr. Dillehea was not willing to consider my promotability based on the merits and that he was willing to lie to ensure that his candidates got preferential treatment.

25. Within weeks of my March 9, 1999 conversation with Mr. Dillehea, two male assistant managers in the Lexington, Kentucky store (William Cotton and Tony Bryant) were offered promotions and/or allowed to promote out of the store, despite RVP Dillehea's alleged six month-prohibition on any moves.

26. On March 24, 1999, I telephoned Divisional Vice. President Leroy Schuetts to complain about the inequitable treatment that I had received. I specifically told him that I felt that I had been the subject of discrimination. He asked me to write a letter explaining my concerns. Attached hereto as Exhibit F is a true and correct copy of the letter that I faxed to Mr. Schuetts. I met with Mr. Schuetts and Mr. Dillahea on April 12, 1999. That meeting took place face to face because, after reading my letter, Leroy Schuetts said that my story did not match the one that Mr. Dillahea was telling and he wanted to get us both together. At the meeting, RVP Dillahea made it clear that, while I was welcome to stay in the region, he would not promote me. Mr. Schuetts asked me to move temporarily to Raleigh Durham, North Carolina (outside of Mr. Dillahea's region) to once again clean up a group of troubled stores there. Recognizing I had no future under RVP Dillehea, I once again acquiesced to the move. I stayed five weeks in a hotel while working without days off to complete a remodel on the store. I had planned to attend my 10-year high school reunion and had paid for reservations and a plane ticket for the event. I could not attend because of the assignment in North Carolina.

27. I was then assigned as a co-manager to a supercenter in Virginia Beach, Virginia which Schuetts told me was "the best store in the division." He told me that every co-manager in that store had been promoted within six months. After the first of the year, Divisional Vice President Leroy Schuetts told me that he would call me and tell me which store to post for: "sit tight and we'll find you the right fit."

28. In January 2000, Schuetts called and told me to post for a store in South Boston, VA. I understood by the RPM Josh Ramsey that it was a "difficult ethnic store" but I went ahead and posted. At approximately the same time, I learned of a store manager opening at a store only two miles from the Virginia Beach store (Store 1688). While the store had also had some problems, I felt that I had a good chance of obtaining this store because I was known to and respected by both my District Manager Chad Madison and the Regional Vice President Dave Norman. I applied on MCS for the position in Virginia Beach.

29. I once again received an "exceeds expectations" ranking on my February 2000 evaluation. I had become, however, extremely frustrated with the continuously shifting requirements and obstacles to my promotion. For so many years, I had done whatever Wal-Mart asked of me without complaint – whether it be to work 80 hours a week or months without a day off. I finally began speaking up for myself to senior management and objecting to the unfair treatment that I received. My store manager and district manager criticized me for being "too impatient" and "too emotional." I feel that, had I been a man, I would have been seen as aggressive and hard-driving. Instead, the expectation that was communicated to me was that I should sit quietly, be patient and not question even if the most egregiously discriminatory treatment.

30. On March 15, 2000, Regional Vice President Norman called to tell me that I had not been selected for the Store 1688 position in Virginia Beach. He told me that, while I was "more qualified" than the male who was selected for the position, the employees in the store wanted this individual who was a current co-manager there. It is unheard of at Wal-Mart that the employees in a poorly performing store would be allowed to select their manager. Since the employees in that store had never met me, I had no chance to compete for their endorsement. I responded: "so, I lost the popularity contest?" I told Mr. Norman that I had been waiting for four years for "a store manager position and I would no longer do what was the easy thing for Wal-Mart. I would no longer pick up and move to yet another troubled store based on some vague promise of future advancement. At that point, I concluded that I would never receive fair treatment at Wal-Mart nor could I expect to advance further.

31. Shortly thereafter, I accepted a position as the District Manager of Shoes and Jewelry in Indianapolis. Based on observation and knowledge, this position is held almost exclusively by women. My salary was $55,000, far less than I would have made as a store manager. Moreover, the Shoes and Jewelry DM position was subject to a salary cap while there was no such limit for store manager compensation. I held that position until recently, when I decided that I wanted to go become a school teacher. I am now back in school full-time and work as an hourly employee for Wal-Mart in Store 1141 as a training coordinator.

32. I have never been involved in a lawsuit before. I decided to become a witness in this case after I heard Wal-Mart's CEO Lee Scott give a speech shortly after this lawsuit was filed. He claimed that the "Open Door" policy could handle any discrimination problems at Wal-Mart. I honestly did not understand how Mr. Scott could stand in front of us and make this statement that he surely knew was untrue. Based on my own experience, I disagreed with Mr. Scott. As my declaration makes clear, I had used the open door many times but I was unable to get a promotion to store manager.

33. As an assistant manager and co-manager, I worked with other store management to identify candidates for the Management in Training program. In deciding which individuals to recommend, we always discussed whether the candidate was "relocatable." If they were not relocatable, they would not be recommended for the training program.

34. As an Assistant Manager, I was frequently moved from one store to another on short notice. It took very little time to assimilate into the new store because every Wal-Mart store operates with the same set of policies, equipment, staff and procedures.

35. During my career, I worked in both Division 1 stores and supercenters. The difference between them is that the supercenters have additional departments for grocery, dairy, bakery and meat, which are not in Division 1 stores. However, I was trained to use the same Wal-Mart personnel policies and practices in the supercenters, whether hiring, promoting or disciplining employees, as were used in the Division 1 stores. The responsibilities of Assistant Managers in both stores are the same. Since 1996, the company has made a conscious and concerted effort to eliminate any organizational differences between Division 1 stores and supercenters. Management level employees regularly transfer between them and local districts include both kinds of stores. Finally, there was one Wal-Mart culture that we consistently taught to associates, regardless of the kind of store that they worked in.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the State of Indiana that the foregoing is true and correct.

Executed this 25th day of March, 2003 in McCordsville, Indiana.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, CLEO PAGE, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, DEBORAH GUNTER, KAREN WILLIAMSON AND EDITH ARANA, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiff, vs. WAL-MART STORES, INC., Defendant	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF PATRICIA SURGESON IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Patricia Surgeson, declare:

1. I am a named plaintiff in this action. I worked at the Wal-Mart Store in Vacaville, California from August 1997 until March 2001. I am female and live in Vacaville, California.

2. I was hired to be a cashier/stocker in the Tire and Lube Express department ("TLE"). Within my first month working in TLE, a male co-employee Patrick [last name unknown] approached me when I was on a ladder and grabbed my buttocks. I yelled at him and was very upset. Patrick had previously made inappropriate comments to me, including offering money to me to have a baby with him. He frequently tried to touch me. I went to Kevin [last name unknown], the male Support Manager who was my immediate supervisor, and complained about Patrick's actions. As a result of my use of the Open Door, I was transferred to another department, although I liked working in TLE and would have chosen to continue there. I was not given an option. Patrick was not transferred, but instead was permitted to keep his position in TLE. I continued to see Patrick in the breakroom. To my knowledge, no investigation of Patrick's misconduct occurred. Patrick was not disciplined to my knowledge.

3. I was transferred to the Toys Department for one day and then to the Health and Beauty Aids Department ("HBA") where I was a sales associate for over a year, until November 1998. I did not participate in any additional orientation process to move from TLE to the Toys and HBA departments.

4. In my first annual review in July 1998, I was rated as "above standard," a hard worker and a team player. Attached hereto as Surgeson Exhibit A is a true and accurate copy of this review.

5. As my confidence and skills grew, I began to look for opportunities for advancement at Wal-Mart. I wanted to take the next promotional step and began looking for a chance to be a department manager. I applied for department manager positions that were posted as available. I did not receive any of these positions. In late 1998, when I was denied a promotion to a department manager position for which I had applied, I asked Store Manager Allen Becker for an explanation. Mr. Becker responded by telling me that there was a position in the Lay-Away Department that would be soon available, and offered it to me. It had not been posted. I accepted and began training in that position shortly thereafter. I understood that eventually I was to be made the Department Manager of Lay-Away.

6. I moved to the Lay-Away Department in November 1998. After I was in that position for approximately six months, I spoke with Store Manager Allen Becker about my future. Mr. Becker offered me the position of Lay-Away Manager, as the current manager was leaving. The position had not been posted and I did not fill out an application. I accepted the position. I had new responsibilities, including supervising and giving direction to other workers in the department, preparing the paperwork for the department, and ordering supplies. I wore a name tag that identified me as "Lay-Away Manager." When I needed employment confirmation as I moved into a new apartment, the personnel office at Wal-Mart confirmed that I was Lay-Away Manager.

7. A new Store Manager, Marvin Raps, replaced Mr. Becker in October of 1999. Mr. Raps told me that the Lay-Away Department did not need a manager and that I would continue with the same responsibilities but without the title.

8. In the summer of 2000, I moved to the Cash Office as I believed it was a step up in my career. When Store Manager Marvin Raps told me I was being given the position, he told me it was a confidential position with a lot of responsibility as I would be handling a great deal of cash. Despite this increase in responsibilities and my good performance, I received no raise with this move. I made a written request for a merit increase, but received no response. I asked Assistant Manager Rod Couture for an answer to my request, but just received promises that he would look into it. I did not receive an increase and was never given a reason from any manager.

9. After I moved to the Cash Office, a male associate named B.J. Jawanda was moved to manage the Lay-Away Department Because I was in the Cash Office at the time, handling payroll, I saw Mr. Jawanda's direct deposit pay stub when he replaced me in the Lay-Away Department. Mr. Jawanda was paid approximately $2.00 an hour more than I was in the Lay-Away department for doing the same job.

10. In January 2001, I asked a young male Assistant Manager Trainee, Adam Kingsley, how to get into the Management Training Program. He told me that he had been recommended by his Store Manager, when he had been at a different store. He provided no further information. His response was vague. I knew of no other means of entry to the Management Training Program and had never seen anything in writing about management training. There was never a posting that I saw by which I could have expressed my interest in joining management.

11. While I was in the Cash Office, I saw the payroll of all employees. I saw that male department managers in garden and furniture were paid more than female department managers. I saw that my hourly wage was lower than men who had been hired after me and did not have the significant responsibility that I had.

12. In March 2001, I quit my employment at Wal-Mart because it was apparent my talents and contribution to Wal-Mart were not appreciated. Seeing that male employees were paid more for the same job, and experiencing that discrimination first-hand with the Lay-Away Manager position, made me believe I would never be treated with equality. My efforts at promotion had been brushed aside. I believed I would be forever stuck in a dead-end job and denied the opportunities for growth and increasing responsibilities. I found another job immediately. I was hired as an Assistant Manager at a small clothing store, where I was paid slightly more.

13. I decided to become a named plaintiff in this action because I have been unfairly denied promotional opportunities and equal pay. A man doing the same job that I had done was paid more. My requests for raises were ignored and my effort to learn how to enter the Management Training Program was summarily brushed aside. My primary goal is to ensure that the employment practices at Wal-Mart that hinder the progress of women wishing to enter management be changed, to ensure fair and equitable treatment of female employees. I understand the responsibilities of a named plaintiff and I am prepared to fulfill my duties to the women in the class.

14. I filed a Charge of Discrimination with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission on or about May 31, 2001. I brought the charge on behalf of myself and similarly situated women who receive less pay, promotions and training than male employees. A true and correct copy of this charge is attached hereto as Surgeson Exhibit B. I received a Notice of Right to Sue, a true and correct copy of which is attached hereto as Surgeson Exhibit C.

15. I have personal knowledge of all of the foregoing facts and if called as a witness could and would testify competently thereto.

16. I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and the State of California that the foregoing is true and correct. Executed this 17 day of April, 2003 in Vacaville, California.

I, Dawn Sweeny, declare:

1. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and, if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

2. I have worked at Wal-Mart for approximately 10 years. I am female.

3. I began working for Wal-Mart, Inc. on May 25, 1993 as a Bakery Associate in the Stillwater, Oklahoma store. I am currently a Co-Manager at Store 3285 in Cedar Hill, Texas.

4. During my tenure at Wal-Mart, I have worked in seven different stores throughout Oklahoma and Texas. In all stores in both states, I received information from a centralized computer system, also called the Store Manager's Workbench. Store Managers and Co-Managers only have access to the Workbench. From these tools, I have discerned that personnel policies and practices in the stores relating to compensation, promotion, discipline, and training are the same.

5. When I started in Stillwater, Oklahoma as a Bakery Associate, I was paid one dollar less than a man whose name I no longer recall. We were hired for the same position and received training at the same time. Neither of us had prior experience.

6. While in Stillwater, I was denied promotions into management positions repeatedly. In 1994, I spoke a number of times to my Co-Manager, Joe Flack, and my Store Manager, David Mooneyhan, about my interest in becoming a Support Manager. They told me they would consider promoting me. This was before the computer system for expressing interest in a job was in place, so jobs were advertised by word of mouth or, on occasion, sign up sheets were posted. In approximately 1995, I applied for two Support Manager positions by expressing interest on a sign up sheet. I was neither interviewed nor selected for either. Instead two men, whose names I no longer recall, got the positions. I never received any explanation or learned who had gotten the position. Despite my repeated expression of interest in management, I was not offered an opportunity to join the management training program during my first four years at Wal-Mart. I was given no guidance on how to get training and no application forms were made available to me.

7. I left Wal-Mart in 1997 because I could not get promoted into the Management Training Program. In March 1998, a female District Manager, Janet Hatfield, and a female Store Manager, Bonnie Summers, recruited me back to Wal-Mart, offering me a position of Support Manager in the Richardson, Texas store and assuring me that I would be promoted into the Management Training Program shortly.

8. In July 1998, David McKinsey, the District Manager, approved Bonnie Summers' recommendation that I enter the Management Training Program. I trained at Store 1216 in Carrollton, Texas. When I entered the program, my pay was reduced from $13.15 to $10.81 per hour. As a result, my salary was $27,500. I am aware of male associates, Jerry [last name unknown] and Ron Lockridge who were paid up to $40,000 when they entered the Management Training Program.

9. After completing the Management Training Program, I was transferred to Oklahoma City to work as an Assistant Manager at Store 2804. From January 2001 through June 2001, I applied for five Store Manager positions. I applied for the positions through the computerized system, called MCS, and was interviewed for all of them. Four of the positions went to men. I once was notified by e-mail that I had not gotten the promotion. The other times I received no notification and would find out the position had been filled because it no longer was posted as an opening. I followed up with Lisa Heilman, the Regional Personnel Manager in Oklahoma City to ask why I wasn't getting these positions. Ms. Heilman just told me to keep applying.

10. In July 2001, I transferred to a Wal-Mart in Colony, TX as Assistant Manager. There was only one other female Assistant Manager in the store. For the first 2 months, I was a day Assistant Manager and then was scheduled for the overnight Assistant Manager shift. The Store Manager in Colony was a male named Jodie Dean. Store Manager Dean communicated more with male than female Assistant Managers. For example, Store Manager Dean would conduct meetings with male Assistant Managers in his office but did not invite female Assistant Managers to join.

11. On one occasion when I was the only female in a meeting, Store Manager Dean made a derogatory comment about large women and a Co-Manager, Gary Schultz, asked me to leave the room so that he could make a return comment. I refused to leave and the conversation ended. Two other males, Jessie Franco and Doug Richard were also present at this time.

12. In October 2001, I wanted to be promoted to Store Manager and so I contacted Nikki Bayne, my Regional Personnel Manager. Ms. Bayne told me that I needed to become a Rising Star to be eligible for promotion. I contacted Jim Strauss, my District Manager, and asked to be placed on the Rising Star list because of my interest in being promoted. District Manager Strauss came into the store the next day and told me that he would place me on the list. I was given my Rising Star badge that same month. Jim Brasher was the other Overnight Assistant Manager in the Colony store at that time. Mr. Brasher said that he had been surprised a few weeks earlier when Store Manager Dean and District Manager Strauss announced they had put him on the Rising Star list. Mr. Brasher also told me that he did not have to ask to be put on the list.

13. Rising Star Assistant Managers, Co-Managers and Store Managers are supposed to attend Holiday and Year-End meetings. I was the only Rising Star in my store who was not invited to attend any of the meetings. District Manager Strauss selected Will Baird, Jodie Dean, and Jesse Franco--all men--to attend the meetings. When I learned I would not be able to attend the meetings, I asked my Store Manager Dean to re-consider the decision. Mr. Dean told me there were no slots available. To this day, even as Co-Manager, I have not been invited to attend any Holiday or Year-End meetings.

14. In March 2002, District Manager Jim Strauss told me a Co-Manager position would be available in Colony, Texas. There was a TLE district manager, Greg Epling, who was offered the position prior to me. Mr. Strauss told me that he would offer me the position if Mr. Epling turned it down. After Mr. Epling turned down the position, Mr. Strauss offered the position to me and I accepted. The position was not posted. In fact, previously when I asked about where Co-Manager positions were posted, I was told that they are not.

15. In May or June 2002, District Manager Strauss asked me if I would accept a position as Store Manager of a Neighborhood Market store. I turned down the offer because my salary would have been reduced significantly since Neighborhood Markets are not as profitable as Wal-Mart stores.

16. A couple of weeks later, District Manager Strauss asked me to transfer to Store 3285 in Cedar Hills, Texas as a Co-manager. I felt like I was being forced out of Mr. Dean's store and that if I turned down the position that I would not be able to progress at Wal-Mart.

17. Now, I earn $45,000 per year. In contrast, Tim Long, the other Co-Manager in my store told me that he earns at least $47,500 annually.

18. Within the past month I have applied to three additional Store Manager positions on MCS, the computerized system and have interviewed for two of them, but was not contacted or interviewed for the third. I am still awaiting the outcome of these but plan to continue applying for Store Manager positions until I reach my goal.

19. I declare under the penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Texas that the foregoing is true and correct.

This declaration was signed by me on April 16, 2003, in Euless, Texas.

I, Andrea Tallent, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I was employed by Wal-Mart, Inc. in Franklin in North Carolina, from September 27, 1988 until November, 2000. I am female.

3. I received an AAS degree in accounting in 1976, a diploma in auto mechanics in 1978, and an AAS degree in Paralegal Technology in August 1988. I have an additional 2 years of college education. All of this training was on the initial resume I submitted to Wal-Mart in 1988.

4. Prior to being hired by Wal-Mart, I sold fabric in a retail store from 1983 to 1988. From 1989 to 1990 I owned a store with Glenda Anderson, craft department manger, while also working at Wal-Mart.

5. I was originally hired by Wal-Mart as the fabric department manager because of my retail experience with fabric and crafts.

6. As Stationary Department Manger I received two "Great Job" awards before 1993. One was for sales increase and the other for mark-up increase. These awards are each 1/4 share of stock, from the Regional Manager, I cannot recall his name.

7. After asking several times, I was finally promoted to Support Manager in approximately 1997. The only other position I was offered was Photo manager, a position I held from February to November 2000.

8. I began asking about the management training program for Assistant Manager positions at my initial interview with Roger Smith, Co-manager, in 1988. In Spring 1993 I was sent on a three week setup in Greenville, SC which was extended to sex weeks at the request of the set up supervisor because I was doing such a good job. When I returned I gave John Hay, District Manager, a copy of my excellent evaluation and asked him again about the management training program. I had also requested that the setup supervisor call him and recommend me for the promotion.

9. Mr. Hay offered me the management training position on the condition that I would transfer to a store anywhere in the United States. He did not offer me the option to transfer to the Wal-Mart store in Sylva, about 18 miles away. I accepted the promotion based on Mr. Hay's conditions with the intention of moving my family. Several days later I told Mr. Hay that I wanted the promotion, but had to decline since I could not relocate further away than the Sylva store due to a change in my home situation. When I told Mr. Hay about the limitation on my ability to relocate, I stepped down from the assistant manager trainee to a position handling competition ads and store signing. Since this was not a classified position I was titled as a cashier. Later on I began running a register full-time when computer scheduling was implemented. I was made Department Manager again just prior to being made Photo Lab Manager in February 2000.

10. The same week that I was promoted and then demoted, Mr. Dahmer was hired as a third shift warehouse Assistant Manager in the Franklin, NC store. Mr. Dahmer told me that Mr. Hay had hired him from McLane's, a supplier bought by Wal-Mart, as a third shift manager with the promise that he did not have to transfer.

11. In 1988 during a department manager's meeting in the old upstairs breakroom, Roger Smith Store Manager, told us at that "men need to be paid more than women because they have families to support."

12. I told district manager John Hay's assistant, Karen Jones, that he had a history of promoting single white men under 30 and it was beginning to become a legal issue. The next day a woman named Mary Beth who worked in softlines in the Franklin, NC store and was promoted to the assistant manager training program.

13. Ken Kribbs and Sharon Kribbs were hired on the same day as sales associates, although they worked as stockers. I was Ms. Kribbs supervisor and she told me Mr. Kribbs was being paid more per hour then she was.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and of the State of North Carolina, that the foregoing is true and correct. I signed this on April 17, 2003 in Franklin, North Carolina.

I, Sandra Thomas, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I was employed by Wal-Mart, Inc. in the Norman, Oklahoma Supercenter from April 26, 1999 to August 26, 2000. I am female.

3. I was hired at a wage of $6.15 per hour as a claims manager. I was told by Mike Butts and Stephen Butts that they were hired at the same time that I was, but were paid $8.00 per hour. Based on what Mike and Steve Butts told me, I complained several times to Jack Scott, Co-Manager that I was paid $1.85 per hour less than both Mike Butts and Stephen Butts when I was doing similar work and neither of us had any retail experience prior to working at Wal-Mart experience. I did inventory control and kept books for years at other companies and Mike Butts told me he ran a forklift and stocked inventory at an office supply company for 8 - 9 months. Mike Butts earned $1.85 per hour more then I earned even though I was required to complete the monthly financial journals for his department because he did not know how to keep the journals. Eventually, about 6 months after using the Open Door policy and complaining to Mr. Scott on several occasions, my wage was increased by $1.25 per hour to $7.40 an hour. Then after my performance evaluation for 2002 I received another increase of $0.61 to bring me to $8.01 an hour.

5. Although my pay was increased to $8.01 per hour after I complained, I was then singled out as a "troublemaker" for having complained. Specifically, Mr. Scott took away my assistant, Sally, who was assigned to my department to help process claims for returned and damaged merchandise. I was her supervisor and I was responsible for the entire department. When Sally was moved from my department, my work load increased dramatically. The merchandise to be returned for credit or damaged merchandise started accumulating in large piles. Mr. Scott and Assistant Manager Mark told me that if I was not able to handle the work they would get someone who could handle it. They indicated they did not care how I did it, I was to just get the work done whether or not I followed procedures. It was unheard of to have one person in the claims department in a store that large and it made it impossible for me to keep up with the amount of work to be completed. I was trained by a friend of Jack Scotts, 30 year veteran of Wal-Mart, whose name I cannot remember, who told me Supercenters always had at least two people in claims.

6. After being harassed on a daily basis about getting the work done and watching it pile up I told them to get someone else to do it and I would do inventory control. After three days of working inventory control I was told I would be responsible for unloading the trucks in the evening. I knew it would be physically damaging for me to do that kind of heavy work, so I quit rather then risk injury.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Oklahoma that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 18, 2003, in Washington, Oklahoma.

I, VICKI THORNTON, declare:

1. I worked for Wal-Mart at the Racine, Wisconsin Supercenter from 1998 to 2001. I am female.

2. I obtained a bachelor's degree in accounting from Parkside University in Kenosha, Wisconsin in 1982. Prior to applying for work with Wal-Mart in 1998, I worked for three years as the Store Manager at a Family Dollar Store. I earned $27,000/year and had seven employees reporting to me.

3. In August, 1998, when a new Wal-Mart store was opening in my community, I decided to look into whether there might be a career opportunity for me there. I interviewed with Bill Baumann, the Store Manager, and Matt McKee, an Assistant Manager. I told them of my background in retail, my college degree, and that I was looking for an opportunity to advance my career. I also told them that I preferred to be hired for a management position because I felt I had the background and experience to succeed, and that I wanted to move up in the company.

4. Store Manager Baumann offered me a position as Department Manager in Chemicals. Baumann promised me that I could enter the manager training program within six months of starting to work at Wal-Mart, but that I needed to start out as a Department Manager. Assistant Manager McKee also agreed that I should be able to enter the manager training program promptly. With the understanding that I would be moved into management within six months, I accepted the Department Manager job at a starting wage of $9.00/hour. I worked 7:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m., Monday through Friday.

5. Despite their promises, and despite the fact that my annual evaluations during my three years at Wal-Mart always recognized me for exceeding expectations, I did not advance at Wal-Mart. I was never allowed to join Wal-Mart's management training program.

6. I was successful as the Department Manager of the Chemicals Department. I was rated "above standard" on my 90-day evaluation and was given a 5% pay increase. After about five months on the job, Store Manager Baumann asked me move to the Produce Department. He said he thought it would be more of a challenge for me because I had never worked in food or grocery before. As Lead in the Produce Department, I learned my job quickly and performed well. However, after I had been on the job for a few weeks, I started experiencing sexual harassment from Produce Manager Donnie Gateley. He was constantly saying things to me like, "Can't you wear lower cut shirts?" "You have a nice ass." "Women are put on this earth for one thing. My wife isn't any good at it. Are you?" Or he would hold up a head of lettuce and say, "I've got a head for you." This was any every day thing. The very first day Gateley said these things to me I complained to Store Manager Baumann, but he did not do anything about it. The harassment continued over the next couple of months. I complained to Baumann nine or ten times. I also complained about it to Assistant Manager in Grocery Jeff [Last Name Unknown]. Jeff told me to "grin and bear it." I then complained again to Baumann, and told him what Jeff had said to me, and Baumann just repeated that I should "grin and bear it." To my knowledge, there was no investigation of my allegations of sexual harassment. It was only after I threatened to get a lawyer and sue Wal-Mart that they agreed to move me to another department. In about April, 1999, Store Manager Baumann moved me to Support Manager on the 3rd shift, which was the night shift. Donnie was allowed to keep his job. To my knowledge, he was never disciplined or coached for his conduct. Indeed, I am not aware that anyone in management ever even discussed it with him.

7. I was only Support Manager for a few weeks in 1999. I could not stay in that position either because I was subjected to sexual harassment again, this time by Ron West, the Manager of the Meat Department. He would ask me to come into the cooler with him because he "needed to be satisfied." This time, when I complained to Store Manager Baumann and District Manager Don Breuss, they moved me to a different department right away. However, again, I observed that West was allowed to keep his job. I became Department Manager in Dairy. Despite all these problems, I continued to perform well. On my first annual evaluation, I was rated as "exceeds expectations" and given another 5% raise. I never complained about the harassment to anyone higher up at Wal-Mart because Baumann and the District Manager said they would take care of it.

8. With each department move, I kept asking Store Manager Baumann, Co-Manager Dean DeBona, and Assistant Managers McKee, Ed Covey and Stewart Coffee to be admitted to the manager training program. Baumann and DeBona always told me that there were no openings in the program. However, I observed that new management trainees were always being assigned to our store and that male employees at the store were admitted to the program. For example, Zeke Radovanovic, a male Department Manager, was admitted to the program in January 2000.

9. I ran the Dairy Department for about a year. In the summer of 2000, I received another "exceeds expectations" performance evaluation and another 5% raise. Nonetheless, at about the same time, Store Manager Baumann moved me from Dairy and made me a stocker in Lawn and Garden. He left my pay alone, but he changed my title from Department Manager to Sales Associate. I objected to him that this was a demotion and definitely a move in the wrong direction. Baumann told me not to look it at that way, and that he "had other plans for me." Store Manager Baumann then gave the Dairy Department Manager position to Brian Frederickson. Brian had been running the Dairy Department for the year before I took over, but stepped down because he said it s too much pressure. Store Manager Baumann told me that Brian had asked for the position back and that is why he had to move me.

10. After about two months in Lawn and Garden, Store Manager Baumann moved me to Seasonal. There, I had Department Manager responsibilities, but my title was still Sales Associate. Baumann told me he would change my title back to Department Manager, but before he had a chance to do this, he was transferred to a Wal-Mart store in Arkansas. Store Manager Heather Nutini succeeded him. I told her that Baumann had been planning to restore my Department Manager title. She told me she was not going to do it. She refused to give me a reason. For the next nine months, Nutini moved me back and forth between Seasonal and cashier. For the next year, I applied for every Department Manager position that was posted, but I was only interviewed once.

11. In the summer of 2001, I again received a performance evaluation rating me as "exceeds expectations" along with another 5% raise. When I asked Store Manager Nutini in about June or July of 2001 whether there were any openings in the management training program and whether I could apply, she told me there were no openings. Just weeks later, I was told by a male employee in our store, Brian Yust, who was Department Manager in Frozen Foods, that he had been admitted to the program. He had been at Wal-Mart less time than I had. He told me that he had no prior grocery experience before coming to Wal-Mart, but wanted to get into a new profession. He had gotten all of his training from me and the other department managers.

12. I never saw any postings for openings in the management training program and I knew of no way to get admitted to the program other than through the Store Manager. I believe I was not admitted to the program because I am female. In all the time I was at the Racine Supercenter, I only saw one woman admitted to the training program – Beverly Graves. All the other trainees that I observed were male.

13. In June 2001, I became aware of this lawsuit and contacted the plaintiffs' lawyers because I believed that I had been excluded from the management training program based upon my gender. Less than two months later, on September 11, 2001 and with no prior warning whatsoever, I was paged to the office in the middle of my shift and terminated for "gross misconduct." Store Manager Nutini said I had "stolen time." She said that I had punched in about a half hour before the start of my shift several days earlier. I was terminated on the spot. The story was completely fabricated. This was two months to the day after I had contacted the lawyers for the sex discrimination lawsuit against Wal-Mart. I am very suspicious about the timing of my termination. I had, until then, had an excellent performance record. There was no factual basis for the allegation against me.

14. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Wisconsin that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 10, 2003, at Union Grove, WI.

I, Melodie Underwood, declare:

1. I am a female and a former employee of Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.

2. Prior to working at Wal-Mart, I had worked in retail. From approximately 1984 to 1988, I was a cashier at Super X Drugs. While I was employed at Super X Drugs, I was assigned management responsibilities when no manager was present at the store, and I was given management training. From approximately 1988 to 1995, I worked at the Dollar General store. I was hired as a cashier, but after approximately one year I was promoted to the position of Store Manager.

3. I began working for Wal-Mart in May 1999 as a Cashier at Wal-Mart store in Osage Beach, Missouri. When I applied for the job, I gave Wal-Mart a written recommendation from my supervisor at Super X Drugs, Store Manager Laura Ferguson. A true and correct copy of this recommendation is attached hereto as Underwood Exhibit A. Although I had experience in retail management, I was offered an entry-level position as a Cashier. I accepted the position with the intention of working my way up into management.

4. Soon after I began working at Wal-Mart, I told Head Customer Service Manager Mary Simpson that I wanted to become an Assistant Manager. She told me that there were lots of opportunities at Wal-Mart. Another Customer Service Manager conducted a ninety-day review of my job performance. At that review, I again expressed my interest in getting into Wal-Mart's assistant manager training program. Neither she nor Ms. Simpson told me what steps I should take to try to achieve my goal.

5. In approximately August 1999, I spoke with Assistant Manager Marcy Turner about my interest in becoming an Assistant Manager. Ms. Turner told me that I had what it took to become an Assistant Manager. Ms. Turner also told me that she began working for Wal-Mart fifteen years earlier and, at that time, Wal-Mart did not put women into management. She told me that even now, as a woman, I would need to work twice as hard as male employees to get promoted.

6. From approximately August 1999 until August or September 2000, I worked a part-time evening shift at Wal-Mart because I had a full-time job during the day as Store Manager of Farberware.

Farberware is a retail store that specializes in cooking equipment. From approximately August or September 2000 until November 2000, I worked a full-time evening shift at Wal-Mart, while I continued to work at Farberware during the day. I continued to work at Wal-Mart even though I had another job because I was extremely interested in becoming a manager at a Wal-Mart store.

7. In approximately April 2000, I received my first annual evaluation. I was rated "exceeds expectations." That is the highest rating that one can be given. I wrote on the evaluation that I wanted "to become part of the management team." A true and correct copy of the evaluation is attached hereto as Underwood Exhibit B.

8. The evaluation was conducted by Assistant Manager Melissa Callen. During the evaluation, I told Ms. Callen that I wanted to become an Assistant Manager with Wal-Mart and asked what I had to do. She told me to talk to the Store Manager. I took her advice and spoke with Store Manager Ron Kinnison about my interest in promoting into management. Mr. Kinnison told me that it would be possible, but that I had to learn two other front-end positions, Service Desk Associate and Customer Service Manager, and the sales floor positions. Despite the fact that I had repeatedly expressed interest in promoting into management, that was the first time anyone told me about those requirement. Mr. Kinnison also told me that I had the ability to be a manager.

9. Because of Mr. Kinnison's advice, I asked to be transferred to the other front-end positions. In approximately June 2000, I was transferred to the position of Customer Service Manager. While working as a Customer Service Manager, I learned the service desk responsibilities and supervised the cashiers, who were almost all women. On one occasion, I trained a male Assistant Manager Trainee on how to operate the service desk and the cash register.

10. In approximately November 2000, I transferred to a Wal-Mart store in Las Vegas, Nevada. I received a raise to bring my wages to the Las Vegas scale, but I was raised only to the "new hire" rate of $8.50.

11. I continued to work as a Customer Service Manager in Las Vegas. I did not receive any additional training when I transferred to the Las Vegas store. The work rules and procedures in Las Vegas store were the same as in Missouri where I had worked previously.

12. Almost as soon as I began working at the Las Vegas store, I told Store Manager Jay Mossell that I was interested in promoting into management. He told me that I would have to learn how to use the telxon machine, which is a hand-held computer used on the sales floor. As a result, I asked to be transferred to a position that would enable me to learn the telxon.

13. In November 2000, I was transferred to a clerk position in the Electronics Department. I took this position because I believed that I would be given the opportunity to be promoted into management if I learned the sales floor skills. The form showing that I was being transferred says that I was "moving to learn further the steps to becoming a department manager, moving later into management." A true and correct copy of this form is attached hereto as Underwood Exhibit C. In January 2001, I was promoted to the position of Furniture Department Manager.

14. In April 2001, while I was working as Furniture Department Manager, I received my second annual evaluation. Again, I was rated "exceeds expectations," the highest rating possible. I wrote on the evaluation that my goal was to get into the Assistant Manager Training Program. A true and correct copy of that evaluation, is attached hereto as Underwood Exhibit D. That evaluation is signed by Store Manager David Lorentz.

15. In late 2000, I attended a meeting at which the District Manager was present. I approached him and told him that I was interest in promoting into management. He did not respond.

16. On two occasions when I was working in the Las Vegas store, in December 2000 and June 2001, there were openings for support manager positions. I applied for the positions. On one occasion, I was interviewed by a female Assistant Manager who told me that I was a strong candidate. I was not interviewed the second time. One of the positions was filled by a man. I do not know who filled the position the second time. No one told me why I was not selected for the positions or what I needed to do to get promoted to Support Manager.

17. A man named Matt Ward was an Assistant Manager at the Las Vegas store at which I worked. Prior to becoming an Assistant Manager, Mr. Ward was in the military. To my knowledge, Mr. Ward did not have any retail experience prior to working at Wal-Mart. Mr. Ward was not required to work in the front-end positions or a sales floor position in order to hold the position of Assistant Manager.

18. On approximately June 12, 2001, I submitted a letter of resignation, stating that I would resign as of two weeks from the date of the letter. In the resignation letter, I explained that I had obtained an Assistant Manager Trainee position at K-Mart. I also wrote, "I have tried to get into this program with Wal-Mart for 2 years now without any luck. I regret to give you this notice but I have to look out for my future." A true and correct copy of my resignation letter is attached hereto as Underwood Exhibit E. No member of Wal-Mart management tried to discourage me from resigning. Instead, when Store Manager Dave Lorentz returned from vacation on June 19, 2001, he did not permit me to work until the end of my two weeks notice. Mr. Lorentz told me that I was being terminated immediately because I had taken a job with a competitor.

19. During the entire time I worked at Wal-Mart, I never saw an application for the Management Training Program or was told how to apply for the Management Training Program. I did everything I could think of to make my interest in promoting known to my managers, but it was not effective. Had I been promoted, I would not have resigned from Wal-Mart.

20. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Nevada that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 7, (month, day), 2003, at Las Vegas, NV. (city, state).

I, DAWN WHITE, declare:

1. I have worked for Wal-Mart for a total of about seven years in stores in Alabama, Florida and Georgia. I am female.

2. All the Wal-Mart stores I worked in had basically the same policies. They used the same employee handbook and the same computer systems. I did not have to repeat the orientation when I transferred from one store to another.

3. I was first hired by Wal-Mart in 1988. I took a break in my Wal-Mart employment in 1990 when my husband was transferred to Japan with the United States military. While we were in Japan, I worked as a sales clerk and cashier at the Army-Air Force Exchange Service store for one and a half years.

4. I resumed my employment at Wal-Mart, at the Fort Walton Beach, Florida, Supercenter, in September 1998. Since January 2001 I have worked at the Supercenter in Valdosta, Georgia. I was promoted from sales associate to Department Manager of the Pet Department in February 2001. Since August 2002 I have been Department Manager in Hardware.

5. I have been interested in a career at Wal-Mart ever since I was 16 years old, when I worked part-time in the Prattville, Alabama store. I first started to pursue my interest in management at the Valdosta store in early 2001. I spoke to every manager I could about wanting to get into management. In about April 2001, I mentioned it to the District Manager Michael Fendley one day when he was in the store for a quick inspection. A couple of days later, he came back to the store to interview me as a candidate for the Management in Training program. He told me that I seemed to know what I was doing as Department Manager and would be a good candidate for promotion to Assistant Manager but that I needed to be a Department Manager for at least 90 days before I could be considered for promotion to Assistant Manager.

6. I continued as Department Manager in Pets for more than a year. During that time, I did everything I could to increase my chances for promotion. I tried to get a mentor. Assistant Manager Janice Duncan was supposed to mentor me through the management mentor program, but she never did. I asked for training. Co-Manager Kevin Fullmer advised me to go to Linda [Last Name Unknown], the personnel training manager. She checked my CBLs and my Telxon and said that since everything was up to date there was nothing she could train me on. I asked Store Manager Harwell several times to help increase my readiness for promotion. Even though he spent a lot of time with male Department Managers, training them, he would not help me. I estimate he spent a total of two hours in my department from about July 2001 to about June 2002. He basically ignored me.

7. During that same time period, I was asked by Co-Manager Fullmer to train at least two men, Alan Scott Kent and Jason Reed, to prepare them to move up at Wal-Mart. Both men were in the management mentor program, which is, as I understand it, a preparatory stage for employees who want to enter the Management in Training program. I started training Alan Scott Kent in about January 2002. He had been at Wal-Mart less time than I had. He was made a Department Manager in about February 2002. After Kent was made a Department Manager, I observed that Store Manager Harwell worked with him in his department and continued to give him management training to prepare him to move up in the company.

8. In about January 2002, after I had been a Department Manager for almost a year, I spoke to Co-Manager Kevin Fullmer again about my possibly being promoted into management. He said he thought I was ready to be promoted but that I would need to speak to the Store Manager about it. When I spoke to Store Manager Harwell, he said I was not worthy of promotion and would never be management material. This was despite the fact that I have always gotten excellent evaluations.

9. I started training Jason Reed in about April 2002. Though Reed had been at the Valdosta store longer than I had, he was a recent high school graduate and did not have nearly as much retail experience as I did. He had been promoted to Department Manager of Grocery and Dry Goods, but he did not have a clue as to how to run his department. After Reed was made Department Manager, I observed that Store Manager Harwell worked with him in his department and continued to give him management training to prepare him to move up in the company.

10. In the spring of 2002 I was making only $7.59/hour. I became aware that Jason was making almost $2.00/hour more than me as a Department Manager, even though he had only about two years of experience to my six. He told me this in casual conversation. He said that he had bargained with Wal-Mart for a big raise when he became Department Manager because he deserved it if he was going to manage such a large department and because he needed more money because he was getting married.

11. Recently, in about January 2003, Wal-Mart posted an announcement in the Valdosta store that any employee who met certain qualifications could sign up to enter the Management in Training program. I would have been very interested in signing up, except for the fact that I did not meet one of the qualifications – that you had to be without any write-ups or other disciplinary measures for at least six months. Just before the announcement was posted, Assistant Manager Kelly Ivey gave me my first ever written warning. It was for using a light bulb count off the computer instead of physically counting all of them (there were many thousands). Even though it was pretty routine to use the computer count for items, like light bulbs, where there were thousands in stock -- in fact this practice was sanctioned by District Manager Michael Fendley – I was written up for doing it.

12. At this point, I am very disillusioned about opportunities for me at Wal-Mart. My original plan when I started working at the Valdosta store was to become an Assistant Manager quickly, then spend seven years in that position until my husband retired from the military. Then I would be ready to be promoted to Co-Manager, and I could become the main breadwinner in the family. This would give my husband a chance to follow his dreams and have the "fun" job for a change. Now all of that is down the tubes. My family will soon be relocating to North Dakota. I plan to take my experience and work somewhere else where they are willing to appreciate what I have to offer.

13. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in this Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Georgia that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 8, 2003 at Valdosta, GA.

I, DEANNA WILLARD, declare:

1. I worked for Wal-Mart for eight years, from September 1991 until October 1999. During this time, I worked at one store in Utah and three stores in Florida. My last store was in Tampa, Florida. I am female.

2. Before joining Wal-Mart, I had about five years of retail experience. I also completed almost two years of college courses toward an Associate of Arts degree at Weber State University in Ogden, Utah.

3 I started at Wal-Mart as a sales associate at the Layton, Utah, store in 1991. I worked in fabrics and men's wear, in the UPC office, and as a test scanner. In 1993, I moved with my family to Florida and continued to work as a Wal-Mart sales associate, first at a Wal-Mart store in Tampa, then at a Wal-Mart store in Bloomingdale, Florida. I worked in receiving and lawn and garden. I transferred to another Tampa store in late 1994 and worked in softlines processing and as a night stocker for about a year. Then I was promoted to Department Manager of Infants.

4. All of the Wal-Mart stores I worked in had the same policies. They used the same handbook and the same computer systems. I did not have to repeat the orientation when I transferred from one store to another. At the last store I worked in, in Tampa, Florida, we were given two trainings that I had not received at the other stores: one on sexual harassment and one discouraging us from joining a union.

5. I was interested in promotions at Wal-Mart from the very beginning. I indicated this interest on my 90-day evaluation as well as on several subsequent evaluations. My goal was to become at least an Assistant Manager. I started asking about the process for being trained to be an Assistant Manager at my first Wal-Mart store, where I spoke to Store Manager Gregg Scanlon about it in approximately 1992. He told me that I could be considered for the Management Training Program "soon" if I "kept up the good work." I asked Store Manager Al [Last Name Unknown] about entering management training at my first Tampa store in about 1993. He told me it would take awhile, but that I should keep working towards it. Shortly after I transferred to the second Tampa store in late 1994, I asked my supervisor, Night Receiving Manager Jennifer [Last Name Unknown], how to get into management training.

She told me I would have to be a Department Manager for awhile first, and that she would help me prepare for promotion. She was very supportive, and I was promoted to Department Manager of Infants in 1995. Shortly after that promotion, I asked Assistant Manager Dale Thompson how I could join management training. She also told me I would have to be a Department Manager for awhile first, and that she would help train me in anything I needed to help prepare me for promotion to the next step. She advised me to speak to Store Manager Rick Watkins about my desire for promotion to Assistant Manager.

6. Store Manager Watkins gave me a commendation and merit raise in October 1995 for making a significant improvement in the Infants department. I first spoke to him about my interest in Promotion around that same time. He told me it would be awhile before I could be considered. He did not provide any specific guidance nor indicate what I needed to do to ensure this promotion. In early 1996, Mr. Watkins asked me to accept the position of Department Manager of Domestics because, he said, the department "needed help." A few months later, he gave me another commendation and another merit raise for my outstanding performance in the Domestics Department. In August 1997, Mr. Watkins asked me move to Department Manager of Housewares. Again, he told ne it was because the department needed to be cleaned up and put into shape.

7. It was at about this time that I spoke to Mr. Watkins again about my interest in entering the Management Training Program and being promoted to Assistant Manager. I told him that I was very serious about my interest in moving up into management. I felt I had proved myself as a Department Manager and that it was time for me to be considered for the next step. He told me that there were a couple of male employees ahead of me in line for the program and that it would be about four months until there would be an opening for me. At about the same time, I also spoke to Assistant Manager Percy Weatherly and Assistant Manager Adam Cohen. Mr. Weatherly told me it would be up to Store Manager Watkins to make the decision. Mr. Cohen brushed me off by just starting to talk about something else. I also spoke to District Manager Dave Bonar about getting admitted to the Management Training Program. He told me I would have to go through Store Manager Watkins.

8. I compared notes with several other Department Managers who I knew were also interested in being promoted to Assistant Manager. Judy Blondell, Department Manager of Stationery, and Donna Webster, Department Manager of Housewares and then Foods, both told me that when they tried to get information about promotion to Assistant Manager they were ignored. Natasha [Last Name Unknown], Department Manager of Foods, told me that she had been told by a member of Wal-Mart management that an employee had to work as a department manager for at least year before being considered for the Management Training Program. Diane [Last Name Unknown], Department Manager of Men's Wear, told me that she had been told by an Assistant Manager that department managers had to work in every department in the store before being considered for the Management Training Program. Jerome [Last Name Unknown], Department Manager of Furniture, told me that Store Manager Watkins told him that he would only have to be a department manager for a few months before he could be promoted to Assistant Manager.

9. I watched as at least four men were admitted to the Management Training Program in the six months after I had spoken to Store Manager Watkins and he had told me that my turn would come in about four months. As best as I can recall, three of these were Terry McNeil, Robert Cook, Alan Talaski. McNeil had only been a cashier and a customer support manager before being promoted to the Management Training Program. He had no experience as a department manager. Mr. Cook had been Department Manager of Housewares before me. It was his wreck of a department that Store Manager Watkins sent me in to clean up.

10. In 1998, when I again asked Store Manager Watkins about being admitted to the training program, he said he didn't have time to talk to me about it. I asked him to get back to me when he did have time to talk about it. He never got back to me.

11. None of the managers that I spoke to about joining the Management Training Program ever told me of specific steps I needed to take in order to be accepted into the program. I had been a successful Department Manager for three years. I had expressed my interest in promotion to a number of Assistant Managers, and had repeatedly approached the Store Manager to discuss my interest in promotion. I had spoken with the District Manger about my wish for promotion. I was aware of no way to apply for the program, nor anything else I could do to be promoted to Assistant Manager. My understanding, based on my conversations with the Assistant Managers, the Store Manager and the District Manager, was that I simply had to wait until Store Manager Watkins deemed it the right time for me to enter the training program.

12. Before 1997, I had gotten excellent evaluations and frequent merit raises for my work at Wal-Mart. In 1997, when I started repeatedly expressing my ambition to Store Manager Watkins and requesting a promotion to Assistant Manager, everything changed for me at Wal-Mart. It seemed that I could do no right. Store Manager Watkins set unreasonable demands and treated me with disrespect, including yelling at me on the sales floor in front of other employees and customers. In about December 1997, I had an accident at the store and was injured. I worked in spite of the injury for almost a year, then took about three weeks off. I returned to work in December 1998 for a few more months, but I ultimately had to leave my employment at Wal-Mart for medical reasons.

13. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in this Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Georgia that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 11, 2003 at Land O'Lakes, FL.

Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ

DECLARATION OF JENNY WILLIAMS IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, JENNY WILLIAMS, declare:

1. I was employed at the Bradenton, Florida Wal-Mart from May 1995 until March 2000. While employed at Wal-Mart, I used the name Jenny Washington. I completed two years of college-level course work while I was in high school. I had more than a year of experience as a cashier before I applied to work at Wal-Mart in March 1995. I am female.

2. I was hired and placed as a sales associate in the Jewelry department making $5.15 per hour. I was subsequently moved around to different departments as a sales associate—housewares, stationery, back-to-school and seasonal. I also learned the front end.

3. During the busy Christmas season my first year at Wal-Mart, we were short-handed. I came in on my days off to help keep things in shape. During my shift, I was responsible for go-backs in housewares, small appliances, hardware, paint, stationery and toys. Upon customer request, I also had to cut fabric, mix paint, unlock the cologne cabinet and make keys in automotive. I also succeeded at the very cumbersome process of locating layaways by UPN code. After Christmas, I asked both Assistant Manager Derek Boswell and Store Manager Gerard Fruge for a raise. Boswell told me he thought I deserved it but that they did not have money in the budget for it. Fruge told me he did not think I deserved a raise. I did not get one.

4. I know of at least one male employee who was hired in at a higher pay rate than what I was making and who got a raise during that Christmas season. His name was Shawn Quail. He was hired in Day Receiving in November 1995. One day around Christmas he told me that he was going to get his first raise "next week." I remarked that I was surprised because he had not been there 90 days yet, and usually you had to wait that long to get a raise. Shawn told me that Store Manager Fruge had told him he was going to get his raise early because he was doing such a good job running the forklift. Shawn told me he was going to be making $6.50 or $7.00 per hour. I complained to Assistant Manager Boswell that it was not fair for Shawn to be making more than I was and to be getting a raise so soon after he started working at Wal-Mart. I argued that I had been working there at least six months longer than Shawn and had more responsibility, but I had yet to get my first raise and I should not be making at least a dollar less per hour than Shawn was. Boswell responded that giving raises was Store Manager Fruge's decision and there was nothing he could do about it. It was not until May 1996, at the time of my first annual evaluation, that I got a 35 cent per hour raise to $5.50/hour.

5. During my first year at Wal-Mart, as my knowledge and skills increased, I became more ambitious and decided to pursue a long-term career with Wal-Mart. I told Assistant Manager Derek Boswell that I wanted to work my way up to Department Manager, then to Assistant Manager, and eventually to Store Manager. He was very encouraging. He told me to just keep on doing the great job I was doing and "one day it would happen" for me. I continued to expand my knowledge of the store by working in different departments, including men's wear, front end, impulse, claims, receiving, and bakery, and had a very thorough understanding of the functioning of the store. I always got good evaluations.

6. For over a year, I talked to Assistant Manager Boswell very frequently about my desire to get promoted. He continued to be encouraging, but he said it was not his decision. I spoke to Store Manager Fruge about it eight or nine times during the same period. But he just brushed me off. In August 1996 we got a new store manager, Arthur Keeley. I started asking him right away about getting a raise and about getting promoted. He told me he would have to watch me work for a while to get a sense of my abilities and performance.

7. In February 1997, Store Manager Keeley gave me a 25-cent merit raise and a 50-cent regular raise. My pay was raised to $6.25/hour starting with my first paycheck in March 1997. At my two-year evaluation in May 1997 my pay was raised another 25 cents per hour to $6.50. Then in July 1997, I got promoted to Department Manager of Greeting Cards. Store Manager Keeley said I would have to wait 30 days before I got the raise that went along with this promotion. When I asked him about the raise again after 30 days, he told me the rules had changed, and I would have to wait 90 days. Unfortunately, he was transferred out of the store before I got the raise.

8. Our next store manager was O'Neal Clark. He transferred me to impulse in September 1997, but I was no longer a Department Manager. At the same time, our store was being upgraded to be a Supercenter. I spoke to Store Manager Clark about my desire for promotion to Assistant Manager at least three or four times during the year he was at our store. He told me that from what he could see I was doing a great job, but that promotion recommendations had to come from the Assistant Managers and Co-Managers. In September 1998, he promoted me back to Department Manager, but he never promoted me to Assistant Manager.

9. It was very frustrating to see new male employees hired into the store, being paid higher starting wages than I was making as an experienced employee, being given raises quicker than I got them, and sometimes being promoted faster than I was. For example, Richard (Richie) Lundquist was hired in June 1997 as a sales associate in grocery. He had about the same amount of experience as I did (he had been working at a grocery store before coming to work for Wal-Mart). Richie bragged to me about how much he was making, which was several dollars an hour more than I was being paid. About three months after Richie was hired, he was promoted to Department Manager and given a raise. I know this because Richie frequently talked about it in front of me with other male employees such as Frank Luther, Jeff [Last Name Unknown] and Charles Morris. About a year after that, Richie was promoted to Manager of Grocery and he got another raise. Again, I know this because he talked about it in front of me with his friends at the store. Later in 1998, Richie was transferred to the general merchandise part of the store (he told me this was because he wanted to learn about other parts of the store because the Store Manager was preparing him for promotion to management) and became Department Manager of Stationery for awhile and then was moved to Department Manager of Chemicals. In April 2000, Richie entered the manager training program and then became an Assistant Manager at our store several months later. Richie was given these promotions and raises despite the fact that his work was not always up to Wal-Mart expectations. For example, after Richie was transferred from stationery to chemicals, I was moved from impulse to stationery by Co-Manager Vince Bower and Assistant Manager Sam [Last Name Unknown]. I asked Sam why I was being moved to stationery, especially after I had succeeded in significantly reducing the shrink from the impulse and high theft items. Sam replied that Co-Manager Vince Bower and Assistant Manager Frank Caffrey knew that Richie was screwing up in stationery and they needed to get him out of that department because inventory was coming up. They needed somebody to clean up stationery and that is why I was transferred to that department.

10. Another example of a male employee who was promoted to Assistant Manager who had less experience than me is Charles Morris. He had been hired at the Bradenton store about the same time I was. He was in maintenance–the floor shine man. In July 1997, he was promoted from maintenance to Department Manager of Paper Goods and Chemicals. He had no experience whatsoever on the floor, stocking shelves, ordering and checking in merchandise, updating prices, helping customers, or any of the other things required to run a department. I was asked to and had to train him on these many tasks because he had no idea how to do the job. He knew nothing about our labeling system, the Telxon, the Wal-Mart "Smart" system, or anything else. After about two months he was made Department Manager of Grocery when the store converted to a Supercenter. Then, before the end of 1998, he was promoted again, this time to Assistant Manager. Even though I knew much more than he did about how to run a department and many other things about Wal-Mart, he got promoted and I did not. I complained to Assistant Manager Sam [Last Name Unknown], to Assistant Manager Derek Boswell and to District Manager Joe Crider. Joe Crider told me he would have to check with my managers about why I was not being promoted. He later told me that my managers had told him I was not being promoted because my performance was not up to par and they did not think I was ready for it.

11. The Bradenton store was a training store, which meant that management trainees were sent there to learn about various aspects of running a Wal-Mart store. There were usually four 13-week training sessions every year. Each training session enrolled between six and 15 manager trainees. During the two and a half years I worked at the Bradenton store after it became a Supercenter, I saw no more than three women come through to be trained. I was never permitted to apply for the training program.

12. I left Wal-Mart in March, 2000. I am now an Assistant Manager at a Dollar Tree store. I love my job and would not trade it for anything. My talents in retail have finally been recognized and appreciated.

13. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Florida that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April the 9th, 2003 at Palmetto Florida.

I, Lorie Williams, declare

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. While employed by Wal-Mart, I have also used the name Lorie Waldrop. Prior to my employment with Wal-Mart I worked briefly as a cook. I graduated from a two-year vocational school in 1986 and received a certificate in accounting. I started working for Wal-Mart in 1991. I was 26 years old. When I began working with Wal-Mart, I hoped to have a steady and stable career.

3. I began working for a Wal-Mart Store in Collierville, Tennessee in May 1991 as a part-time sales associate in Electronics making $4.35 an hour. Within a few months, I began working full-time in Night Receiving. I worked in Night Receiving until I went out on maternity leave in March 1993. When I returned from maternity leave, I went to Electronics as a sales associate.

4. While I was working as a support manager in 1995, Store Manager Wes Grab regularly pulled me and female Assistant Manager Renee Hall aside to criticize us. He often told us we were worthless and no good at our jobs. I never saw Store Manager Grab pull aside male employees to admonish them in this manner. I told Co-Manager Brenda Haynes about these incidents and she recommended I speak with District Manager Richard Wezner. I spoke with Mr. Wezner and he told me he would look into it and get back to me. I never heard from him about these incidents again. After having spoken with two members of management with no response, I felt the open door had closed.

5. In 1996, I became the front end manager. With no training, I was single-handedly responsible for hiring door greeters, cart pushers, over sixty new cashiers, and preparing the entire Front End in order to transition the Collierville Wal-Mart into a Supercenter. Almost immediately, Co-Manager Doug Ayerst and new Store Manager Robert Hayes (he replaced Wes Grab in 1996) began criticizing the way in which I was managing the front end. They repeatedly complained to me about problems in the front end but did not give me any practical management advice and often gave inconsistent instructions. Store Manager Hayes once told me that the problem was that there were "too many damn women in the front end." On another occasion, Store Manager Hayes and Co-Manager Jim Belcoff pulled me aside to tell me that I needed to "whiten up [the staff of] the front end." Both of these statements seemed to indicate that they wanted me to stop hiring women and African-American cashiers. When I asked why, they indicated that the staff was "intimidating" to the clientele. I tried to explain that I did not believe this was true and that I was hiring the individuals whom I believed were the most qualified applicants. They were unresponsive.

6. In 1996, while I was front end manager, Store Manager Hayes promoted Robert Beck from bakery manager to assistant manager over the Front End. Mr. Beck had no experience with hiring, scheduling, staff management, or working with cash registers, yet he was supposed to be my direct supervisor and supervisor over the entire front end. I had to train him. Eventually, I ended up completing his responsibilities because he was unable to do them. I completed all the hiring, pay raises, scheduling, associate evaluations, customer service, and other management tasks. Undertaking both sets of responsibilities was exhausting and extremely frustrating for me and I felt I was not receiving any management support for my efforts. At one point, Store Manager Hayes warned me that if any cashiers were caught selling alcohol after hours or on Sundays, he would make sure I went to jail with them. I spoke with Store Manager Hayes and Co-Manager Ayerst about my concerns but they gave me no advice or assistance and continued to complain about problems in the front end. Shortly thereafter, in 1997, I decided to step down. I transferred to a support manager position for a few months, and then as an associate in the Cash Office.

7. In 1996 and 1997, while I was front end manager and while I worked in the Cash Office, I had access to payroll data. I observed that a woman associate, Libby Goff, earned less than at least three male associates even though she had been with Wal-Mart for several years longer than any of them. They were Jim Stewart, James Gibson, and Gary Lewis. I had been told during the hiring process, during orientation by Personnel Manager Jane Switzer, and by management during all of my evaluations that I could be fired for discussing salary issues so I did not reveal this information to anyone.

8. In 1997, I was promoted to photo lab manager. I was recently divorced and alone in caring for my four-year old daughter. I believed this salaried position would provide us the stability that we needed. As a result, I agreed to leave my daughter for two weeks in order to go to a mandatory training in Bentonville, Arkansas. I hoped these efforts would demonstrate my commitment to Wal-Mart and assist in obtaining the management support necessary for this position. I was wrong.

9. As soon as I started in the position, Store Manager Hayes and Co-Manager Ayerst began undermining my authority over the photo lab associates, and even customers. There were several times when I made management decisions concerning photo lab employees but Store Manager Hayes refused to back me up and I was left completely unsupported. In addition, when customers would request illegal copies of copyrighted photographs, I would decline but Co-Managers Belcoff and Ayerst and Store Manager Hayes would disregard my decision, and the law, in order to give them copies. On occasion, a photo machine would fall into disrepair and despite doing all I could, including fixing some machines myself, calling the correct technical support, and sending away for parts, Co-Manager Ayerst would yell at me about the broken machines. I received no support for my management decisions and was constantly criticized for even the most minor decisions that I did make, such as the orderliness of the camera/camcorder displays and the neatness of the floor (something for which the floor crew was mainly responsible). I spoke with the District Manager of the Photo Department Kelly [last name unknown] but she was not helpful. She never gave me any direct advice or information about ways in which I might be able to improve the department or fix any of the machines. At one point, Store Manager Hayes and Co-Manager Ayerst said, "This is our store" and that the District Manager of the Photo Department, Kelly, had no authority over anything. Due to a lack of management support, I stepped down from this position in 1998. A male employee, Kenneth Bartosiewicz, was hired off the street to replace me.

10. In 1998, I agreed to accept a sales associate position in the Tire Lube Express (TLE) department. I was determined to work hard and succeed in this male-dominated area. I worked for three years handling the register, doing customer service behind the counter, putting up stock, as well as changing tires and completing oil changes. In my entire time in the TLE department, I never saw more than four or five women working in this 20-person department. Most of the women were behind the counter. I was one of two women who worked in the service department.

11. Throughout my time at Wal-Mart, all my evaluations were rated "Meets Expectations" or "Exceeds Expectations."

12. In 2000, I witnessed TLE Manager Joyce Moody receive abuse and mistreatment from District Manager of TLE James Harsden. He would constantly check up on her whereabouts, he made critical comments about her medical problems, and generally talked to her and about her with resentment and anger. I did not know why he had such a bad attitude toward Ms. Moody. Shortly thereafter, Ms. Moody transferred to a Wal-Mart store in another state. Male Dale Brechin, who had previously been a service technician, was promoted to her position when she left. I was afraid to report this mistreatment because after all that I had experienced, I feared retaliation and believed that I might be the next target.

13. I had originally been very interested in advancing into a management career at Wal-Mart. However, I observed, and I had been told by several members of management, that relocation was required for entry into the management training program. Because I was caring for a young child, mostly on my own, this was not a possibility for me. This was the main deterrent to pursuing entry into the management training program.

14. I resigned in April 2001 while out on medical leave for diabetes. I now care for my daughter full-time.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Tennessee that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 4, 2003 at Moscow, Tennessee.

DECLARATION OF KAREN WILLIAMSON IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Karen Williamson, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I am 52 year old woman who worked as a sales associate in the Pleasanton, California Wal-Mart store from September 1995 until October 1999. At the time I joined Wal-Mart, I had prior experience working at Safeway as a deli clerk and for a retail establishment "Treasures and Tyme." I worked in a number of departments in the Pleasanton store including shipping and receiving, infants, boys and girls, electronics, housewares, and stationery. I did not request or apply for any of these transfers. Each time I was moved to a different department, the Store Manager merely informed me of the change.

3. I wanted to become a department manager and possibly move on from there with a career at Wal-Mart. However, there was no formal application process to express my interest in promotion. Instead, I spoke with the Store Managers and Assistant Managers about my desire for promotion. Twice I wrote letters to Store Manager, Lou Malmborg, expressing my wish for promotion. After I sent the first letter, Store Manager Malmborg denied reading it. Store Manager Malmborg acknowledged receipt of the second letter, but brushed aside my interests, indicating that there were no openings at that time. Store Manager Malmborg never provided to me any information about the process of receiving promotions, never told me of the Management Training Program, and never indicated there were any other routes that I could follow to become a manager at Wal-Mart.

4. Sometimes, promotional opportunities were posted but frequently the promotions were determined before there was an opportunity to even apply. For example, the Foods Department Manager position was posted; and I applied, but the very next day a male associate John Shoe was given the position. I was never interviewed for the position nor was I aware of anyone else being interviewed. Other times, the position was just not posted at all. For example, when the position of Department Manager for Health and Beauty Aids Department was open, it was never posted, and so I could not apply. I would have very much liked the opportunity to compete for this position, as I am a licensed cosmetologist. I applied on the computer-based system for at least one position and was told at the completion of the application process that I had met the preliminary qualifications and a manager would contact me. I was never contacted and received no follow-up as a result of this application at all.

5. I recall a co-worker nicknamed "Jimbo" [last name unknown] was given a promotion to Sporting Goods Department Manager. I heard Assistant Manager Tim Costa tell another manager, Mike Gallardo that it was necessary to give a promotion to Jimbo, as he had just had a baby and needed the money. I never heard any similar concerns for working mothers expressed by any member of management.

6. While I was employed at Wal-Mart, two male sales associates, Eddy Hon Ng and Reuben Rodriguez, were earning more money than I for no apparent reason other than my gender. Eddy and I were hired at or around the same time and he was paid a higher salary than I, although I had prior experience in retail and in the grocery industry. Reuben Rodriguez earned a higher salary than I, although he was hired months after I had been hired and at one point left the company for a period of time. When he returned, he earned a higher salary as a sales associate despite the fact that I had been an employee of Wal-Mart continuously and for a longer period of time.

7. I found that the Open Door did not work and resulted in retaliation. I used the Open Door and spoke to Assistant Manager Chuck and on another occasion to Store Manager Lou Malmborg about the demeaning manner in which Assistant Manager Deborah spoke to me and others. I understood that my concern would be held in confidence but I do not believe it was. Very soon after speaking with the managers, Deborah began treating me much worse, and soon thereafter gave me written discipline. I also tried using the Open Door without any success by contacting the District Manager after I was terminated. I drove to the offices of District Manager John Scantlin and left a note for him, and, receiving no response, telephoned him two or three times. Wal-Mart's Sundown Rule, about which all employees are trained from their first day, requires that all phone calls from employees or customers be returned on the same day before sundown. After a delay of perhaps three weeks, District Manager Scantlin finally returned my call and said he would look into the circumstances of which I complained. I never heard from him again.

8. If I could be confident that I would not face gender discrimination, I would be interested in applying for management training at Wal-Mart.

I declare under penalty of perjury that the foregoing is true and correct. Executed on 4-3-2003, 2003, at Oroville, CA.

I, Jan Wolsleger, declare:

1. I am a female from Toquerville, Utah. I worked for Wal-Mart from November 1996 until September 2001 and began working again for Wal-Mart in January 2003.

2. When I first started working for Wal-Mart, I had a history of retail management experience, including supervisory experience at Sav-On Drugs and owning and operating my own crafts store.

3. I was hired at the Wal-Mart Store in American Fork, Utah in November 1996 as the Department Manager of crafts and fabrics. In approximately February 1997, I joined the SWAS (store within a store) team, a salaried position. As a SWAS Team Member, I traveled from store to store all over the western half of the country remodeling Wal-Mart stores. Each store I helped remodel was set up in a similar fashion. I remodeled stores for approximately a year and nine months, until I joined the Management Training Program in November of 1998.

4. I entered the Management Training Program at the Wal-Mart store in St. George, Utah. When I entered the program, Store Manager Mark Neighbors told me that Wal-Mart started all Manager Trainees at the same rate of pay, and once trainees completed the program, all trainees began their Assistant Manager positions at the same rate of pay as well. I relied on this representation, and believed there was no point in attempting to negotiate a higher salary.

5. When I completed the Management Training Program in January 1999, I became an Assistant Manager at the St. George store where I had trained. As a new Assistant Manager, I was paid approximately $25,500 per year. By December 2000, I was making $29,500 per year.

6. Dan Behymer, a male, began the Management Training Program in December 2000. Unlike me, Mr. Behymer had no retail experience prior to working at Wal-Mart. As a Management Trainee, Wal-Mart paid him over $30,000 per year. When he completed the program in March 2001, he was paid a salary of over $42,000 per year, $16,000 more than the salary Wal-Mart paid me when I became an Assistant Manager and $12,000 more than I was currently making after nearly two years in the position.

7. I was alerted to Mr. Behymer's larger salary because he insisted on telling me what Wal-Mart was paying him. He also told me that I was "being screwed" in my compensation by Wal-Mart. As a result of this unfair discrepancy I later confronted my Store Manager, Mr. Neighbors, who confirmed that the pay discrepancy indeed existed.

8. In September 2001, I gave Mr. Neighbors my notice that I would be ending my employment with Wal-Mart. I told him that I disagreed with the way that Wal-Mart paid newer male Assistant Managers more money than I was paid. Mr. Neighbors told me that I needed to sell myself better. I reminded him that he was the one who told me that Wal-Mart paid all beginning Assistant Managers the same wage. He responded again by saying, that I had needed to sell myself better to him. He did not deny that newer male Assistant Managers were paid more, nor did he offer any justification for the discrepancy. He did not suggest that I did not work as hard or that I did not have equal competence.

9. On my last day of work in September 2001, I spoke with District Manager Sean Evans for over an hour about my decision to leave Wal-Mart. I told Mr. Evans that I was sick of the men being paid more than me while doing the same job. He told me that neither he nor Mr. Neighbors had the authority to give me a raise. He did not deny that the male Assistant Managers, even those with less experience than me, were being paid more than me. He did not suggest that there was any legitimate reason for this discrepancy. Then, after several more minutes of discussion, he said, "I guess I could offer you $36,000" to stay. This was still less then the men were making. This offer also exposed Mr. Evans' untruthfulness to me just minutes before when he told me he could not control the salaries of assistant managers. I told Mr. Evans I had made up my mind and left.

10. After I left Wal-Mart in September 2001, I worked for several months as an Assistant Manager at Michael's Arts & Crafts store. In January 2003, when I was no longer working at Michael's Arts & Crafts store, District Manager Evans asked me to come back to Wal-Mart as an Assistant Manager. I accepted his offer and returned to the St. George Wal-Mart store, because there were not many retail management jobs available in my area. When I started again at Wal-Mart in January 2003, there were nine male assistant managers and only one other female assistant manager in my store. Currently, as of April 2003, there are a total of three female Assistant Managers, including me, and one male Assistant Manager in my store. The store manager has always been male. I still do not make as much money as Mr. Behymer made when he began working at Wal-Mart as an Assistant Manager.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Utah that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 3, 2003, at 5:00 PM.

DECLARATION OF WEI WU-EMMERT IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Wei Wu-Emmert, declare:

1. I am a woman and a former Wal-Mart employee.

2. I began working for Wal-Mart in approximately October 1994 as a Department Manager of Accessories, Lingerie, Sleepwear and Socks, in a Wal-Mart store in Oxford, Ohio. At that time, I was a graduate student at Miami University of Ohio. I was scheduled to receive a master's degree in clothing retail in December of that year.

3. Over many years, I had developed an interest in clothing retail. I worked as the office manager of the Beijing branch of United Colors of Benetton, where I was responsible for assisting the manager of the Beijing Branch. I also received a Bachelor of Science degree in fashion design from the Chinese Textile University in Shanghai, China. I left China, where I am from, and emigrated to the United States to learn about the business side of retail.

4. When I interviewed for the job at Wal-Mart, I told Store Manager Kevin Nolen that I was interested in working in retail management, described my education and work experience, and asked what the best position for me would be. He replied that I should take a job as a Department Manager. Based on the Store Manager Nolen's advice, I accepted an hourly position as a department manager.

5. After starting to work at Wal-Mart, I became very excited about working for that company. At store meetings, I heard many managers report that they had begun working as hourly Wal-Mart employees. I was impressed with these reports and thought that I, too, would be able to promote into management.

6. As scheduled, I received my master's degree in December 1994. More than four years later, in February 1999, I resigned from Wal-Mart because I had not been promoted into management.

7. During the four years that I worked for Wal-Mart, I held the positions of Department Manager, Customer Service Manager, and Cash Office employee. I received four annual evaluations from Wal-Mart. On each of these evaluations I was rated either "above standard" or "outstanding."

8. On many occasions, I told Wal-Mart managers that I wanted to be promoted into management. While working in the Oxford, Ohio store, I told Store Manager Kevin Nolen and Store Manager

Chris Hagemeier. I also told the District Manager, whose name I do not recall. Invariably, I received the same response. They praised my work, encouraged me to keep working hard, and told me that there would be opportunities in the future. Not once did any Wal-Mart manager approach me and offer me an opportunity to promote into management. No manager ever told me what I could do to get promoted or how to apply for a management position.

9. On two occasions, in approximately 1995 or 1996, I sent my resume to the Home Office in Bentonville, Arkansas. Because I am from China, I thought that I might have better luck if I applied for a position in Wal-Mart's International Division. In response, I was offered an hourly position, paying approximately $7.00 per hour. I declined the position because I wanted to be promoted into management, not to continue working as an hourly employee.

10. When I was working in the Jonesboro, Arkansas store, I told the Assistant Manager who supervised me that I wanted to be promoted into management. I remember this conversation because I had received a coaching for parking in the wrong place. The store had recently begun enforcing a rule about where employees could park, but I was not aware of that. I told the Assistant Manager that I did not think that I deserved the coaching, and asked that the coaching be removed from my file. I specifically explained that I wanted the coaching to be removed because I was interested in promoting into management. The Assistant Manager did not encourage my interest in management, nor did he give me any information about qualifications or how to apply.

11. I worked in the Cash Office in three different Wal-Mart stores in three states: Ohio, New York and Arkansas. In each store, almost all of the cash office employees with whom I worked were women. I did not receive any new training when I transferred from a store in Ohio to a store in New York, or to a store in Arkansas. Training was not necessary because the procedures used in each of the cash offices were the same.

12. At the time that I resigned from Wal-Mart, I was earning $8.10 per hour. I believe that I earned about $14,000 annually.

13. After I resigned from Wal-Mart, I returned to school to study for a second master's degree, this time in computer science. I decided to change my career from clothing retail to the computer field because working at Wal-Mart discouraged me about my prospects for building a career in retail management. Being new to the United States, I assumed that other retailers were just like Wal-Mart and would not promote women into management. I am very career-oriented and did not want to remain as an hourly employee. I feel that I wasted four years working at Wal-Mart. I presently work for Federal Express as a programmer analyst. I earn an annual salary of $54,000.

14. I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Tennessee that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 10th (month and day), 2003, at Memphis Tennessee (city and state).

DECLARATION OF DETRIX YOUNG IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Detrix Young, declare:

1. I make this statement on the basis of my personal knowledge, and, if called as a witness, could and would testify competently to the facts herein.

2. I was employed by Wal-Mart, Inc. from June 1991 until August 2000. I am female. I have never been disciplined, and I received good evaluations.

3. I was hired by Wal-Mart as a cashier at a store in Aiken, South Carolina. I also helped in various departments, primarily to stock goods.

4. After a few months, the head Customer Service Manager ("CSM") began giving me additional responsibilities. I made change for the cashiers, relieved cashiers when they took breaks, and occasionally relieved a CSM when she needed a break. I observed that most of the cashiers and CSMs were women.

5. Sometime in 1992 or 1993, I wrote that I wanted become a Customer Service Manager ("CSM") at the bottom of one of my evaluations. By that time, I was already doing many of the duties of a CSM, but I was still being paid at the rate of a cashier. I was eager to move up in the company and hoped to have a long and successful career with Wal-Mart.

6. In 1995, I moved to a Supercenter in Aiken, South Carolina because Wal-Mart closed the old store.

7. Shortly after the new store opened, Ms. Donna Washington [nee Brown], who was the head CSM, approached me and told me that there was a CSM position opening. Ms. Washington asked whether I wanted the position. The position was not posted and I did not complete an application for it. Ms. Washington told me I would get a $.50 increase within ninety (90) days, and I said that I was interested. A short time later, she gave me a black book about how to do the job of a CSM and said that I had the job. I was given a badge identifying me as the Customer Service Manager, keys and a supervisor card, and then I shadowed another CSM for a few days to train. I assumed the additional responsibilities of the CSM position, but never received the promised raise. I inquired of Ms. Washington several times, and each time she merely promised to look into the problem with Mr. Ronnie Hill, the Store Manager, but I heard nothing later. Eventually, I just gave up asking.

9. Sometime in 1998, I wrote on my evaluation that I would like to be promoted to Support Manager. (Attached hereto as Young Exhibit A is a true and correct copy of my 1998 performance evaluation.) I had overheard someone say that the position would be open, so I put it on the evaluation to show my interest. The Assistant Manager at the time, Kevin Stallings, told me during my evaluation that he would look into it. Later, the position of Support Manager became available and was posted in the breakroom. I signed my name to the list of people who were interested in applying. By that time, I had been with the company for seven years and had worked in nearly every department. I was very familiar with the store and the procedures, and I was willing to work at any time, any hour. I really wanted to move up with this company. Despite talking to my Assistant Manager and putting my name on the list, I was never even interviewed. Instead, they promoted a male named John Cooper who had less seniority, less experience, and had not put his name on the list in the breakroom. John Cooper was promoted by the Store Manager, Mr. Glen Flory, with whom he was friendly.

10. Sometime in 1998 or 1999, I attended a store-wide meeting mandated by Home Office in Bentonville, Arkansas where all the store employees are encouraged to raise concerns and issues with management. At that meeting a woman, whose name I believe was Kathleen McDonald asked why the men made more than the women. One of the male Assistant Managers responded that men are working as the heads of their households, while women are just working for the sake of working. A male Support Manager named Lee [Last Name Unknown] just laughed and did not try to correct the statement. I knew that several of the women who worked at Wal-Mart were single mothers. After I heard that, I decided that I had had enough and that I would give up trying to advance and stay with Wal-Mart long term.

11. In 1999, I found out that a male employee made more than I did, even though I had been there longer. Specifically, one day when I picked up my check, I saw the check of a man named Floyd Anderson. He was working as a stocker in grocery making nearly $2 an hour more than I was, but he had only been there two years, at most. Again, I felt that as a woman, I could not go far with this company.

12. I gladly would have enrolled in the management training program had I been given the opportunity. I was flexible and available to work, and I wanted to move into management. However, I was never given the chance.

13. After being passed over for Support Manager and listening to comments about why women get paid less, I decided that I did not have a fair chance to advance with Wal-Mart. Therefore, I left company in August of 2000.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of South Carolina that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 7, 2003, at New Clinton, SC.

I, Tamara Zumbrun, declare:

1. I am a female employee at the Wal-Mart Store in Mountain Home, Idaho. I began working at Wal-Mart in July, 2000. When I applied for the Management Training Program as a result of the January 2003 solicitation of applicants, I was told that there were additional, previously undisclosed requirements that barred me from qualification. I have experienced sexual harassment and retaliation for using the Open Door at Wal-Mart.

2. From the time I applied at Wal-Mart, I was interested in becoming a part of Wal-Mart management. I wrote on my application that I was interested in management positions. See Tamara Zumbrun's Application Supplement, a true and correct copy hereto attached as Exhibit A. In addition, I told Assistant Manager Eric Wright (male) during my first interview that I was interested in a position as department manager and that I had interest in other management positions. In my second interview, I told Co-Manager Steve Payne (male) that I was interested in management positions.

3. My first job at Wal-Mart was to help with store setup, because the Mountain Home store had not yet opened. After setup was complete, I became an overnight stocker.

4. In October 2000, I received my 90-day performance evaluation from Assistant Manager Skip Davis (male). I told Mr. Davis during this evaluation that I wanted to join management.

5. In January, 2001, I applied for a position as team lead for ICS with the hope that the position would lead to an opportunity to join the Management Training Program. Assistant Manager Skip Davis conducted the interview. He asked several gender-specific questions, including, "Being a female, what makes you more qualified for this job than a male employee?" In addition, I was told by Skip Davis that the ICS staff is mostly male and they might have a problem with a female boss. For over an hour, Mr. Davis required me to justify why he should give the promotion to a female instead of a male. Then he a chose a male employee, Tony Whitten, for the position.

6. In February, 2001, I transferred to a cashier position. Co-Manager Steve Payne was my supervisor. Mr. Payne did not address female employees by their first names. Instead, he referred to female employees, including me, as "Babe," "Baby Doll," or "Baby." In contrast, he addressed male employees by their first names.

7. One night when Mr. Payne referred to a female co-worker as "Babe," I told him that his comment offended me. Mr. Payne only rolled his eyes and walk away.

8. I tried to use the Open Door to address my concerns of gender discrimination and sexual harassment. I contacted Assistant Manager Don Grist in September 2001, to again raise my concerns about Mr. Payne's sexual harassment and Mr. Davis' gender-specific questions. I told Mr. Grist that every time Mr. Payne talks to a female employee, he calls her "Babe," "Baby-Doll," or "Baby." Mr. Grist said that someday Mr. Payne would get in trouble for that, but did nothing to address the problem. I am unaware of any coaching or action taken as a result of my use of the Open Door. Mr. Payne and a co-worker Fred Hack (male) continued to call me and other females "Babe". Because the Open Door failed me, I began to look for an opportunity to move to another department.

9. Shortly after speaking to Assistant Manager Don Grist, I began receiving different treatment at Wal-Mart. I was disciplined for minor violations for which male employees were not ordinarily disciplined. On September 22, 2001 I received a coaching for profanity when I used the word "damn" in the employee break room. I routinely heard male employees use far worse profanity in front of management and customers while they were outside together on cigarette breaks. In addition, I heard Tony Whitten call a female employee, Bobby Dimick a "fing bitch," and he did not receive a coaching. in fact, within months he was promoted to department manager of ICS, the position for which I had applied and interviewed. in October 2001, I was given a "decision day," the most severe discipline at Wal-Mart short of termination, for misjudging the timing of my paycheck deposit, which resulted in one of my personal checks failing to clear at Wal-Mart. Don Kingsley, a male employee, bounced eight checks before he was even coached, a less severe form of discipline. Another male, Kim Cummings, also bounced a check at Wal-Mart but he was not given a decision day.

10. According to Wal-Mart policy, as a result of the decision day I was ineligible for promotion to any position for one year.

11. After I received my September coaching I asked my Customer Service Manager (CSM), Joyce Frye, for a merit raise, and she said that it would be no problem. However, Tammy Epley, the other lead CSM later told me that it was not possible for me to get a merit raise because I had an active written coaching in my file.

12. The Photo Center was very short staffed when I arrived, and so we all had to work very hard to keep up with the workload. All of the Associates at the Photo Lab were female, except for one. He was on a leave of absence. Another female employee, Christian Compton, and I joined together to ask for a merit raise from our Co-Manager Jim Payne. Mr. Payne just laughed at us.

13. In October 2002, I was promoted to lab specialist in the Photo Center. For this promotion, I was supposed to receive a 25 cent raise, according to my Assistant Manager in the Photo Lab, Laura Sauer. As of April 2003, I still have not received the raise.

14. In January 2003, there was a flyer placed by the time clock in our store advertising the Management Training Program. According to the flyer, any employee could apply for a position in the Management Training Program. The application period was for a limited time, approximately one week or a little less. In my two and one half years at Wal-Mart, I had never known of any other opportunity to apply for the Management Training Program. As I had been interested in joining management from the commencement of my employment at Wal-Mart, I applied. I completed the application over the pipeline, Wal-Mart's computerized information network which has online applications for some job positions. I met all of the prerequisites for the program.

15. My Store Manager, Pat Cochran, interviewed me for the position on March 6, 2003. He told me that I was not ready to become a Management Trainee. He told me that I needed to spend some time as a department manger and then as a Support Manager first. Mr. Cochran told me that I had another two years of employment at Wal-Mart before I would be ready. Meanwhile, according to the pipeline application, I had met all the requirements necessary to apply for the position. I had not been asked on my application about whether I had held positions as a department manager or Support Manager.

16. Mr. Cochran further elaborated and said that I needed experience with the Telzon, Wal-Mart's handheld inventory and pricing computer, and that I needed experience with modular set-up, which is building and displaying items on Wal-Mart display units. I had experience in both of these areas. I reminded Mr. Cochran that I used the Telzon everyday in the Photo Center and reminded him that my first job at Wal-Mart was to set-up the modulars. That did not change his mind. He continued to tell me that it would be another two years before I would be qualified for the Management Training Program.

17. Throughout my interview Mr. Cochran asked me if I was willing to relocate to enter the Management Training Program. Every time he asked me, I told him yes, but he continued to ask.

18. Despite this discouragement from Store Manager Cochran, I continue to be interested in joining the Management Training Program al Wal-Mart. I have received no information from Wal-Mart indicating if there will be another opportunity to apply for the program. I have received no encouragement from Store Manager Cochran, and he has not made any effort to provide to me the experience he stated I needed before I could be trained to be a Wal-Mart manager.

19. As of March 2003 I am still working in the photo lab at Wal-Mart. Of approximately eight Assistant Mangers in our store, only three are female. When the store opened in the late summer of 2000, only one Assistant Manager in the store, out of eight, was female.

I have personal knowledge of each and every fact set forth in the Declaration, and if called to testify as a witness in this matter, I could and would competently testify to each of these facts.

I declare under penalty of perjury of the laws of the United States and State of Idaho that the foregoing is true and correct.

This Declaration was signed by me on April 14, 2003, in the city of Mtn. Home, Idaho.

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, CLEO PAGE, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, DEBORAH GUNTER, KAREN WILLIAMSON AND EDITH ARANA, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiffs, v. WAL-MART STORES, INC., Defendant.	Case No. C-01-2252-MJJ DECLARATION OF WEI MING BOGARDUS IN SUPPORT OF WAL-MART STORES, INC.'S OPPOSITION TO MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION Date: July 25, 2003 Time: 10:00 a.m. Courtroom: 11, 19th Floor Judge: Martin J. Jenkins Complaint Filed: June 8, 2001 Trial Date: None Set

DECLARATION OF WEI MING BOGARDUS

I, Wei Ming Bogardus, declare:

1. I started as a Cashier at Wal-Mart Discount Store in Dubois, Pennsylvania (Store 1769) in 1993 while I was in high school. I am now twenty-eight years old and the Store Manager of the State College, Pennsylvania Supercenter (Store 1640). My personal goal was to become a Store Manager when I was 30. As I further describe below, I have been mentored, counseled, guided and advised by many members of management at Wal-Mart. Through hard work, and the guidance and support of my managers, I became a Store Manager two years shy of my target date.

2. In the Fall of 1993, I started college at Pennsylvania State University and transferred to Store 1640 in State College, Pennsylvania as a Sales Associate in Stationery. Store 1640 was a Division 1 store at this time. My managers at Store 1640 were very flexible and allowed me to work around my school schedule. Though they were willing to let me work part-time, I decided that I wanted to work full-time so that I could earn more money and get more experience. I had great leaders and supervisors at Store 1640. I truly believe that I am a Store Manager today because of these great leaders. Originally, I intended to go to law school after college. I chose not to do so because I loved working with the people at Wal-Mart and felt optimistic that I could someday achieve my goal of running my own store.

3. When I was an hourly associate, many of my Assistant Managers encouraged me to seek out a management position. One of the individuals that was instrumental in my career at Wal-Mart was Jean Paul LeGuen, my Assistant Manager while I was at Store 1640. In 1996, there was a exceptional period of time when I was working extremely hard because it was back-to-college time and there were no other Wal-Mart stores in the area at this time. In recognition of my efforts, Jean recommended me for the Associate of the Month award. My picture was displayed at the front of the store and I got a lot of recognition from higher level managers. After this, my District Manager, Scott Snow, and Regional Vice President ("RVP"), Castural Thompson, were constantly thanking me for doing a great job.

4. Another one of my Assistant Managers at Store 1640, Matt Heddings, also helped me advance at Wal-Mart. He did so by constantly communicating with me about my performance and spending a lot of time teaching me about areas that went above and beyond the duties of a Sales Associate. For example, Matt taught me how to operate the Telzon computer, order merchandise, and review return sheets.

5. While I was at Store 1640, I found out about the Summer Internship Program (the "Internship Program") through my supervisors and through store meetings that I attended. The Internship Program is a truncated version of the Assistant Manager Trainee Program that trains associates to become Assistant Managers while attending college. I was very much interested in participating in this program. In 1996, Jean recommended me as a candidate for the Internship Program. My Store Manager, Greg Anstett, and District Manager, Scott Snow, subsequently interviewed me for the Internship Program. Both encouraged me to enter the program and informed me that participating in it could open the door to promotions to high level positions down the road. I started the Internship Program at Store 2230, which was only a few miles from Store 1640.

6. In 1997, I obtained a B.A. in English Literature from Penn State. Shortly thereafter, I completed the Internship Program. After completing the program, I asked Mark Roberts, my Regional Personnel Manager ("RPM"), to promote me to an Assistant Manager position to Store 2230, the store at which I trained. In the Summer of 1997, Mark promoted me to that position.

7. To diversify my Wal-Mart experience, I subsequently decided to work at several other Wal-Mart locations as an Assistant Manager. I worked at the Terre Haute, Indiana Store from August 1998 to January 1999; the Ledgewood, New Jersey Store from January 1999 to July 1999; the Franklin, New Jersey Store from July 1999 to August 1999; the Cranberry Township, Pennsylvania Store from August 1999 to July 2000; the Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania Store from July 2000 to August 2000; the Clarion, Pennsylvania Store from August 2000 to August 2001; the New Castle, Pennsylvania Store from August 2001 to June 2002; and the Butler, Pennsylvania Store from June 2002 to November 2002.

8. While I was an Assistant Manager, many of my managers supported and mentored me. One of my best mentors was my Co-Manager at the Cranberry Store, Robert Harrer. There was a point while I was working at the Cranberry Store when I grew unhappy. My unhappiness was not with management, but with my own performance. At that time, I was in charge of Lawn & Garden at the Cranberry Store. The position was difficult because the Cranberry Store was in an affluent metropolitan area and that spring Lowe's, Target and Home Depot stores opened simultaneously nearby. Competing with these stores was frustrating and challenging. Due to these frustrations, I considered leaving Wal-Mart. Though I never mentioned my displeasure to anyone at work, Robert asked me if I was happy with my job. I confided in him that I was not completely happy. After we spoke, Robert started spending a lot of time counseling me. He told me that I had too much talent to quit and encouraged me to be patient. He made me realize that there would be a light at the end of the tunnel. He was right. A short time later, in the Summer of 2000, District Manager Snow told me that he had an opening in his district and that he would be happy if I moved to one of his stores. I graciously accepted his offer and started working at the Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania Store in July 2000.

9. My District Manager while I was working as an Assistant Manager in the Clarion, Pennsylvania Store, Terry Nannie, was also a tremendous mentor. In 2001, he asked me what I wanted to do with the Company. I told him that I was interested in working in Grocery. I wanted to work in Grocery so that I could diversify my experience and progress toward my goal of becoming a Store Manager. A week after expressing my preference, Terry transferred me to the New Castle, Pennsylvania store (the highest volume store in Terry's district), and had me run the food section of that store. Terry's help did not end there. He was very generous with his time. He constantly taught me things that Assistant Managers did not normally deal with. He also constantly counseled me about my career. Terry's help really prepared me to move to the Store-Manager level. In early 2002, Terry also made me Assistant Manager of the Quarter and placed me in the Rising Star Program.

10. In June 2002, Terry made me a Training Assistant at a Supercenter that was setting up for its Grand Opening in Butler, Pennsylvania. While I was at Butler, Terry taught me many things that helped me advance. For instance, he taught me how to review and analyze profit and loss statements and general ledgers. He also toured the store with me and instructed me about issues in the entire store, and not just the areas I was responsible over.

11. About five months later, I bid for a Co-Manager position on the General Merchandise side of the New Castle Store. In November 2002, District Manager Terry and RVP, Steve Maloney, promoted me into that position.

12. While I was an Assistant Manager and Co-Manager at the New Castle Store, my Store Manager, Dave Williams, also spent a lot of time teaching me about how to run a store. He provided me with the tools and information that I needed to be a successful Store Manager. He allowed me to perform functions that Store Managers generally do. For instance, he taught me how to review reports and schedules and determine whether we were overstaffing or understaffing. Assistant Managers normally look at schedules and reports for their area of the store. Dave gave me the opportunity to do this for the entire store. He also taught me the reasons for making certain scheduling adjustments and how to make those adjustments. Dave also taught me how to forecast sales, a task Assistant Managers do not normally do.

13. A few months later, RVP Maloney, told me about an opening for Store Manager at Store 1640, where I worked during college, and told me that that I should apply. I bid for the position and received an interview with RVP Maloney. The following week, about three hours after my interview with the District Manager, Dan Hilderhoff, I was announced as the new Store Manager at the Divisional Meeting in Kansas City, Missouri.

14. In 2002, RVP Maloney picked me to be a Leadership Express Candidate. This is a program where the RVP mentors select candidates and places them on special projects (e.g., participating in college recruiting for management positions). Because I am a Leadership Express Candidate, RVP Maloney calls me once a week to check to make sure that I have everything I need and to answer any of my questions. My District and Regional managers are the best group of people and are always willing to help and advise me whenever I need it.

15. Training and promotional opportunities here have been and are discussed during daily and weekly store meetings at every store in which I worked. These meetings are open to all associates and are conducted during all shifts. The meeting notes are posted near the time clocks for people who do not have the opportunity to attend the meetings.

16. As a Store Manager, I decide what to pay associates in my store, and I make those decisions in a nondiscriminatory way. My pay and promotion decisions are based solely on an associate's level of performance.

17. My hard work and effort with Wal-Mart have paid off. Just last week, during our Shareholders Meeting, I was honored to receive the Sam Walton Hero Award.

18. I have personal knowledge of the facts contained in this Declaration. If called and sworn as a witness, I would testify competently to those facts.

19. I make this Declaration entirely of my own free will and choice. No promises of benefits or threats have been made to me to persuade me to sign it.

Executed this 11th day of June 2003, at Reynoldsville, Pennsylvania.

Executive Summary

1. Counsel for Defendant in the matter of Dukes, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. asked the professional staff of ERS Group to analyze employment data provided or available to the plaintiffs in this matter and to review and comment on the analysis and conclusions of plaintiffs' experts, Richard Drogin, Ph.D. and Marc Bendick, Ph.D. In this declaration I repeat the opinions that were provided to plaintiffs' counsel in my April report and my deposition. Where I believed it would be helpful for the Court to understand the context in which these opinions were reached I provided additional explanations and background discussions. I have also responded to some of the "flaws" alleged by plaintiffs' experts' rebuttals where I believed the Court might be misled if I did not respond.

2. The Third Amended Complaint shows that the issues in this matter focus on promotion and compensation. The Plaintiffs' Motion for Class Certification focused their claims on the hourly promotions to the Support Manager position starting December 27, 1998, salaried promotions, hourly compensation, and salaried compensation. Consequently, we have slightly rearranged the content and format of my original report to make it more useful for the Court in light of their Motion. My opinions, however, have not changed.

3. We also conducted additional analyses to provide the Court background for understanding the issues raised in the plaintiffs' rebuttal reports. In addition, I have appended results of some analyses that were previously conducted for a more extensive period but are now limited to the period described in Plaintiffs' Motion for Class Certification (after December 26, 1998). Specifically these additional sections of the declaration are:

- Starting on ¶ 84 we discuss our analysis of the job posting database for Support Manager selections during the time period 1999-2002 in response to Dr. Drogin's criticism of our use of the job posting data for hourly jobs.
- Starting on ¶ 91 we discuss our analysis of the job posting database for departments whose female representation is less than the company-wide average to address Dr. Drogin's remarks about department segregation.
- Starting on ¶ 114 we discuss our analysis of the Assistant Manager Trainee database where the pool of eligible employees is defined as those who met the minimum qualifications for the job in response to plaintiffs' concern that we may have used an inappropriate pool in our analysis of the selections for Assistant Manager Trainees.
- Starting on ¶ 116 we discuss our analysis of the Management Career Selection (MCS) database for the time period 1999-2002 to address Dr. Drogin's criticism of our use of the posting data for salaried jobs.
- Starting on ¶ 132 we discuss our analysis of the MCS database by store size category that contradicts the analysis prepared by Dr. Drogin in his Response to our Report.
- Starting on ¶ 214 we discuss our analysis of hourly pay rates that include Department Managers and other previously excluded associates to show that our conclusions are not affected by their exclusion.

- Starting on ¶ 216 we discuss our analysis of job, department and store assignments to address assertions by plaintiffs' experts that these variables may be "tainted."
- Starting on ¶ 217 we discuss our analysis of current and starting pay rates – also to address plaintiffs' experts assertions that this variable may be "tainted."

4. My conclusions, based on our analysis and research, can be summarized as follows:

- The claims of the named plaintiffs are not typical of women associates at Wal-Mart. Their job histories show different pay and promotion situations than we have found from our analysis of these processes across the firm.
- Promotions: A reliable study of promotion decisions by Store Managers compares the percent female among those who were promoted and those who actually applied for the job. Dr. Drogin's study of promotions compared the percent female of all associates in a job and store and did not reject those who had not applied for the job. The data show that people who did not apply for each job usually have a different gender composition than those who did express their interest for the positions. Therefore, Dr. Drogin's promotion analysis is incorrect and misleading. In our analysis I compared the percent female among associates who applied for each job to those promoted and found that the percent of women at Wal-Mart stores who are promoted is at least equal to, and usually statistically significantly greater than, the percent of women who applied for the jobs.

1. For hourly management jobs the percent female among the applications was 68.3% and the percent of those promoted who were women was 70.4%. The hourly position of Support Manager had an applicant pool that was 46.1% female and 47.2% of those selected were women.
2. For salaried management positions – approximately 12% of those applying for Store Manager were women and 17% of those promoted were women. Likewise, women were 17% of Co-Manager applicants and 25% of those promoted. For posted Assistant Manager positions the percent female among applications was 24.2% and the percent female promoted was 28%.
3. Approximately 44% of the Assistant Manager Trainee applicants in the first 2003 posting were women and those selected were 59% female. Approximately 41% of the Assistant Manager Trainee applicants in the second 2003 posting were women and those selected were 47% female.

- Hourly Pay Rates: Both Dr. Drogin and I used "multiple regression analyses" in our study of hourly employees' pay rates. We differ in what we estimated and the variables we considered important in identifying similarly situated associates.

1. I estimated the difference in pay rates between men and women for each decision maker and examined the extent of any pattern of those differences. Since Wal-Mart's policy is to push pay decisions down to the Store Manager (or District Manager in the case of Specialty Departments) the store-by-store estimates of pay differences that I estimated reflect the way Wal-Mart actually operates. This is a company that relies on its Store Managers to set the specific wage rates of each store's employees.
2. I included in my estimated regression equations adjustments for grocery jobs, department, current and first pay group (which Dr. Drogin agreed was not a tainted variable), night shift premium, holding a secondary job, on a leave of absence, as well as some form of the variables Dr. Drogin included.
3. I found that more than 90% of the stores had no pay rate differences between men and women that were statistically significant. That is, over 90% of the stores had no statistical difference in men's and women's pay rates. Some of the remaining stores favored women; others favored men.

- Dr. Drogin created a model that could not consider whether there were differences among the decision-makers – the Store Managers for hourly decisions or District Managers for salaried decisions – because he did not provide for that answer in his model. Instead he estimated a difference in pay rates that assumed that Wal-Mart was a company with a single decision-maker who sets pay rates for all employees, contrary to testimony, policy documents and our statistical tests.

- He excluded important variables in his pay model – like hours worked – when he analyzed total earnings and night shift premium (that are sometimes built into the employee base rate), pay group and department. The result of excluding many of these major variables is an estimate that ignores pay differences in the labor market for different types of jobs and shifts. This estimate does not compare similarly situated associates because, for example, women work fewer hours, are less likely to work night shift, prefer to work in different departments than men as a group, etc. and men, on average, work more hours, are more likely to work night shift and work in different departments.

- Dr. Drogin estimated a result that cannot tell us the extent to which adverse pay decisions were made by Store Managers in most of the stores or, conversely, occurred, if at all, among only a small proportion of the Store Managers.

- Salaried Compensation – Men and women Store Managers at Wal-Mart and General Managers at Sam's Clubs also appear to be paid similarly when the available appropriate characteristics are included in the model.

- None of these results are consistent with a common pattern of promotion and pay decisions adverse to women associates at Wal-Mart.

Qualifications

5. I am the Chairman and CEO of ERS Group, a SourceCorp company, which specializes in the economic and statistical analysis of employment discrimination cases and other matters. I have testified for both plaintiffs and defendants in over 65 employment cases, including Huguley v. General Motors Corp., EEOC v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., Penk v. Oregon State Board of Higher Education, Walter J. Thomas v. James Baker, III, Secretary, Department of State and AFCSME v. County of Nassau. I am a frequent presenter and participant in programs and mock trials for such groups as the American Bar Association, the Defense Research Institute, and the Practicing Law Institute.

6. I have authored over 30 publications and research papers, in economic, statistical and legal journals such as the American Economic Review, Proceedings of the American Statistical Association, Notre Dame Lawyer, and Employee Relations Law Journal. Many of my articles focus on the areas of employment discrimination, comparable worth and the economic status of women. I am a former tenured faculty member in the Department of Economics at Florida State University and was the Director of the Census Processing Center. I am past Chair of the American Economic Association's Committee on the Status of Women in the Economics Profession and have served on the board of that committee for many years.

Level of Analysis

7. The decisions on how hourly Wal-Mart associates are assigned, paid, promoted within a store and scheduled are made at the store level with oversight for exceptions at the district level. Thomas Coughlin, President and CEO of Wal-Mart Stores, Supercenters, Neighborhood Markets, and Sam's Clubs, described the philosophy of management at Wal-Mart Stores: "We push down to the manager of the facility level, the responsibility to run those stores right." As a consequence, analysis of these decisions is logically performed at the store level. As I discuss in great detail in the compensation section of this declaration, there are also statistical reasons that compel performing hourly compensation analyses at the store level.

8. Furthermore, only by examining the Store Manager decisions store-by-store can the Court determine whether all of the stores, districts or regions make the same type of decisions with respect to gender. Our analysis of promotions and compensation is summarized at the store level and, in some cases, the job or department level, in order to provide the basis for my opinion that there is not a common pattern of decision-making in this company. These focused analyses also contradict Dr. Drogin's claims that Wal-Mart segregates women into particular positions, departments or stores through its promotion practices.

Promotion

9. In our analysis we relied upon the databases that contain information on who applied to and were selected for the hourly and salaried positions in question to specifically examine most of the promotion questions at issue in this case. Wal-Mart has continuously maintained these data for years. We believe that these applicant flow data files provide the best measure of those who are interested in being selected to these jobs because they contain information on who applied to and were selected for the hourly and salaried positions in question. Although these databases were provided to plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Drogin, and he performed initial analyses of the data (provided in back-up materials) he still chose to ignore both the data and the results of his analysis in reaching his conclusions regarding promotion. Instead, plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Drogin, created his own definition of who would be interested in these positions and also created his own definition of which moves reflected an associate promotion.

10. The results of our promotion analyses, using the applicant flow data, consistently show that when you consider the positions for which people have actually applied, women are being selected in a manner that is either gender-neutral or statistically significantly in favor of females.

Hourly Job Posting

11. When we examined data for approximately 530,000 applications for 104,091 positions in the hourly job posting system from December 27, 1998 through September 30, 2002, we found that statistically significantly more female Wal-Mart associates were promoted into hourly management positions than predicted by their applications to these positions. Only 5 of the 2,694 stores had a difference between the number of women promoted that was lower than predicted by women's presence among the applicants at a statistically significant level (e.g., a difference that is inconsistent with random chance). When we examine these results by store we find that more than 90% of the stores show no gender difference in the promotion decisions to hourly management and office positions. These results are not consistent with plaintiffs' claim that there is a common pattern of promotion decisions adverse to women in the Wal-Mart stores.

12. When we examine only the Support Manager applications and offers in the job posting data, we find that the results are consistently favorable to women. Women were promoted at a statistically significantly greater rate than would have been predicted given their representation among those who applied for the position. Between December 27, 1998 and 2002, there were approximately 41,000 applications for about 6,800 Support Manager openings. Women made up 46.1% of those who applied but received 47.2% of the offers made (79 more than predicted by their share of each posting). This is a difference that is favorable to women and statistically significant.

Effect of Promotion Decisions on Departmental Segregation

13. The plaintiffs claim that Wal-Mart creates and exacerbates departmental segregation by underselecting females who have applied to "male" departments. However, the applicant flow data do not support this conclusion. When we examine only departments whose female representation is below 64% – which is the company-wide female representation that Dr. Drogin calculated, more women were selected than predicted by women's share of applications in the hourly job posting system and there were more departments with extra women promoted than there were departments with a shortfall in female promotions.

Management Career Selection Promotion System

14. Our analysis of promotions into salaried management positions found that statistically significantly more women were promoted into these positions than predicted by their application rate in the online Management Career Selection (MCS) system. Approximately 4,000 offers were made to men and women who applied through MCS for Store Manager, Co-Manager and Assistant Manager. For Store Manager, Co-Manager and Assistant Manager positions, the proportion of offers women received was higher than their representation among the applications for these positions.

15. We determined that women are not restricted to smaller stores when they are promoted to Store Manager position. Whether we define store size based on the top third, middle or bottom third in each type of Wal-Mart store, or we define the small stores as those with less than 60,000 square feet (as Dr. Drogin did), there were statistically significantly more women promoted than predicted by their application rate in both the smaller stores and the larger stores. Thus, female Store Managers are not channeled into smaller stores, as the plaintiffs claim.

Assistant Manager Trainee Positions

16. We also examined the most recent data on store associates nationwide, who expressed an interest in admission to the Assistant Manager Trainee ("AMT") (also referred to as manager-in-training or management-in-training) position and found that 44% of these bidding associates were women.[1] This proportion is not much different from the proportion of women in Wal-Mart Discount Stores and Supercenters promoted to the AMT position from December 28, 1998 through March 2002 (40.4%). It is also similar to the percent female among Officials and Manager in firms that are in industries related to Wal-Mart industries as of 1999 (37%). This suggests that the percent women among the Assistant Manager Trainee applicants is a reasonable proxy for the proportion of women predicted to be among managers in this organization in recent years.

Plaintiffs' Claim that the Application Data are Biased is Unfounded

17. The officially maintained MCS applicant flow data that we used in analyzing promotions contain the records of the management jobs that were posted, the applications of associates who expressed their interest in the posted positions and the offers actually made for such positions as Store Manager. The Global PeopleSoft job history data that Dr. Drogin used lack this type of information. Even though not all of the potential promotions are included in the MCS data, a comparison of these two data systems reveals no salient reason why Dr. Drogin should have completely ignored the MCS applicant flow data as he chose to do.

[1] After I prepared my report and gave my deposition in this case, Wal-Mart had another Assistant Manager Trainee posting. This time, 41% of the bidding associates were women. See Declaration of David A. Scott.

18. The female representation among those receiving offers when they responded to an MCS posting in that system was nearly identical to the female representation among the moves to the same positions that are identified by Dr. Drogin in the Global PeopleSoft job history data (that include promotions to jobs not posted, demotions and lateral moves). For example, the percent women among the offers to Store Manager in the MCS posting system was 16.9% while the percent women among those promoted according to the Global PeopleSoft data was 17.6%. For each of the three major jobs posted – Store Manager, Assistant Manager and Co-Manager – the representation of women winning promotions to such jobs was statistically the same, whether or not the change in job was posted in MCS or recorded only in Global PeopleSoft. These results show that the MCS data reflect the similar participation of men and women in these promotions and does not appear to be a skewed sample of promotion data. Ignoring that information when there is no evidence that the decisions made for posted positions had a different female composition than the decisions recorded in associates' job histories, is a fatal flaw in plaintiffs' analysis of promotions.

The Claim that All Hourly Associates in a Job and Store Should be Considered for Promotions is Unfounded

19. Dr. Drogin's assumption in his promotion analysis, that men and women are "similarly situated" simply by virtue of the fact that they are in the same job and store or district, is not reasonable because it ignores individual preferences expressed by the actual applicants. For example, we find that Store Manager and Co-Manager positions generally require relocation. Among the applicants for Store Manager and for Co-Manager the men were statistically significantly more likely than women to relocate from one region to another. Women and men did not apply for these positions at the same rate as they are present in the workforce, so the assumption that the percent female in the same job and district is representative of the applicants for these positions is not correct. Likewise, we find statistically different female representation in applications for Automotive positions than in applications for positions in Toys. The assumption that the female representation of those interested in and qualified for the same positions would be the same as their representation among all employees in a particular job and store or district is not supported by these and other applicant flow data.

Hourly Pay Rates and Hourly Compensation

20. As is the case with promotions, it is also very important when analyzing compensation to build a statistical model that reflects as closely as possible the compensation decision-making structure. As noted earlier, Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. pushes the decision-making on pay issues for hourly associates down to the Store Managers. * * *

21. When we build a pay model that includes the important variables for which there are data and estimate the model separately for each store, we find that over 90% of the stores have no statistically significant difference in hourly pay rates between female and male associates with similar work-related characteristics. This is true in Wal-Mart Discount stores, Neighborhood Market stores, and Supercenters (divided into Grocery and non-Grocery), as well as Sam's Clubs. Some of the remaining stores had statistically significantly higher pay rates for men and some stores had statistically significantly higher pay rates for women.

22. As will be discussed later in this declaration, these results are consistent regardless of whether we include or exclude Department Managers, include or exclude all hourly employees with unusual pay situations (like those who were once salaried or had been recently demoted), or whether we prepare the summary of the data by sub-divisions (e.g. general merchandise, grocery, optical, tire & lube) or by store type.

23. Dr. Drogin's compensation models implicitly assume that there is one decision-maker for hourly employees who determines the compensation levels for all hourly employees (Wal-Mart, Sam's, Neighborhood Markets and Supercenters) across the country. He also assumes that the single measure of pay difference he estimates is the measure of difference that is relevant. In fact, however, this measure of difference tells us nothing about the pattern of decisions across stores. In this case we see that 90% of the Store Managers have made pay decisions that are not statistically significantly different between women and men. Dr. Drogin includes a "store" variable in his model, but these variables only tell us whether pay rates are generally higher (or lower) in each store and do not tell us anything about pay differences between women and men in each store. His model clearly differs from the decision-making process described in the deposition testimony, declarations, and corporate guidelines that have been presented in this case and suffers from the statistical problem of "aggregation bias" (putting all data sets into one model even though they are dissimilar with respect to the decisions analyzed).

24. If an analyst wants to include all the associates in one analysis by creating only one equation for all stores, it is necessary to conduct a statistical test called a "Chow" test to determine whether the compensation decisions are based on the same variables, weighted the same way in all stores (as Dr. Drogin's analysis assumes and would have you believe) or whether these compensation decisions differ across stores. Dr. Drogin did not perform this test or any other test of the validity of his "one decision-maker" assumption. When we performed a test of that assumption, we found that the Chow test "failed" – meaning that the hourly pay rate of female and male associates at Wal-Mart differed among the stores in such a way that the pay rates could not be properly analyzed by combining all the stores. However, when each grocery/non-grocery division group in each store is analyzed separately, as we did, the differences in compensation structures among the stores can be examined and the results used to determine whether there is a common pattern of pay differences adverse to women among the stores or whether these pay differences only show up in some stores. As noted above, we found that more than 90% of the stores had pay differences that were statistically insignificant and the remaining stores either paid women less than men or paid men less than women at a statistically significant level.

25. Dr. Drogin's pay model is not consistent with Wal-Mart's compensation and organizational policies. * * *, and his model does not pass the statistical test that would permit us to combine all of the data into one equation (using the "Chow" test).

In sum, his pay model does not result in sufficiently similar equations among the stores that they can be combined into one equation. This means that his estimates of differences in pay between men and women are meaningless because he did combine all the Wal-Mart associates' data into one equation without accounting for those structural differences in his model. Consequently, he cannot tell us whether the earnings difference he finds reflect a common pattern of pay differences across all Wal-Mart retail stores or are only unfavorable in a small proportion of the stores because he has not constructed a model that can provide that information.

26. Dr. Drogin also produced an alternative estimate in his Response to our Report which purports to aggregate the store-by-store equations into a single measure of pay difference. He testified in his deposition that he simply treated the gender coefficients as "independent variables" and calculated the difference as one would if combining independent variables. Once again, however, Dr. Drogin has ignored the fact that these coefficients are estimated for stores with diverse pay criteria who weigh those criteria in different ways. As will be discussed later in this declaration, that estimated pay difference is also meaningless because these coefficients are not from similar distributions.[2]

27. Dr. Drogin's compensation analyses also suffer from a second fundamental error. In addition to estimating a single equation when that model is not supported by the data ("aggregation bias"), he omits variables that have a significant influence on compensation levels (e.g., department, shift) from his models – that is "omitted variables bias." For example, when analyzing total compensation he fails to include the hours worked by individual associates. As women in the workforce generally work fewer hours than men, this omission inappropriately increases his estimates of adverse pay rates for women. Other omitted variables have similar effects whenever they are related to gender.

28. The variables that Dr. Drogin omitted include many different factors that Store Managers consider. For example, these improperly omitted variables include night shift differentials, department, and hours worked in his total compensation models. Wal-Mart's hourly pay rates are set in accordance with the pay structure that is implemented independently by managers in each store. Total compensation for hourly employees can vary within a pay class at any store because of differences in many different employment-related factors, such as part-time work, prior experience, performance, schedules, specific skills (e.g., meat or fresh produce knowledge) and specific certifications. Associates may be paid more than the stated pay class range if they have special skills, related work experience, etc. Thus, it is not surprising that the statistical test for comparability found that the stores had different compensation decision criteria because they are in different labor markets, have different skill and experience needs and have different managerial philosophies as to what factors are important to compensate.

29. Dr. Drogin's analysis of hourly pay rates that combines all the associates in various stores, districts and regions into one statistical model for all of the Wal-Mart Discount stores, Neighborhood Market stores, Supercenters and Sam's Clubs (or just for Sam's Clubs) violates the statistical principles of data analysis, is inconsistent with the guidelines and policies of Wal-Mart and omits variables that are part of the criteria by which pay decisions are made by Store Managers. The results are estimates that fail to meet professional statistical criteria and also fail to reflect the decision process at Wal-Mart.

Salaried Compensation

30. Dr. Drogin's compensation models for the salaried workforce combine all management positions into one equation, despite the fact that they are paid pursuant to very different pay plans, depending on their job title, store characteristics, and store performance. Because their compensation differs for more reasons than simply the job title, the variables in Dr. Drogin's single equation are insufficient to account for the diversity in compensation plans by job and by store type.

31. The compensation of associates in Wal-Mart's retail salaried positions (Store Manager, Co-Manager, Assistant Manager and corresponding positions at Sam's Clubs) is based on different compensation plans that vary with the job and the circumstances of the store. Generally these plans involve different incentive structures with a calculated threshold that impacts the managers' compensation. In addition to these incentive structures and threshold measures (for which we do not have data at this time), other factors affect salaried managers' pay in some positions. These include type and amount of managerial experience, difficulty of a specific store assignment, willingness to relocate, grocery experience and other special skills. Data for many of these factors are also unavailable at this time.

32. Despite the fact that data for many of the most critical variables that define incentive structures and store circumstances are not available at this time, we did estimate compensation for Store Managers at Wal-Mart and General Managers at Sam's Clubs separately and found no adverse statistical difference between men and women. The model includes a variable for store size and number of associates in an effort to capture the scope of the manager's responsibilities but it does not capture the profitability of the store or changes in the store performance over the past year. Estimates for the other positions are not yet sufficiently reliable and complete to determine whether there are adverse differences by gender.

33. Dr. Drogin's salaried compensation analyses, however, created an over-generalized picture of the workforce that obscured legitimate differences among associates because he omits relevant and important factors from his model that are known to affect pay decisions at Wal-Mart and, as in hourly pay, combines diverse compensation structures. These flaws result in inaccurate and overstated gender pay differences and meaningless results that cannot tell us what the situation is for each salaried job or for each type of store (Wal-Mart or Sam's Clubs).

Summary of Conclusions

34. The claims of the named plaintiffs are not typical of women associates at Wal-Mart. Their job histories show different pay and promotion situations than we have found in our analysis of these processes across the firm.

35. The promotion of women at Wal-Mart stores is favorable to women or consistent with a neutral process. This is true for promotion decisions made in the stores for hourly management jobs and at higher levels for salaried Store Manager positions, as well as selections for the Assistant Manager Trainee position in 2003.

36. At more than 90% of the stores, the hourly pay rates are not statistically significantly different between men and women – regardless of store type. Women are paid more in some of the stores in which there is a statistically significant difference and men are paid more in others.

37. Men and women Store Managers at Wal-Mart and General Managers at Sam's Clubs also appear to be paid similarly when the available appropriate characteristics are included in the model.

38. None of these results are consistent with a common pattern of promotion and pay decisions adverse to women associates at Wal-Mart.

39. Dr. Drogin's promotion analysis fails to incorporate the clearly relevant information on female and male associates' interest in job openings at Wal-Mart. This failure results in a flawed promotion analysis. His compensation analysis suffers from two flaws – (i) the aggregation bias that resulted from combining all the data for all associates in all stores into one equation that failed to recognize the differences in the pay model among the stores, and (ii) omitted variables bias. As a consequence, his compensation analysis does not properly reflect the compensation system at Wal-Mart and incorrectly identifies pay differences between men and women as if they were present in all stores. Dr. Bendick does not provide a promotion analysis or a compensation analysis.

I. Introduction

A. Assignment and Summary of Findings

40. Counsel for Defendant in the matter of Dukes, et al. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. asked the professional staff of ERS Group to review and analyze data provided or available to plaintiffs in this matter and to form opinions on issues relevant to class certification. This declaration contains a summary of our analyses and conclusions, the basis of those conclusions and a description of the documents and data sets used to form those opinions. My curriculum vita is found in Appendix A to this declaration.[3]

41. The applicant flow data show more women promoted than predicted by their applicant flow representation. There is no statistical difference in the proportion of women promoted compared to their applicant flow in over 90% of all stores. Further, we found no statistical difference between men's and women's pay rates in more than 90% of the stores when job-related variables are included in the model. These results are not consistent with a common pattern of decision-making adverse to women across Wal-Mart stores with respect to promotions or pay.

B. Data and Documents Used or Affecting our Opinions

42. The documents and data reviewed for this matter are listed in Appendix B. The materials provided by Wal-Mart's counsel consist primarily of four types – legal documents pertaining to this case, company documents (including policy statements, personnel documents, and support material for understanding data files), electronic personnel and employment data, and depositions and declarations. Additional materials were obtained from public sources or from backup materials provided by plaintiffs' experts.

C. Report Structure

43. Section II contains a description of the Wal-Mart organization that provides the basis for my opinions as to what variables and models are appropriate. The promotion policies and procedures, as well as the results of our promotion analyses, follow in Section III, along with my comments on Dr. Drogin's and Dr. Bendick's analyses related to promotions.

44. Section IV contains a discussion of Multiple Regression analysis and the statistical tests that were used to determine whether or not the compensation models could be estimated across all the stores or needed to be estimated store-by-store. In Section V we describe the basis for the inclusion of the variables we use in our compensation model for hourly associates, the basis for analyzing grocery associates separately from other associates, and the results of estimating those models for the Wal-Mart stores and Sam's Clubs. This Section includes a response to the claim by plaintiffs' experts that the variables we include in our hourly pay rate models are "tainted" and to other criticisms of our analysis that they make. Section VI contains a similar discussion for management compensation – including a discussion of the variables that might be necessary for a proper compensation analysis. Section VII provides a discussion of Dr. Drogin's hourly and salaried associates' compensation analysis. Section VIII contains a more expanded discussion of Dr. Bendick's external "availability" benchmark, and the last section, Section IX, contains a summary of all of these results, as well as my conclusions regarding the absence of a common pattern of promotion and pay decisions adverse to women, among the various Wal-Mart stores and Sam's Clubs.

II. Description of Wal-Mart Retail Organization

45. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., with principal offices in Bentonville, Arkansas, is a large business with domestic and international operations. It operates retail discount stores in three business concept formats known as Wal-Mart Discount Stores, Wal-Mart Supercenters, and Neighborhood Markets, as well as operating in a wholesale, general merchandise and bulk grocery format known as Sam's Clubs. The first Wal-Mart Discount store was opened in 1962. In 1983, the Sam's Club wholesale concept, which offers low-margin pricing of bulk-packaged products to Club members at prices below those of discount retailers, was added. Small businesses are particularly targeted as a membership base for the Clubs. In 1988, Supercenters were added, which combine the discount general merchandise retail operation of a Wal-Mart discount store with a grocery operation. Then, in 1998, the Neighborhood Markets were introduced, which provide a smaller, more convenient shopping venue for customers who are primarily interested in the retail grocery operation.

46. Wal-Mart retail and wholesale operations have expanded rapidly, both in the number of actual facilities and in the business formats. By January, 2002, Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. was operating a total of 3,244 facilities in the fifty states – 1,647 Discount stores, 1,066 Supercenters, 500 Sam's Clubs, and 31 Neighborhood Markets.[4]

47. The operations and merchandising of some types of products offered by Wal-Mart are organized as separate functions with their own management structure[5] and their own profit and loss statements and accountability, although the sales function occurs under the roof of the four types of facilities identified above. These are referred to within Wal-Mart as Specialty Divisions, and include Tire and Lube Express, Optical (Vision Centers), One-Hour Photo, Pharmacy, and Shoes and Jewelry. In a Supercenter with a Vision Center, for example, the sales associates, optical technicians, opticians, and the Optical Department (Vision Center) Manager will be located in the Supercenter. The Vision Center will pay an annual rent to the Supercenter in which it is located but the Vision Center Manager will not report directly to the Store Manager of the Supercenter. Instead, the Manager of this Specialty Division will report outside the store to a District Manager in Wal-Mart's Optical Division.

A. Organizational and Reporting Structure of Wal-Mart, Inc.

48. Wal-Mart is organized into several Divisions, each with its own profit and loss statement and with its own management structure. Of interest in this matter are Division 1 (the Wal-Mart Discount, Supercenter, and Neighborhood Market stores), Division 18 (Sam's Clubs), and the Specialty Divisions (One-Hour Photo, Optical, Pharmacy, Shoes and Jewelry, and Tire and Lube Express ("TLE")).[6]

49. Some of the Specialty Divisions (Optical, Pharmacy, and One-Hour Photo) have sales departments located in both Division 1 (Wal-Mart) stores and in Division 18 (Sam's Clubs). The Shoes and Jewelry and the TLE Specialty Divisions operate only in Division 1 stores. Any shoes and jewelry carried by Sam's Clubs are part of its own merchandise

[6] There are two other smaller Specialty Divisions - Hearing (Division 32) and Wireless Services (Division 45). There are other divisions that are part of Wal-Mart – including Division 8 - Wal-Mart Radio Grill, Division 20 - Supercenter Admin & Buying, Division 24 - Supercenter Meat, Division 25 - Supercenter Produce, Division 26 - Supercenter Dairy/Frozen, Division 27 - Supercenter Bakery/Bread, Division 28 - Supercenter Grocery. Sam's Club also has other divisions within it, including Division 59 – Sam's Gas Station, and Division 64 – Sam's Club Floral. These "divisions" do not have separate reporting structures but work within Wal-Mart (Division 1) and Sam's Club (Division 18) as separate Profit and Loss centers. K. Harper Depo., p. 90:15-22.

business, not separate business functions. The TLE Division does not operate in Sam's Clubs. Some Clubs have a Tire Mounting Area ("TMA") and operate a gasoline department (like a gasoline service station) but these, again, are operated as part of the Sam's Club business structure.

50. Within Wal-Mart Supercenters, there is a further division of reporting and responsibility between grocery and non-grocery departments. Supercenters have Co-Manager positions, who report to the Store Manager, but oversee grocery departments. Co-Managers are typically hired from outside of Wal-Mart through the Co-Manager-in-Training program in order to obtain employees with prior food experience.[7]

1. Responsibilities by Level

51. Each of the Division 1 stores (Wal-Mart Discount stores and Supercenters) has a Store Manager who is viewed within the Wal-Mart organization as being an individual business entrepreneur.[8] The Store Manager is responsible for hiring and promot-

For example, "Sam always really ran an entrepreneurial-type company and have had a great belief that you could push authority down and get the kind of response from your leaders at store level to make those kinds of decisions." pp. 119:9-13. See also, "We push down to the manager of the facility level, the responsibility to run those stores right." p. 114:19-21.

ing hourly employees and setting their pay.[9] Each Store Manager has discretion to select and evaluate the factors on which to base pay rates for each of the positions[10] and to select the merchandise that the Store will feature. The Division 1 stores report to Division 1 District Managers. In Division 1, there are generally six to eight stores in a District. The 398 Districts are organized into Regions, so that each District Manager reports to a Regional Manager (or Regional Vice President). In Division 1 there are about 35 regions, with 80-85 stores per Region.

52. The Regional Vice Presidents report to Divisional Vice Presidents. In Division 1, the Regions are grouped into six sub-Divisions managed by Senior Vice Presidents (referred to in Wal-Mart lingo as "Divisionals"), who in turn report to the Chief Operating Officer for Wal-Mart Stores.

53. In the Sam's Club Division there are no Districts. The Clubs are grouped into about 60 regions, with the managers of the Clubs (General Managers) in each region reporting to a Director of Operations. The regions are grouped into five (formerly six) sub-Divisions that together comprise Division 18.

54. The six sub-Divisions of Division 1 are A (west and southwest), B (southeast), D (northeast), E (northwest and some central), T (middle of the U.S.), and U (middle east—Tennessee, Carolinas, Kentucky, and Indiana). All sub-Divisions have six regions except Division T, which has five. For Sam's Club, the five current sub-Divisions are A (Southwest, middle and Pacific Northwest including HI and AK), B (Midsouth including TX, AR, LA, AL), C (IL, IN, OH), D (East Coast from VA north), and F (East Coast south of VA).

55. In the Specialty Divisions, the Specialty Department Manager within either a Wal-Mart store or a Sam's Club reports directly to a District Manager for that specialty group; and the Districts are grouped geographically into Regions that report to a Divisional Manager. The Specialty Divisions have fewer districts and regions than Divisions 1 or 18, and the number varies among the Specialty Divisions.

56. Each of these seven business divisions (Wal-Mart Division 1, Sam's Club and the other Specialty Divisions) operates as a separate business function, serving a different market from the others and with staffing requirements unique to its product. The Sam's Clubs serve a different target market than the Wal-Mart stores. The Pharmacy and Optical departments may have specialized occupational skill requirements. The Specialty Divisions generally provide services and, therefore, need an associate to be available to serve each customer. This changes the cost structure compared to the Division 1 and Division 18 store operations, where customers generally obtain their merchandise from the shelves.[11]

2. Reporting Relationships

57. The Wal-Mart Discount Stores and Supercenters in Division 1 are organized into departments generally supervised by a Department Manager. The Neighborhood Markets do not have departments. At Sam's Clubs, the lowest supervised unit is called a team rather than a department, and the supervisor is called a Team Leader. The highest hourly positions in the stores, excluding Assistant Manager Trainees, are the managers of these departments.[12] The Neighborhood Markets are organized into areas which are supervised by salaried Assistant Managers.

58. The managers of the Specialty Group Departments (generally salaried employees) report directly to their District Managers, with a dotted line relationship to the Store Manager or General Manager (the Manager of a Sam's Club). Managers of departments that are part of the Wal-Mart or Sam's Club Divisions report to in-store salaried managers.

3. Decision-making at Wal-Mart

59. Thomas Coughlin, President and CEO of Wal-Mart Stores, Supercenters, Neighborhood Markets, and Sam's Clubs, described the philosophy of management at Wal-Mart stores. "We push down to the manager of the facility level, the responsibility to run those stores right."[13] This latitude includes the ability of Store Managers to pay their employees at levels that are consistent with the store's labor market.[14] The Store Managers decide how many hourly associates should be assigned to any particular area and job code.[15] They have flexibility in determining the responsibilities given to associates.[16] They may also deviate from the recommended management work schedules (a recommended management schedule which also shows the breakdown of management responsibility within the store) when it is appropriate for their store.[17] As is well known, they have the authority to hire and promote hourly employees as well as to delegate those decisions to Co-Managers and Assistant Managers.[18] Further, Store Managers (or General Managers at Sam's Clubs) make Department Manager and Team Leader selections.[19]

a. Higher Level Management Decisions

60. The consequence of pushing the decision-making process to the Store Managers is that higher management levels may be brought in when Store Managers want to make decisions that are not typically delegated to the Stores. The next highest level, to whom the Store Managers report, is the District Manager. Decisions at the district level also vary according to the desires and needs of the Regional Managers. For example, in Specialty groups, each District Manager sets the compensation for the Specialty Division managers reporting to her (or him).[20] The District Managers in the Wal-Mart and Sam's Clubs divisions decide who will be admitted into the Management-in-Training program in the district. The specific criteria used to select these candidates vary with the District Manager – including factors such as extensive retail background, college education, retail supervisory experience, grocery management experience, etc.[21] The District Managers review the Store Managers' decisions in filling store management positions to be sure such criteria as the minimum required level of the performance evaluation are met, or that there is some reason not to meet a particular criterion.[22]

b. Regional Management

61. Each region gives its District Managers different levels of decision-making authority. Some have had different guidelines for promoting associates to Assistant Manager. The group of people who decide on the policy or guidelines for a region might also vary by region.[23]

[23] Heilman Depo., pp. 91:1-4, 92:14-18, 95:21 – 96:2, 263:6-14.

62. The Regional Personnel Manager ("RPM") and the Regional Manager decide who the District Manager will confer with in making the decision to approve entry into the Assistant Management Trainee program. As noted above, the District Manager is ultimately responsible for deciding who to admit into the Assistant Manager Trainee program.[24]

63. An example of the varied approval process is the hiring process for the First in Line Candidate Selection program. The District Manager or the Regional Personnel Manager interviews the candidates for these positions, but whether or not the Regional Personnel Manager approves the candidates will vary by region.[25]

c. Divisional Management Decisions

64. Like other Wal-Mart guidelines, those concerning decisions about salaried positions are guidelines only and exceptions with respect to salaried employees are approved in each sub-division. Evaluations are also conducted differently in different sub-divisions.[26]

65. Exhibit 311 to the deposition of Lisa Heilman is a memo from RPMs to Store Managers in Division A of the Wal-Mart discount stores and Supercenters. On Bates 200404, titled "Assistant Managers Rotation Plan," it says "All Assistant Managers must have rotated through the outlined areas and meet the minimum length of time criteria before being considered for promotion."[27] The minimum service length and rotation, a policy at pertinent times of sub-Division A, was not a policy for all discount stores and Supercenters in Division 1. Thus, Sylvester Johnson, RPM of Wal-Mart Region 26, knows of Assistant Managers who have been promoted to Store Manager who have not rotated to every area of the store.[28]

66. Likewise, the position responsible for making the decision to promote someone to Store Manager varies. Some Divisional Vice Presidents want to be involved. Other "Divisional" Vice Presidents leave the decision at the Regional level.[29]

III. Promotion at Wal-Mart

67. In this section we consider the promotion process at Wal-Mart and the data available to assess the use of that process. We also present the results of the analysis of that data and discuss our critique of Dr. Bendick's and Dr. Drogin's promotion analyses.

68. The employees who work for Wal-Mart have widely differing career aspirations. When assessing the promotion process, it is important to identify those employees who wish to advance into jobs that carry more responsibility.[30] Wal-Mart's job posting process offers information on the characteristics of associates who express interest in promotion, the specific types of jobs in which they are interested and the characteristics of those associates who are selected for promotion. These data are the most useful in evaluating whether or not Wal-Mart's promotion process favors certain associates over others. Our analysis of the promotion process shows that the vast majority of hourly and salaried posted positions were filled in a gender-neutral manner or women were selected more often than would have been predicted in a gender-neutral process.

[30] * * * Designated class members and plaintiff Williamson expressed that they or others they know were not interested in management positions due to the longer work hours, schedules, and/or the potential travel requirements. For example, designated class member Gayle Kellems' deposition (pp. 43:18-44:1) addresses this issue:

> Q So what was your first response to Mr. Staton when he approached you about joining the management training program?
> A That I wasn't interested.
> Q Did you tell him why not?
> A I told him I didn't – my children were little and I didn't feel I could work those kind of hours at that time.
>
> Q What kind of hours?
> A The hours that would be required of management.

Other individuals (some of whom are named plaintiffs) testified to the fact that some people were not interested in management jobs either because of the long hours or because of the possibility of relocating. See, for example, depositions of Christine Kwapnoski (pp. 287:7-288:18 and 301:13-302:6), Karen Williamson (pp. 199:1-200:19), Geanette Bell (pp. 85:7-86:12), Frances Jackson (pp. 133:19-134:4), Katheryn Johnson (pp. 247:8-248:9), and Angela Horton (pp. 242:2-243:1 and 244:12-16).

A. Methodological Background

69. Plaintiffs' experts have determined in this case that applicant flow data should not be used to analyze promotions. Instead, Dr. Bendick attempted to develop a benchmark of managers at 20 companies outside of Wal-Mart so that he could infer whether promotion decisions were neutral by comparing this external benchmark against the total number of managers on Wal-Mart's EEO-1 reports. Dr. Drogin, on the other hand, chose to arbitrarily define a source of applicants (all associates in a particular job and store (or job and district)) and use the female representation of that arbitrary source to compare to the composition of promoted associates. These attempts to analyze promotions are flawed. Dr. Bendick's analysis does not provide an analysis of promotion at all. Dr. Drogin's analysis does not reflect the process used and has defined an applicant pool with a female representation that is generally larger than the actual applicant pools reflected by Wal-Mart's posting data.

1. Plaintiffs' Expert's Use of Applicant Flow Data in Previous Cases in this District

70. Plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Bendick, opined before this District in 1997:

> One common way to establish a standard of availability is to tabulate the representation of the group of interest (in this case, women) among actual applicants for employment. In the absence of factors skewing the group's > representation among applicants. Labor economists favor such a standard because it reflects a variety of factors affecting the attractiveness of the job, such as the exact location of the work site and the precise nature of the jobs being offered, that are difficult to model with data from sources such as Census data. However, it is not possible to use such "applicant flow" data unless the employer has systematically retained records of applications received, including the gender of applicants.

(Bendick Depo. Ex. 9, his report in Butler, et al. v. Home Depot, Inc., Case C 94 4335 (SI), C95 2182 (SI), N.D. Cal., 3/20/97, pp. 2-3.)

71. Dr. Bendick's Supplemental and Rebuttal report in that same case is noteworthy with respect to two points. First, Dr. Bendick criticized the employer's expert for presenting an availability that "does not reflect the vast majority of actual sales associate hiring at Home Depot" and opined that it therefore was "not a reasonable standard of availability."[31] Second, Dr. Bendick informed the court that he was able to produce "a more refined standard of availability" from a partial sample of 1,121 actual Home Depot job applications he had, than he could from the less refined availability he had been able to produce using Census data.[32]

[31] Deposition of Marc Bendick, Jr., ("Bendick Depo."), Ex. 12, p. 9 (emphasis added).

[32] Bendick Depo., Ex. 12, pp. 2-3, 8 (emphasis added).

72. Here, Wal-Mart has systematically retained records of about 580,000 actual applications received for hourly promotions and about 56,000 electronic expressions of interest in promotion to salaried management jobs since 1997, and its databases reflect the gender of most of those applicants. In addition, Wal-Mart's first 2003 Assistant Manager Trainee job posting generated approximately 30,000 candidates for advancement to the training program leading to promotion into salaried management, and their gender also is known.[33] The gender composition of the applicants to Assistant Manager Trainee data in 2003 (44% female in the first posting and 41% female in the second) is close to the percent females among the applicants for one of the feeder jobs - Support Manager (46%) - for the entire period.

2. Plaintiffs' Experts Omitted Applicant Flow Analysis from their Reports in This Case

73. Plaintiffs' experts, Drs. Bendick and Drogin, had these records of actual applicants for promotion at Wal-Mart, and Dr. Drogin analyzed the records in detail, although he did not report the results in his report. According to records found in his computer back-up and authenticated by him at his deposition, Dr. Drogin found that women were selected at a higher rate than their rate of application. Stated differently, the female representation among bidders is consistently less than the proportion of offers women associates received for the salaried jobs that Dr.

Drogin analyzed using the posting data from MCS.[34] A copy of that table is presented below:

E. A summary of MCS bids is given below. The percentage of women bidding for Store Manager is around 11%. Based on preliminary Peoplesoft promotion studies, the feeder pools foro Store Manager are approximately 20%.

74. As Dr. Drogin's table shows, the percentage of women among those offered management positions is consistently greater than the percentage of women among those who bid for each of the positions. For example, in 2001, 13% of the applicants for Store Manager were women, while 18% of those offered Store Manager jobs were women. 14% of the applicants for Co-Manager in 2001 were women, while 25.4% of the offers went to women. And, 30.9% of the Assistant Manager applicants and 33.9% of those offered positions were women. Year after year, Dr. Drogin's analysis shows that overall, women are selected at more favorable rates than men. Although Drs. Bendick and Drogin had this most relevant information, they omitted all of it from their reports.

B. Job Posting for Promotion to Hourly Positions

1. The Posting Process and Data

75. As noted earlier, Wal-Mart associates are primarily hourly employees and a large proportion of those employees are employed on a full-time basis. When opportunities for advancement to hourly supervisory and office hourly positions become available, Store Managers generally now post the vacancy in the Job Posting system so that interested associates within the store in which the vacancy exists can apply for the opportunity if they are interested.[35] A position is not posted if it is going to be filled by a lateral move, but if that lateral move creates a vacancy that will not be filled laterally, then the new opening is generally posted.[36] Hourly associates use the CBL (Computer-Based Learning) computers on which they are trained to see the postings and to apply for the positions they desire.[37] Associates can learn of postings in stores other than their own by visiting those stores or contacting the store management of the other store if they are interested in relocating.[38] All employees with at least 6 months in their current position are eligible to "post" (i.e., apply in response to a job posting) for a vacancy, as long as they do not have any documented "coaching" (i.e., disciplinary memo) in the last 12 months and their last evaluation was not below standard.[39]

76. In 2003, an additional call went out to all Wal-Mart hourly associates informing them of a nation-wide opportunity to express an interest for positions as an Assistant Manager Trainee. This position is a promotion for hourly associates to a 16- or 17-week training program that usually leads to placement as a salaried Assistant Manager upon successful completion of the program. The response to this call is also available for our analysis and is described in a separate section below.

77. Suffice to say, there is considerable information available on Wal-Mart Discount Store and Supercenter associates who expressed an interest in hourly positions and the Assistant Manager Trainee program, as well as the selection results of those postings. The rest of this section focuses on the Job Posting prior to the 2003 request for interested applicants to the Assistant Manager Trainee position.

C. Implementation of the Job Posting System

78. This Job Posting System is a system that was (and is) used by associates and managers in most of the stores on a frequent basis – especially between 1998 and the present. On average, using the entire set of job posting data women constituted 68% of the applicants for these postings for higher-level hourly jobs and received 70% of the offers. The Job Posting System has non-blank entries for about 2,700 stores with approximately 530,000 applications that match known associates between December 28, 1998 and September 30, 2002.[40] The available data show that during this period, the average store had

[40] The number of applications from December 28, 1998 through September 30, 2002 is the following: 1998 (937), 1999 (71,280), 2000 (133,009), 2001 (180,763), and 2002 (148,275). The plaintiff's hourly promotion claims, as expressed in their motion for class certification (filed after my report and deposition) now have redefined boundaries. Their class certification motion indicated that they are seeking certification with respect to events from December 26, 1998 on and are particularly focused on promotions to Support Manager. Therefore, we have produced only the promotions that fit within that time frame but using exactly the same methodology as before. The promotion analysis results from my original report (covering a longer period of time) are contained in Appendix C-1 through C-6 and F-1.

198 applications in its posting data and made an average of 39 offers for closed postings. Almost 45% of the stores had 50 or more postings and more than 85% of the stores had more than 10 postings in the Job Posting System in this period.

79. In order to determine whether these promotions are consistent with a gender-neutral process, we compare the gender composition of those who applied for each position to the gender composition of the offers made. We perform this analysis for each posting and then sum the results of the postings. The next section describes the data available and the results of the analysis of that data.

D. Description of the Job Posting Data

80. The posting system data had entries for 28 different job codes – including many job codes that had more than 5,000 applicants when all the stores were examined. The jobs in the posting data included Department Manager (101), Support Manager (1050), Customer Service Manager (510), Lead Customer Service Manager (511), Grocery Reclamation Manager (603), Personnel and Training (606), and Training Coordinator (607).[41] The Store Managers used this system to inform associates about vacancies in the relevant hourly managerial or relevant higher-level hourly jobs.

81. As noted above, there were many applicants for the posted hourly positions. Approximately 88% of the positions had more than one applicant and over 60% of the positions had more than 3 applicants. In fact, 42% had more than 5 applicants and 15% of the hourly positions had more than 10 applicants. The associates participated actively in this job posting system. The average number of applicants for a posting was about 5 and, for the most popular jobs (listed in the prior paragraph) there were, on average, between 4 and 7 applicants for each posting. For example, across all the stores there were 296,674 applicants for vacant Department Manager/Team Leader (101) positions and 59,493 offers made from December 28, 1998 through September 30, 2002. There are approximately 2,000 vacancies for Department Manager (903), that attracted almost 10,000 applicants. The Support Manager vacancies had 41,005 applicants and approximately 7,000 offers (an average of more than 5 applicants per opening).

E. Methodology for Analyzing the Offers for Posted Hourly Positions

82. The applicants for each job posting are evaluated, interviewed and, in some cases, offered a position. * * *[42] In order to properly determine whether the selections for these posted vacancies were made in a gender-neutral manner, the postings in each store are analyzed separately. For example, if the gender composition of the candidates for positions in a store was 60% female (3 of the 5 candidates were women), then we would predict that the selected individuals had a 60% chance of being a woman and a 40% chance of being a man.

[42] * * *

83. For each store, we determined whether the selections made from each job posting were gender-neutral. We calculated the difference between the predicted number of offers to women and the actual number and then calculated the probability that the observed difference could have occurred by random chance. If the probability of occurring by chance is less than 5%, then the observed difference between the actual and predicted number of female selections is considered to be statistically significant.[43]

F. Job Posting Results for Support Managers December 28, 1998 through September 30, 2002

84. As noted previously, Plaintiffs' Motion for Class Certification redefined the time period for which they were seeking class certification and focused on promotions to Support Manager. Therefore, we examine here the selections of Support Managers for positions filled from December 28, 1998 through September 30, 2002. The below table shows that [43] Social scientists and statisticians have used a criteria of less than 5% or less than 1% probability of occurring by chance ("greater than two or three standard deviations") to categorize a result as "statistically significant" for over 75 years. See, for example, Statistics by Freedman, Pisani, and Purves. Courts adopted this standard in voting rights cases (e.g., Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. 482, 97 S. Ct. 1272 (1977)) and carried the standard over to equal employment issues in such cases as Hazelwood School District v. U.S., 433 U.S. 299, 308 n.14 (1977) and Teamsters v. U.S., 431 U.S. 324; 97 S. Ct. 1843 (1977). See also, EEOC v. Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, 698 F.2d 633 (4th Cir. 1983), where the Court indicated that only a difference greater than 3 standard deviations confirms an inference of adverse disparity.

there were 41,005 applications for 6,831 Support Manager offers during this time frame. In each full calendar year, there were more women selected than would have been predicted given their representation among those who applied for these positions. As shown in the table below, every year shows more women selected for the Support Manager openings than predicted. Overall, the database shows 3,225 women who were offered Support Manager positions from December 28, 1998 through September 30, 2002. This is 79 more than predicted by female representation among the bidders – a difference that is statistically significant at more than 2.44 standard deviations.

85. Plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Drogin, does not have any basis to believe that the female composition of those who bid for the posted Support Manager positions is any different from the interested applicant flow for the Support Manager jobs that were not posted.[44]

G. All Hourly Job Posting Results by Store

86. We can also examine this analysis of promotion decisions by looking at the sum of all the decisions made for the positions posted for each store. The sum of all of these decisions for each store helps us to determine whether or not all the stores have a similar overall result. This examination shows us that there were 2,694 stores in which offers were made during the time period described in plaintiffs' Motion for Class Certification. Of the stores in which offers were made, more women were selected than predicted by women's presence in the applicant pools in 1,692 stores. There were statistically significantly more women offered positions during this period in 67 of these stores. There were 814 stores in which more men were selected than predicted and in only 5 of those stores were more men selected than women at a statistically significant level. Overall, approximately 1,785 more women were selected than predicted by their application rate – a result that is statistically significant and represents more than 22 standard deviations in favor of females. These results are not adverse to women and there is not a pattern of shortfalls in offers to women across all the stores.

87. There is a difference in selection rates among the stores, with some over-selecting men and some over-selecting women. On average, women were over-selected in the job postings by almost one person per store. But the variation among the stores results in some stores selecting even more women and others selecting fewer. These results are consistent with the fact that decisions are made at the store level by thousands of different Store Managers. The results of the individual store analyses can be found in Appendix G-1.

H. All Hourly Job Posting Results by Job

88. The analysis of job postings provides even more information when we sort the job postings by job code. There were 27 job codes for which offers were made – most of which were either hourly management or office positions. In 23 of the 27 job codes, more women were selected than predicted by their presence among the applicants for these postings. In twelve of these job codes, Wal-Mart made statistically significantly more offers to women than predicted. The jobs for which more women were selected than predicted included Department Manager/Team Leader, Support Manager, and Grocery Reclamation. There were three job codes in which fewer women were selected than their applications for these postings would have predicted. Only one of these (the TLE Service Manager) was statistically significantly adverse to women. The results for each job code are presented below. In this – as well as in other tables in this report – we have used a double asterisk to identify analyses in which more women were promoted than predicted and the results were statistically significant.[45]

[45] A single asterisk identifies analyses in which more men were promoted than predicted and the results were statistically significantly adverse.

89. These data show that even for significant hourly management positions – like Support Manager, Department Manager/Team Leader, and Customer Service Manager – there were more positions filled by women than predicted from their representations among the applications for those positions. This is true, too, for the Support Manager position, which seemed to Dr. Drogin to be a significant hourly management position.[46]

I. All Hourly Job Posting Results by Department

90. In addition to examining these posting analyses by store and by job we also examined whether there were any patterns adverse to women by department within the store. The results of the analysis of offers made in the stores varied by the department in which the vacancy was posted, as shown in the table below. Some departments had more opportunities than others but the postings in most departments resulted in more women being promoted than predicted by their application rate. In 52 of the 74 departments, the number of offers to women were more than predicted by their application rate and 28 (54%) of these were statistically significantly more favorable than the predicted number. Two departments show no difference between the predicted and actual number of women promoted. The remaining 20 departments showed fewer offers to women than predicted but only six of these were statistically significantly different from the predicted number.

J. All Hourly Job Posting Results for "Male" Departments

91. The plaintiffs claim that the job posting process encourages and exacerbates departmental differences in female representation. Dr. Drogin presented employment data by department in his report that showed that women were 64% of all associates in departments with 5,000 associates or more.[47] We examined the hourly job posting results for the departments in that list in which the percent women was less than 64%. The below table shows that when we limit the analysis to these "male" departments, females were offered positions at a rate that is not statistically significantly different than predicted by the rate at which women apply to posted positions in these departments. Of the 17 departments with a female representation less than 64%, three (3) resulted in females being selected at a rate significantly greater than their application rate and five (5) departments showed female selections significantly lower than their application rate. For 9 departments, the results were neutral. As such, it is not surprising that the overall result is gender-neutral at 1.15 standard deviations but there were 77 more female selections than predicted in this group of "male" departments. This result does not support the argument that women are kept out of departments with proportionately fewer women than the "average" department through the Job Posting system.

[47] The departments with at least 5,000 employees and a female representation rate less than the company-wide average were identified from Table 14 of Dr. Drogin's February 2003 report.

[2] A positive number in this column indicates that there are more female selections than predicted.

* Statistically significant

 Statistically significant in favor of females

92. The finding that there is no significant difference between the actual and predicted number of female selections for departments in which the female representation is lower than 64.0% indicates that there is no evidence to suggest that females are being channeled away from male departments. In fact, these results suggest that females are being selected at a rate consistent with the rate at which they apply to positions in these departments. Proportionately fewer women choose to apply to some departments than others.

K. All Hourly Job Posting Results by Job and Department

93. In some situations at Wal-Mart the same job code may have a different description and different responsibilities depending upon the department for which the position was being filled. Therefore, in order to be certain that our analysis by job code was not contaminated by combining all the openings for the job, regardless of department, we also conducted an analysis of offers controlling for department and job code simultaneously. This permits us to examine, for example, all of the department manager offers made, but separately by department. The results of this analysis are consistent with those discussed above. For the hourly job posting process, there were 38 department/job code combinations with a statistically significant result in favor of women, compared to only 5 department/job code combinations that were statistically significantly adverse to women. Overall, women were offered more of the positions in 72 of the 105 job code/department combinations than predicted by their representation among those who applied for the positions.[48] As noted above, more than half of these 72 "female-favorable" job code/department combinations were statistically significantly favorable to women.

[48] The detailed calculations for each department/job code combination are found in Appendix D-1.

[49] The total of positive and negative results may not always equal the number of stores, or the number of stores with results, because some stores show zero difference between males and females.

94. When all of the job postings for all the stores in all districts and all regions are all aggregated, there are 2,223 more female job offers than expected in a gender-neutral process when controlling for department and job code. This favorable result for females is highly statistically significant at 21.44 standard deviations. The probability that a favorable result such as this would occur by chance is less than 1 in 1 trillion. These results do not support the claim that the job posting system reflects a decision process that is adverse to women. They also are not consistent with the claim that departmental decision-making creates adverse results for women.

L. Department Mobility

95. While it is certainly the case that hourly employees apply for promotions to positions within their current department, most hourly promotions involve some kind of cross-department move. We know that 80% of all Job Postings applications are for jobs outside the applicant's current department consistent with an open system at Wal-Mart that allows associates to move to areas that interest them. There are, of course, opportunities for advancement within each employee's own department, too. For example, about 67% of the applicants for hourly supervisory jobs in Department 990 (Front End) applied for positions within that same department. In the aggregate, men (at 80.5%) are more likely than women (at 79.4%) to apply for a job outside their own department. However, while this difference is statistically significant, it is also relatively small in magnitude. There are significant differences in these cross-department application rates from one department to another. For example, in 16 of the 74 departments women apply for cross-department positions at a rate statistically significantly higher than men. There are 8 departments in which men applied to positions in a department different from the one that they are in at a statistically significant level. Women are more likely than men in certain departments to post to other departments. Women post to other departments at a higher rate than men when they are in Players and Electronics, Sporting Goods, and Produce. Men are more likely than women in the same department to post out of their department if it is the Front End, Health and Beauty Aids, or Domestic Goods. Preferences for certain departments are not the same for men and women associates.

M. 2003 Assistant Manager Trainee Program Selections

1. Introduction[50]

96. In January 2003, Wal-Mart announced at meetings of associates at every shift in all the stores that hourly Wal-Mart and Sam's Club associates who were interested in promotion to the Assistant Manager Trainee program (also known as "AMT") could apply for openings to be filled during February and March 2003. Each store also posted posters reminding associates to apply. During the seven-day application period – spanning the two "work weeks" in which the posting was open – there were 30,430 associate applications. 44% of those applicants for Trainee positions at Wal-Mart Discount stores and Supercenters were women; 41% of applicants for Trainee positions at Sam's Club were women; and women were 44% in the first posting and 41% in the second of all applicants from every store type at Wal-Mart.

97. The percentage of females who voluntarily expressed interest in promotion to Assistant Manager Trainee positions (44% in the first posting and 41% in the second),[51] is similar to the proportion of women (41%) among those promoted into the Assistant Manager Trainee positions in the five years prior to the inception of this program.

[50] The description of the Management Trainee Application Process comes from the Wal-Mart documents attached as Appendix C-7 to this declaration.

[51] Women comprised 41% of the 11,037 employees applying for the second Assistant Manager Trainee posting in April – May 2003. See Declaration of David A. Scott, ¶ 14.

2. The Application Process

98. Wal-Mart and Sam's Club stores asked the associates who expressed interest in the Assistant Manager Trainee position to complete a questionnaire designed to collect information on their job preferences for advancement to the Assistant Manager Trainee position. The questionnaire, called the "Assistant Manager Job Preference Survey," was available to all hourly Wal-Mart associates and provided an opportunity for them to express their interest in moving into Wal-Mart store management. The questionnaire was distributed and collected electronically and the resulting data are referred to as the Management-in-Training job posting data (AMT data).

99. The questionnaire consists of three sections. First, the Management Trainee and Assistant Manager job requirements are listed and the applicant indicates whether or not she/he has the ability to perform the essential functions of the position. The second section contains five minimum criteria questions:

- You must have 1 year of retail experience with the company and/or a prior employer.
- You must be in your current position a minimum of 6 months.
- You must have a minimum evaluation rating of meets expectations.
- You must NOT have an active written coaching in your personnel file.
- You must be 100% current on your training.

100. In order for the associate to be accepted as a "qualified" management candidate, he or she must answer in the affirmative to all of the questions in these first two sections. As one would expect, rejection of any of the position requirements or failure to meet the minimum criteria for the job means the associate is not offered a management position. The final section of the questionnaire contains general questions of the applicant, such as language skills, education level, retail management experience, and grocery experience.

3. Analysis of Assistant Manager Trainee Selections

101. The 30,430 Assistant Manager Trainee applications in the first posting came from 18 different job divisions, 99 different job department/division combinations, and 157 different job code/division combinations. Tables in Appendix C-8 and C-9 present the counts and female representation of applications overall, by job division, by job department/division combination, and by job code/division combination.

102. The representation of female applicants varied greatly among the job divisions from which applicants came. For the job divisions from which at least 100 applicants came, the range of female representation among the applicants went from 15.9% (Supercenter – Dairy/Frozen) to 93.1% (Wal-Mart Jewelry).

103. For Wal-Mart Discount stores and Supercenters, the female representation among applicants in the first posting was 44% and was 41% in the second posting, while the female representation among the Sam's Club job division (Division 18) was 41%. However, the overall representation among applicants for the Assistant Manager Trainee program was 44% female in the first posting and 41% in the second posting.

104. There were a total of 1,392 offers made as part of this process in the first posting.[52] Of those who received offers, 824 (or 59.2%) were female. For all Wal-Mart stores, there were a total of 1,154 offers, of which 714 (or 61.9%) went to females. For Sam's Clubs, there were 238 offers, of which 110 (or 46.2%) went to females. In the second posting, which is only for Wal-Mart Discount Stores and Super-Centers, there were a total of 150 offers, of which 70 (46.7%) went to females.

105. The descriptive statistics in the prior paragraphs were supplemented with a statistical analysis of the AMT data to determine if statistically significantly different numbers of men and women received management training offers. We found that women were selected, (i.e., offered management trainee posi-

106. As the above table shows, overall (without examining each of the divisions separately) a gender-neutral process predicted there would be 613 female selections in the first posting. Instead, 824 women were offered management positions. The difference between actual and expected female selections is statistically significant in favor of females at a level of 11.66 standard deviations.

107. In every job division except "Optical Center" women were selected at a rate that was greater than predicted by their application rate or consistent with their share of the applications submitted. These results reflect the fact that the gender composition of applicants varied among the job divisions but, nevertheless, we find 5 out of the 18 job divisions with more women selected at a statistically significant rate than predicted and all but one of the rest consistent with a gender-neutral selection process.

108. For Wal-Mart applicants, the neutral model predicts 512 women selected for the program even though 714 women were offered this entry-level management position. The difference between the actual and expected female selections at Wal-Mart is also statistically significant in favor of females at a level of 12.22 standard deviations.

109. For Sam's Club applicants, 98 female selections to the program were predicted and 110 women were offered the entry-level management position. While the difference between actual and expected female selections is not statistically significant (1.71 standard deviations), females were still selected at a rate greater than their representation among interested candidates.

110. When we aggregate the analysis across the various job divisions, but still control for job division, we find that the results still highly favor women, with 199 more women selected than predicted and a difference that is greater than 11 standard deviations in favor of women from the predicted result.

5. Results by Job Department/Store Type, and Job Code/Store Type

111. Since the female representation among applicants differs greatly based on the job department and job of the applicant, we also conducted analyses in which we looked at all the applicants for each store type by the job and by the department from which the applicant came.

112. We can examine applications from each job department as well as from each specific job code. With the exception of Sam's Club selections controlling for job code (which are gender-neutral), the results favor women and the probability that the aggregated results would have occurred by chance is very small (e.g., statistically significant). The tables below present these results.

Assistant Manager Trainee Analysis, by Store Type Controlling for Job Department[55]

Sam's Clubs	30	20	0.5	11	1	9	3

[55] The total of positive and negative results may not always equal the number of departments, or the number of departments with results, because some departments show zero difference between males and females.

[56] The total of positive and negative results may not always equal the number of job codes, or the number of job codes with results, because some job codes show zero difference between males and females.

113. The results of the analysis of the Assistant Manager Trainee database are consistent with the results of the Job Posting and the MCS analyses in the sense that Wal-Mart's promotion patterns are statistically significantly favorable to women when compared to the female representation among those who express interest in the positions.

6. Selections of Qualified Applicants for the Assistant Manager Trainee Program

114. In the above analyses, the pool of employees eligible to be selected was defined as anyone who had applied to this Assistant Manager Trainee program. We conducted additional analyses on the Assistant Manager Trainee database where the pool of eligible employees is defined as those who passed the five minimum qualifications and eleven job requirement questions described above.

115. Women were 43.6% of all the qualified applicants for the Assistant Manager Trainee program in the first posting. In the Wal-Mart Division 1 stores, women make up 47.5% of the applicants who are qualified. For Sam's Clubs, the female representation among those who are qualified is 40.6%. Our analysis of selections for the AMT program from the pool of qualified employees produced results that are also consistent with the results described in the earlier analyses. Women are selected at a rate that is statistically significantly greater than predicted by their representation among the applicants. The details of the statistical analyses are contained in Appendix D-2 through D-6 of this declaration.

N. Selections for Management Positions from the MCS Data

116. Wal-Mart's salaried associates may also indicate their interest in management vacancies using the Management Career Selection (MCS) process that allows salaried managers to apply for openings in Co-Manager, Store Manager, District Manager and, occasionally, Assistant Manager openings. Most Assistant Manager positions are filled by placement of Assistant Manager Trainees who have completed their training program and not through promotion from other positions.[57]

117. The Management Career Selection affords an opportunity for managers who are interested in an open salaried position to have the opportunity to discuss and learn about the position. This enhances the ability of Wal-Mart to promote from within.[58] Management is responsible for maintaining the integrity of the system, following up on the postings and encouraging qualified candidates from their area of responsibility. Interested associates examine the postings, criteria and assessment through the CBL. The positions are posted for interest throughout the company but candidates must meet specific criteria to be considered. All applicants who wish to be considered for a promotion or transfer will be required to use the MCS.

1. Results of MCS Job Application Process

118. For the entire time period covered by this database, the data show that almost 56,000 applications were submitted for more than 5,300 openings for which an offer was made during the period from November 10, 1997 to October 17, 2002. Approximately 90% of the postings had more than 2 applications per vacancy and the average number of applications per vacancy (for all postings) was greater than 10. This average number of applications for each opening varied from one job to another. For example, an average of approximately 13 applications were made for the average Supercenter Store Manager posting but approximately 3 applications were made for each Assistant Manager posting.

119. Between December 27, 1998 through October 17, 2002, there were over 46,000 applications to more than 4,400 salaried management positions in the MCS database. The table below shows the results of my statistical analysis of female selections to salaried management positions for this time period. The table shows that females were selected at a statistically significantly greater rate than predicted from their representation among those who applied. This result holds true for each full calendar year and when the results for each year are aggregated. Overall, there were almost 200 more female selections than predicted – a difference that is statistically significant at 9.81 standard deviations.

120. These same analyses may be organized by job to determine whether the selections for each job were consistent with the respective gender application rates for the postings. In every job but three, women were selected at or greater than their representation in the postings would have predicted. The table below shows that positions of District Manager (for Division 1), Store Manager (for Division 1, including Supercenters) and Co-Manager (for Supercenters) all had statistically significantly more women selected than would be predicted by their application rate. In only three jobs (Tire and Lube District Manager, Vision Center Regional, and Internal Audit) were women selected at a slightly lower rate than predicted. The difference between the predicted and actual number for these three jobs taken together was 2 women. In all three cases, this difference was not statistically significantly different from a neutral selection process.[59]

[59] My first report conducted this same analysis for the entire time period covered by the MCS database. The results are consistent with those discussed above. The table containing these results is found in Appendix C-12.

121. These results show that there are no statistically significant selection decisions adverse to women across all the postings for any of the salaried jobs posted. In fact, for most of the salaried managerial positions, women are selected at a statistically significantly higher rate than predicted by their application rate for those positions.

2. Applicant Preferences for Mobility by Gender

122. The MCS data also permit us to examine whether there are gender differences in the willingness of applicants to post for positions in regions other than their own. We found that 63.3% of male applications and 50.2% of female applications are made to regions that are different from the region in which they worked at the time of their application. The difference in the region mobility rates between women and men is statistically significant: men show a greater willingness and interest in relocation. When we look at the analogous proportions by MCS Job Slot we also find several statistically significant differences between the male and female proportions, including both Store Manager Job-Slots and both Co-Manager Job-Slots.

123. The table below shows the comparison of the percentage of females who choose to apply to jobs outside the region to the percentage of males who choose to apply outside of the region. There is a statistically significant relationship between gender and whether or not someone applies to a different region for the following jobs: Co-Manager-Supercenter, Co-Manager-Div. 1, Store Manager-Div. 1, Store Manager-Supercenter, District Manager-Div. 1, and District Manager-Jewelry/Shoes.[60]

124. In every instance where the difference in cross-region application rates is statistically significant, the percentage female was less than the percentage male among those seeking a position outside of their current region.[61] These data support the fact that even women and men who apply for managerial positions do not have the same preferences for certain types of jobs when moving from one region to another is required.

3. Comparison of Selections in MCS and Selections in Global PeopleSoft

125. In his report, Dr. Drogin, plaintiffs' expert, dismissed the use of the MCS data because he believed the data to be incomplete and he questioned whether the system was unbiased. In Tables 20 and 21 of his report, he compares the counts of moves in the MCS system to the counts of moves he found in the Global PeopleSoft database. Although the MCS counts for the jobs included in Dr. Drogin's tables are close to the counts of moves in the Global PeopleSoft database for Store Manager, he dismisses this finding because he believes, apparently, that the application system is biased, although he did not substantiate this belief in his report.[62]

126. In order to understand whether or not the MCS was biased, as Dr. Drogin claimed, we compared the gender composition for the three major

[61] My first report conducted this same analysis for the entire time period covered by the MCS database. The results are consistent with those discussed above. The table containing these results is found in Appendix C-13.

"jobs" from the MCS database to the gender composition for the analogous moves in Global PeopleSoft data. If women are selected at the same rate in both sets of data then it does not seem reasonable to claim that the selections in the MCS data were biased or the application rate is not representative of female/male interest without evidence that the applications were systematically understating women's interest in those jobs in some way. I have not seen any support for that proposition.

127. For the purpose of this comparison, we concentrate on the jobs with the most selections (excluding District Manager).[63] These are:

[63] In the MCS data we identify all moves that meet three criteria. First, the "offer indicator" must be equal to "Y." Second, the job slot must equal one of 5 job slot values corresponding to Store Manager, Co-Manager, or Assistant Manager. (Job Slots 2 and 6 are associated with Store Manager. Job slots 7 and 16 are associated with Co Manager. Job slot 5 is associated with Assistant Manager.) Third, the date range is restricted to a beginning date of 12/27/98 and an ending date of March 8, 2002 (the last effective date in the GPS data used by both parties for their analyses).

Moves in GPS are selected based on four criteria. First, the employee moves from one store to another, or his or her "action code" or "action reason" is equal to "PRO." Second, only jobs within Division 1 are included. Third, we only include job codes which correspond to Store Managers, Co Managers, and Assistant Managers, while the pool is restricted to cases associated with Division 1. (While MCS has the "job slot" variable, GPS utilizes the "job code.") We selected the job codes which were subsets of the 3 "job slots" and used those to select the three types of Managers in our GPS pool. For example: the job codes 40000, 40100, 40200 and 40400 all correspond to the MCS job slots 2 (Store Manager Div. 1) and 6 (Store Man – Supercen-

- Store Manager - Div. 1 and Supercenter
- Co-Manager - Div. 1 and Supercenter
- Assistant Manager - Div. 1 and Supercenter

128. The table below presents the gender composition of those who were selected for these jobs by gender for both MCS (jobs filled through bids) and Global PeopleSoft (all salaried jobs filled, whether posted or not) for the period December 27, 1998 through March 8, 2002.

ter)). Fourth, the effective date of the move lies between Dec. 27, 1998 and Mar. 8, 2002. Nov. 24, 1997 is the first date on which an offer and an acceptance was made in the MCS database. Mar. 8, 2002 is the last effective date in the GPS database used by the parties in this case for their analysis.

Comparison of Moves, Management Career Selection Data versus Global PeopleSoft Data from December 27, 1998 through March 8, 2002

	# of Moves per Management Career Selection Data				# of Moves per Global PeopleSoft Data
Job Slot	Total	Male	Female	% Female Among MCS Moves	Total	Male	Female	% Female Among GPS Moves	# of Standard Deviations
Store Manager	3,050	25,536	514	16.9%	3,333	2,747	586	17.6%	0.77
Assistant Manager	135	97	38	28.1%	32,585	21,382	11,203	34.4%	1.61
Co-Manager	151	119	32	21.2%	5,884	4,588	1,296	22.0%	0.25

129. The data show that females constituted 16.9% of the moves into Store Manager positions filled through the MCS database, compared to 17.6% of the moves in the Global PeopleSoft data. A test of proportions indicates that this difference in percentages is not statistically significant. The selection rates for the Co-Manager position are nearly identical (21.2% and 22.0%). In none of these three jobs is the gender distribution among moves statistically significantly different between the two databases.

130. There are many reasons why the number of moves in the Global PeopleSoft database might not be the same as those in the posting system. The Assistant Manager position, as noted earlier, is generally filled by Assistant Manager Trainees and those moves would not be entered into the MCS process. Likewise, many of the moves into Co-Manager are lateral moves or moves by Store Managers in smaller stores so they may also not be included in the posting system.

131. The issue in this matter should be whether or not the differences between these two lists are affecting the gender distribution of the successful candidates. As noted above, there are no statistically significant differences in the gender distributions of the selections identified in the MCS data and recorded in the job histories. These results support our belief that the MCS database is a reliable source of information and appropriate for purposes of analyzing applicant flow data and the availability of women for these jobs.[64]

4. Results by Store Size

132. Finally, in order to respond to plaintiffs' claim that women are channeled into smaller stores when they are promoted we conducted the same analysis by job opening and job slot and aggregated the results to store size category so that we could determine if women were statistically more or less likely to be selected for stores of a certain size.[65]

133. The store size category variable was constructed using store square foot data made available to both plaintiffs' and defendant's experts by Wal-Mart. For each job slot the range of job opening store sizes was split into 3 equal-in-size sub-ranges. Each job-slot / job opening was assigned a store size category based on which sub-range the job opening store square footage fell into.

134. Our analysis of the promotions for each job slot/job opening was then sorted and aggregated by store size. We found that women were selected at a higher rate than their presence in the postings would have predicted in all three store size categories. In fact, all three store size categories (small, medium, and large) had statistically significantly more women selected than would be predicted by their application rate. These results show that there are no statistically significant selection decisions adverse to women across all postings and for each job slot store size combination.[66]

[64] The table containing the results for the entire time period covered by MCS is found in Appendix D-7. The results are consistent with those discussed above.

135. An alternative way to define large and small stores is to use the 60,000 square foot boundary sometimes referred to in Wal-Mart compensation documents to define salary groups for management associates. We assigned each job slot/job opening to one of two size categories – "Large" (60,000 + sq. ft.) or "Small" (less than 60,000 sq. ft.) – and then aggregated the results of the analysis of selections for each job slot/job opening. The result was a total number of female promotions predicted and the actual number promoted for Large stores and Small stores. The table below presents the results of this analysis.

†A positive number in this column indicates that there are more female selections than predicted.

 Statistically significant in favor of females

136. The results are consistent with the original size measures. In both store size categories and overall, women are selected at a statistically significantly greater rate. For small stores, there were 44 more women selected than predicted by their representation among those who applied for Store Manager positions at smaller stores (for a difference of 5.82 standard deviations in favor of women). For large stores, the difference between actual and predicted female promotions is 88. This difference is also statistically significant at more than 5.56 standard deviations in favor of women.

137. The results of these two analyses do not support the claim that women are being channeled into small stores and that men are being channeled to the large stores.[67]

O. Summary of Promotion Results

138. Our examination of the actual promotion processes used in Wal-Mart for hourly employees and for salaried employees focused on the applicant flow data sets that Wal-Mart keeps in the normal course of business. We examined the hourly job posting data, the Management Candidate Selection process and the 2003 Assistant Manager Trainee data. These data all included information on who expressed interest by bidding/posting for jobs, the jobs that were open, and the selections made for those positions. These analyses of the job posting, Assistant Manager Trainee, and MCS data show that women are promoted at a higher rate than predicted by their representation among those who applied.

139. The job posting and MCS systems have been used regularly by stores. Approximately 580,000 associates have posted for the higher-level hourly positions and more than 80,000 applications have been submitted by associates for the Assistant Manager Trainee and salaried positions since the beginning of 1997. Our analysis shows that women have fared very well in these systems. Whether we consider the results at a store-by-store level (in which there were some stores with significant adverse results but most significant results favored women), job code level, department level, or nationwide – the results are the same. Women were more likely to receive the promotions they sought than were predicted by their presence among applications when selections are made in a gender-neutral environment.

P. Response to Dr. Richard Drogin's Promotion Analysis

1. Dr. Drogin's Analysis of Promotion

140. Dr. Drogin reported an analysis of promotions to four positions – hourly Support Manager, Management Trainee, and salaried Store Manager and Co-Manager. His analysis ignored pertinent data for these positions and made assumptions that were not consistent with the promotion decision process at Wal-Mart.

- His analysis failed to provide information about promotion decisions at the decision-maker level.

- He ignored all of the applicant flow data collected and maintained by Wal-Mart — including the more than 520,000 applications of associates for hourly management and office positions, the more than 55,000 applications to the Management Candidate Selection program and the 30,000 applications to the January, 2003 Assistant Manager Trainee program and, instead, identified his own "pool" of associates who he believed were "available" for promotion.
- He ignored some of his own analysis that showed that the female percentage of bidders was lower than the female representation among those promoted.
- He also ignored the results of his analysis by region, store type and Specialty Divisions which showed that differences between men and women, when examined at less aggregated levels than the entire company, were largely statistically insignificant.
- He defined promotions based on his definition of a "lower" job from which a promoted person had moved even though those "promotions" included moves that were lateral moves. He also excluded moves that actually were promotions.
- He assumed erroneously that male and female associates in the same job and store (or district) were equally likely to be interested and qualified for the position, without regard to the type or amount of their experience, and their interest in or their availability for the position.[68]

2. Dr. Drogin Did Not Provide Information on Whether the Promotion Decisions Had a Common Pattern Across All Decision-Makers

141. All of the promotion analyses produced by Dr. Drogin focused on whether there was a difference between the number of women promoted and the number predicted by their presence in Dr. Drogin's artificial pool. He did not provide any information on what the individual Store Managers' decision patterns were. Instead his analysis was based on incumbents in historical feeder pools and relied on an approximation of who might be interested in each position with no clear indication as to who made the promotion decisions. He provided no promotion results in his report for the individual decision-makers as to whether or not they were adverse to women. As a consequence it is not possible to use his analysis to determine whether there are many Store Managers or District Managers who made promotion decisions with no statistically significant differences between the predicted and actual number of women to be promoted or many Store Managers making decisions adverse to women.

142. Dr. Drogin's promotion analysis, using his inappropriate availability pools for Manager and Co-Manager, presents results that are aggregated across the entire company, even though these decisions are made at the district and region level by District or Regional Managers who operate in separate reporting structures for each store type. Dr. Drogin also makes no effort to determine whether the outcomes of hourly management promotion decisions by Store Managers are sufficiently similar that the decision-making process can be determined to be a common system across all associates, all stores, all districts and all regions.

[68] Drogin Declaration, p. 27, ¶ 41.

143. When we examine the hourly promotion data from the job posting system in accordance with the decision-making structure of Wal-Mart we find that over 90% of the stores made promotion decisions that were not statistically significantly adverse to women associates in those stores.

3. Dr. Drogin Ignored All of the Applicant Flow Data for Hourly and Management Jobs in His Report

144. Dr. Drogin ignored all of the actual applicant flow data for the entire period in his Report. Despite the fact that there is a very large set of data for three different posting systems at Wal-Mart, and the fact that the selection decisions made from among those applications are known, Dr. Drogin ignored this rich source of data on such issues as:

- Department Mobility – which showed that both men and women generally applied for positions that were in departments other than their own and also showed that the preference for specific departments varied by gender;
- Interest in Specific Jobs – which showed that men and women applied for different types of jobs but in almost every case there was no statistical difference adverse to women between the proportion of women selected and their representation among the bidders; and

- Selections to Store Manager Positions by Store Sizes – which showed that women were selected for Store Manager positions at a greater rate than their share of the applications for positions regardless of whether we examined large stores, mid-size stores or smaller stores.

145. Dr. Drogin believes that the hundreds of thousands of applications and thousands of selections made during the relevant time period were biased because, in part, there were some selections to these positions that were not posted and because he holds the unsubstantiated belief that some of the selections may have been pre-determined by management.[69] He does not know the number of those hypothetical selections. Our review of the data shows that there were many decisions made by many Store Managers, District Managers and Regional Managers. These decisions resulted in a pattern of promotion decisions that are favorable to women throughout the Wal-Mart system.

146. Applicant flow data provides information for the analysis of promotions that is more useful than information on the gender composition of incumbents in historical feeder pools because the applicant flow data more accurately identifies the actual associates interested in each position and their willingness to move into an opening that is available. Dr. Drogin, himself, has analyzed applicant flow data on occasion.[70] Often, posting systems provide better matches between the qualifications of the candidates and the jobs open because there is more available information on the requirements of the jobs.

147. Dr. Drogin, however, claims that no analysis based on applications can be reliable. He wrote: "These two systems provide no useful data for analyzing promotions into upper level hourly supervisory, and store management positions."[71] We agree that a complete dataset is useful. Here we find a very large sample of data that contains most of the promotion decisions made. It provides substantial and very useful information. There is no reason to believe that these data are not representative of all interested applicants, as described by Dr. Drogin in his deposition.[72] Certainly, there has been no evidence of which we are aware that suggests that the applicant flow data Dr. Drogin and our firm received is biased or so incomplete as to be useless.[73]

[73] In his May, 2003 rebuttal report, Dr. Drogin refers to my article in the Employee Relations Law Journal and attempts to make a connection between my opinions in that article and my use of the applicant flow data in this case (page 4 of Dr. Drogin's May, 2003 rebuttal report). However, this quote is taken out of context and misinterpreted by Dr. Drogin. My article states, "information that is collected but never verified or

4. Dr. Drogin Ignored His Own Analysis of The Posting Data Despite the Fact that It Showed that the Percentage of Female Selections was Greater Than the Percentage of Female Bidders for Almost All Jobs

148. Despite the fact that Dr. Drogin's report states that he did not believe that applicant flow data could be used, he nevertheless analyzed these applicant flow data. His results (omitted from his declaration) were consistent with our results – more women were promoted in almost every job when each posting is analyzed and then aggregated.[74]

149. Dr. Drogin attempts to support his view that the data in the Job Posting and the MCS applicant files are incomplete by making a comparison of the moves recorded in the MCS and Job Posting applicant flow data to moves he defined to be promotions in Global PeopleSoft data. In Table 20 of his report, Dr. Drogin presents the number of MCS moves and the number of Global PeopleSoft moves that he defined to be promotions (permitting any move within a two month window to be included). However, when the Global PeopleSoft moves to Store Manager in 1997 were removed from the analysis, checked for accuracy is merely useless." Dr. Drogin attempts to apply this statement to the applicant flow databases in this case. Quite the contrary, I have seen no evidence to suggest that Wal-Mart's applicant flow data (applications and offers) have not been verified or checked for accuracy.

[74] Drogin Depo., pp. 69-73, 234-237. See also ¶¶ 73 and 74 in this declaration.

the data show that fully 92.6% of Global PeopleSoft moves into Store Manager between 1998 and 2002 are also found in MCS. There are very few moves into Store Manager in Global PeopleSoft after 1997 that are not also in the applicant flow data in MCS.

150. Dr. Drogin interprets the moves he finds in Global PeopleSoft, but does not find in MCS or Job Posting, as examples of positions that are filled outside of the posting process.[75] In doing so, Dr. Drogin makes a series of questionable subjective choices. He presumes, without testing, that the Global PeopleSoft data entries are a more reliable data source than MCS for recording of promotions. Yet the likelihood of data entry errors is not known to be different between the two data sets. Certainly thousands of different people (at least one in each store) are responsible for entering information into the Global PeopleSoft database – each in his/her own way.[76] Dr. Drogin's inaccurate definition of a promotion may include examples of associates who fill jobs for which no one applied or are assigned a "holding position" from which they will move as soon as a different job vacancy occurs.[77] It also is likely that he did not include department code in his match criteria although that would be necessary to find jobs that were in the job posting data.

151. Dr. Drogin admits having difficulty in matching the Global PeopleSoft data with MCS and Job Posting data for all jobs.[78] He reported that he could find no job posting data for the Co-Manager positions in the MCS data but then admitted that the data was in his backup and identified it when shown Exhibit 8 to his deposition. Yet we find postings for over 240 Co-Manager positions in the MCS data (from October 11, 1997 to October 17, 2002) we received. The corresponding numbers for the period limited to after 1998 is more than 230. We also find over 180 offers made to applicants for Assistant Manager, even though most Assistant Manager openings are filled through the Assistant Manager Trainee program when they are not filled laterally. The corresponding numbers for the period limited to after 1998 is more than 160. Dr. Drogin's table shows 113 promotions to Assistant Manager.

152. Dr. Drogin has rejected the applicant flow data even though it is common practice to prefer applicant flow data over a contrived feeder pool when the data have not been shown to be biased and sufficient data are available. Instead, Dr. Drogin developed potential applicant pools and compared the gender composition of the promoted individuals to the percent female in those potential applicant pools.

5. Dr. Drogin's Unreported Analyses Were Not Consistent With His Conclusions

a. Dr. Drogin's Unreported Analysis of Promotions by Region

153. The promotion analyses Dr. Drogin conducted using his inappropriate availability pools apparently were performed by region and by region and year, but the details of these analyses at the regional level are not presented in his reports. Because he finds fewer female promotions in the regions than predicted by his benchmark, he determined that there were no differences by region. He failed to note, however, that many of the differences he found in the separate analyses were not statistically different from a robust process of selection and therefore did not support his conclusion that there was a pattern of adverse treatment of women by Wal-Mart.[79]

b. Dr. Drogin's Unreported Analysis of Promotions for Sam's Club and Other Store Types

154. Dr. Drogin conducted a separate analysis of promotions, using his inappropriate availability pools, for each of the four store types – Wal-Mart Discount, Supercenters, Neighborhood Markets and Sam's Clubs,[80] but he only presented the output for his separate analysis of Sam's Club and the combination of all four store types. Dr. Drogin's analysis of promotions into Manager for Sam's Club reveals results that are not statistically significant in most cases by region and year, although results are significant when combined at the regional level across years.[81] Likewise, the results of his analysis of pro-

[79] As discussed elsewhere, these results show a difference between the predicted and the actual number that is not outside the range one would expect to see if these differences occurred by random chance.

[81] See, for example, Drogin's output: prom90.b.5.reg.su motions into Co-Manager separately for Sam's Club are not significant in most cases by region or by region and year.[82]

155. Dr. Drogin's decision to conduct separate analyses for Sam's Club reflects a recognition that Sam's Clubs have independent reporting structures and very different management structures from other store types like Wal-Mart Discount stores. For example, in paragraph 62 of his Report, he reports very different ratios of Co-Manager to Manager at Wal-Mart Discount versus Sam's Clubs. However, he chose not to report his analysis for the other store types when it would have been appropriate to analyze Wal-Mart Discount separately from Supercenters and Neighborhood Markets. These store types have different criteria for promotions and different promotional opportunities that result from their different scale and range of product lines. For example, Dr. Drogin is aware of the relatively high rate of growth of jobs in food and grocery since 1996,[83] which is likely to generate different promotion opportunities and qualification requirements in Supercenters as compared to Wal-Mart Discount Stores. Nevertheless, and even though he presents Sam's Club results separately elsewhere, he lumps Sam's Club together with other Wal-Mart stores (both those that contain grocers and those that do not) in a single analysis. I see no theoretical or practical justification for this.

[82] See, for example, Drogin's output: prom90.b.9.reg.su

c. Dr. Drogin's Unreported Analysis of Promotions for Specialties

156. Dr. Drogin also conducted an analysis of promotions into Management Trainee positions for at least one of the specialties – Tire and Lube Express (TLE) – although he did not present the results in his report. In most of these undisclosed analyses, he did not find significant adverse results at the regional level, or for each region and year combination.[84] Apparently, Dr. Drogin agrees with us that the different reporting structure and the differing criteria for promotions supports the examination of analyses for each specialty in order to determine whether or not all specialties fit in the same "box." Even his own thinking that led to the separate TLE analysis supports our view that an analysis of the Specialty divisions separately from the rest of Wal-Mart is very important in resolving the class certification issues. Dr. Drogin gives no explanation for not reporting what I believe to be a closer-to-reliable analysis.

d. Large Enough Statistical Samples Will Almost Always Show Statistical Significance, Even if the Observed Differences are Extremely Small

157. The highly statistically significant results that Dr. Drogin discusses in his promotion report must be considered in light of the fact that the groups of Wal-Mart associates in these analyses are so numerous that the results are most likely to be statistically significant when all promotions are combined. This reflects the fact that large numbers of events are more likely to yield statistically significant results than small numbers of events when the analyses are otherwise the same. For example, economist and mathematician, A. H. Studenmund noted, "The mere existence of a large t-score [number of standard deviations] for a huge sample has no real substantive significance because if the sample size is large enough, you can reject almost any null hypothesis!"[85] Therefore, when working with very large datasets, it is important to analyze the decisions at the level at which they were made. It is also important, in addition to looking at the statistical significance, to ask whether any identified differences are sufficiently large to have practical significance. Many of the differences shown in Dr. Drogin's backup materials for regions and for region/year combinations are not statistically significant. Since these results were not displayed, it is not possible for the court to determine from his report whether a pattern of differences is sufficient under his analysis to warrant a nationwide class.

158. Further examples of results that are consistent with random chance include his analysis of promotions into Manager for Wal-Mart Discount Stores, Supercenters, Sam's Club and Neighborhood Markets, which, when combined are not significant in most cases by region or by region and year.[86] His analysis of promotions into Co-Manager, even for the four store types combined, show no statistically significant adverse results for women in any region or in any region/year combinations.[87]

6. The Criteria Used in Dr. Drogin's Analyses Do Not Reflect the Actual Decision Process

a. Dr. Drogin's Definition of Promotion is Inaccurate

159. There are some moves that show a change in job code or have an action or action reason code of "PRO," but may not have been promotions. In addition, some of the moves that are not so coded may be promotions. Dr. Drogin agrees that some of the moves he has identified as promotions – such as moves from Co-Manager of a large store to Manager of a small store, could be lateral moves.[88] This is particularly likely in the count of promotions to Support Manager since many associates move from lateral positions (e.g., Department Manager, pay class 3 to Support Manager, also pay class 3 (and vice versa).[89] Dr. Drogin indicated that promotional moves into Support Manager are not associated with an action or action reason code of "PRO" in the PeopleSoft data so this action code cannot be used to verify whether a move is a promotion.[90]

160. Likewise, some of the moves that Dr. Drogin does not count as promotions may in fact be

[87] See Drogin's output: prom90.a.9.reg.su.

[90] Drogin Depo., pp. 98, 108.

promotions. Dr. Drogin acknowledged that moves from a Store Manager of small store to Co-Manager of large store are considered promotions by management[91] and are likely to be promotions but will not be captured by the definition he uses and on which he bases his conclusions.[92] Even though Dr. Drogin chose to analyze moves into Support Manager, he did not analyze moves into other positions such as Department Manager and Customer Service Manager that share the same pay class (3) and level of responsibility. Dr. Drogin did not analyze these jobs because he believed that they were not as likely to be feeder jobs for those entering the Assistant Manager Trainee position.[93] In fact, however, his data show more promotions to the Assistant Manager Trainee position are from Department Manager than Support Manager.

b. Dr. Drogin Assumed that the Overbroad Feeder Pools He Defined Contained Qualified and Interested Associates for the Vacancies to be Filled

161. Dr. Drogin modeled his analysis by determining that the level of aggregation would be based on whether people moved from one store to another (in which case the district would be the unit of analysis).[94] Consequently, his Co-Manager and

Store Manager feeder pools include every associate with a similar prior job in the same district simply because these moves often result in a change in store. For the Support Manager, incumbents in the prior job and store of the promoted individuals (if their job was lower than the target job) were the availability pool.

162. Dr. Drogin's analysis of moves into management positions was based on the assumption that any differences between the number of women among the movers and the number predicted by the gender composition of the overbroad "feeder pools" he used would be consistent with adverse impact for female associates, rather than differences in legitimate qualifications and interest. For example, no consideration was given to the prior experience of the associates other than their immediately prior job. Likewise, no consideration was given to the fact that men and women were not equally likely to apply for each of the positions Dr. Drogin analyzed or that women and men might not be equally likely to want to work the same shifts or the same number of hours; nor did Dr. Drogin attempt to model the promotion decision process or analyze the promotions at the level at which the decisions actually were made.

163. The result is that Dr. Drogin assumed that for each of these promotion-related factors – such as prior experience, interest in applying for position, willingness to work the hours and any others that affected the promotion decision – men and women were distributed similarly. The applicant flow data tell us that men and women differ in their application rate. Labor market studies show that there are generally differences in men's and women's prior experience and hours preferences.[95] These data were ignored by Dr. Drogin in his analysis of promotions to and within management, even though he recognizes that differences between the gender composition of actual applicants and feeder pools can affect the meaningfulness of the results of an analysis based on feeder pools.[96] In fact, as shown in the promotion section, the representation of women in Dr. Drogin's feeder pool is much higher than the female representation in the actual pool of interested applicants for these positions.

c. Dr. Drogin's Assumption of Equal Interest Levels is Inaccurate

164. The use of "feeder pools" presumes equal interest in each opening by gender among the candidates in source pools. Dr. Drogin agrees that interest is one factor that may affect whether a person moves up to salaried positions, but does not believe interest can be easily measured, and did not examine the issue.[97] * * *[98] Table 17 in Dr. Drogin's

Report shows that those who move into management are likely to move geographically once they enter management positions. These characteristics of a management position may affect its attractiveness to men and women if views on changing residence or working long hours on a flexible schedule are not the same by gender. The data in this case suggest that these preferences are not the same by gender. Dr. Drogin's analysis of promotions fails to incorporate this information.

165. Other individual decision-making criteria – e.g., prior experience, willingness to work in the evening or on the weekend,[99] willingness to change residence etc., were also ignored in Dr. Drogin's analysis. * * *[100] He also ignored other prior experience that might demonstrate a willingness to work evenings and on weekends and ability to work longer hours. These factors are naturally considered in the decision process that determines who will be promoted. Dr. Drogin agrees that conclusions regarding adverse impact in promotions depend on proper specification of relevant control factors in the analysis.[101] In this case, Dr. Drogin's assumptions were not consistent with the actual decision-making process, nor were they accurate. The result is a seriously flawed promotion analysis.

7. Conclusions Regarding Dr. Drogin's Promotion Analyses

166. The promotion analysis Dr. Drogin produced does not reflect the promotion decision-making processes at work in the Wal-Mart stores and districts. Further, the assumptions on which the analysis is based are inaccurate or unfounded. He produced an arbitrary definition of promotion that both overstates and understates the actual promotions of individuals into management positions. He failed to consider in any way the individual criteria used by Store Managers and District Managers in making these promotion decisions, omitting such factors as amount and type of prior experience, ability to work flexible shifts and long hours, and a willingness to relocate a residence when necessary.

167. He also ignored the data sets that were specifically focused on opportunities for hourly and salaried employees by deciding that there was not any useful information in the applicant flow data, instead creating an artificial applicant pool that grossly overstated the number of women available for promotion. He based that reasoning on his belief that data appeared to be missing (largely because he inaccurately included lateral moves that generally would not have been part of the job posting system), and his assumption that the data may have been biased in some unknown way and its fairness was being challenged. There was no evidence that the data was biased of which I am aware. In fact, there is much evidence that the applicant flow data are consistent with other potential benchmarks and clearly reflected the group of associates who wanted to advance at Wal-Mart. The result of Dr. Drogin's promotion analysis is a seriously flawed model for promotion decisions that fails to describe accurately promotions into and within management.

IV. Compensation

168. It has long been recognized that a comparison of salaries between groups of employees must account for the possibility that systematic, objective, non-discriminatory differences may exist between the groups that reasonably affect their relative salary levels. For example, if it is observed that males have higher salaries than females on average, this salary difference may reflect differences in seniority, education, or other factors that the employer uses to determine pay levels.[102] In order to reach conclusions about differences in pay that are gender based it is important to compare groups of people that are similar with respect to these salary-related factors.

169. As noted in a 1991 article, "simple tabular comparisons are not adequate to show discrimination when a number of qualifications are necessary to determine salary."[103] Before we can determine whether or not there is evidence to support a conclusion of gender discrimination, we must account for the factors used by decision-makers at Wal-Mart to set salary levels and we must account for the different compensation decision-making processes found throughout the company. In other words, a comparison of salaries across gender groups must compare employees who are "similarly-situated" in terms of qualifications, responsibilities, experience, organizational units, pay class and other factors used at Wal-Mart to set compensation levels. The multiple regression process allows the researcher to identify and make comparisons among people who are similarly-situated.

A. Multiple Regressions – Background

170. The "Multiple Regression Analysis" allows a researcher to observe the relationship between a variable of interest (the "dependent" variable) and factors believed to influence the variable of interest. These potentially influential variables are called the "independent" variables.

171. For example, if a track coach is interested in maximizing the performance of the team's sprinters, he or she would collect data on the time each team member takes to run the sprint distance (the dependent variable). In addition, the coach will collect data on the factors believed to influence the runners' performance (the independent variables). Such factors may be related to diet, sleep, medical history, the number of training miles run, age, body weight, whether or not the runner also engages in weight training, etc. Once this information is collected, it would be interesting to learn, for example, whether weight training improves or hinders sprinting performance (and whether the effect of weight training on performance is statistically significant). If it is determined that moderate amounts of weight training improve a sprinter's performance, then the coach will be able to implement this into his or her training program.

172. However, suppose this person coaches high school, college, and professional runners. It may be the case that the influential factors for one group are not influential for another group (e.g., age affects professionals but does not affect high school runners). It may also be the case that the same factors are influential for all teams, but the degree of influence differs significantly from one group to the next (e.g., weight training improves scores by 4 seconds for high school runners, but it only improves scores by 1 second for college runners). Also, the difference between the high and low running times may be systematically different across groups (e.g., professional runners with substantially lower times than high school runners). If either of these situations occurs, then the coach should not combine the data from the different groups together and conduct a single regression analysis. To combine could produce seriously misleading aggregated results. Instead, the best way to summarize this data, and obtain a true picture of how each independent variable affects these runners, would be for the coach to conduct a separate regression analysis for each group of runners – high school, college, and professional.

173. Suppose also that the coach did not include age in his regression analyses, yet further studies show that age is significantly related to performance. The regressions that do not consider age suffer from a fundamental error in regression analysis called "omitted variable bias," which results in incorrect conclusions being made about the statistical relationship between the independent variables and the dependent variable.[104]

174. In the context of this lawsuit, multiple regression analyses are often used to determine questions that arise from pay equity issues. The role of the economist is to gain an understanding of the factors that influence associate compensation levels. To do so requires collecting data on the many determinants that factor into the pay decisions at Wal-Mart (these factors are discussed later). However, determinants of pay may affect different groups of employees in different ways. Thus, it is simply not sufficient to combine everyone in all of the Wal-Mart store types and the divisions within them together into a single regression without testing whether or not they should be combined in the first place. A thorough analysis requires the economist to determine whether everyone in the database should be analyzed together or whether a separate analysis should be conducted for each subgroup of the data.

From Reference Manual on Scientific Evidence, 2nd ed, West Group, 2000 "Reference Guide on Multiple Regression," Daniel L. Rubinfeld, p. 188 – "Failure to include a major explanatory variable that is correlated with the variable of interest in a regression model may cause an included variable to be credited with an effect that is actually caused by the excluded variable. In general, omitted variables that are correlated with the dependent variable reduce the probative value of the regression analysis. This may lead to inferences made from regression analyses that do not assist the trier of fact."

B. The Chow Test – Background and Example Using Wal-Mart Data

175. As the above example shows, it is not sufficient to simply throw all the different subsets of the data (i.e., all Wal-Mart, Sam's and Specialty employees) together into a single regression without testing the appropriateness of this aggregation. A statistical test, called a "Chow" test, allows the researcher to determine whether or not different subsets of the data (e.g., stores) can be combined into a single regression.

176. Since 1960[105], the Chow test has been used to determine whether some or all of the variables in the model have different impacts in subsets of data. Because it "sometimes happens that your sample of observations consists of two or more subsamples, and you are uncertain about whether you should run one combined regression or separate regressions for each subsample,"[106] the Chow test is a necessary step in analyzing data with multiple subsamples.[107] Wal-

[107] In technical terms, this test is an F-test that examines the hypothesis that some or all of the regression coefficients differ from one subset of observations to another. See Econometric Analysis, 1990, MacMillian Publish Company, William H. Green, page 218 for a complete discussion of this test. Other references to the Chow test include: William H. Greene, Econometric Analysis, 3rd edition. Mart Discount's and Sam's Club's workforce is no exception. Due to the discretion and latitude that Store Managers have in setting pay rates (within broad company guidelines) to meet the unique needs of their store's customers and operate in their local labor market, and the resulting differences in the factors that go into their decisions and the relative importance of each, it is necessary to answer the question of whether one should conduct a single regression across the entire company (as the plaintiffs' expert did) or whether one should conduct a separate regression for each subsample (i.e., divisions within stores). As noted in a leading economics textbook, "The Chow test . . . is one possible method for testing for a break in structure. A break in structure is always a serious matter because it implies that none of the statistical techniques (hypothesis testing, confidence intervals, etc.) are valid any longer. Moreover, the substantive conclusions about the system being modeled that one might wish to draw are also vitiated, to a greater or smaller extent, where this problem of a break in structure comes to the fore."[108]

177. In this matter, because Store Managers make the compensation decisions of hourly employees and because the labor market for grocery associates tends to have higher wages, we have examined whether we should separate the stores and, within the stores, the grocery units. To illustrate why this issue is important to determining whether the pattern of compensation is common across all of Wal-Mart, consider the Wal-Mart Non-Grocery Supercenter regression results for Wal-Mart Store #1 and Store #2 using the same model as described starting on paragraph 190 of this declaration. The below table shows the regression output for three of the variables in the model: gender, years since last hire, and years at Wal-Mart before the most recent hire.[109]

Wal-Mart Store #1 and Store #2 Regressions

Store	Gender Coefficient	Years Since Last Hire	Time at Wal-Mart Before Last Hire
1	-$0.20	$0.13	$0.77
2	$0.03	$0.43	$0.22
1 & 2 Combined	$0.08	$0.39	$0.31

178. The above table shows the regression results for each store as well as the results of estimating a regression that combines both of the two subsamples. For Store #1, after accounting for all other factors in the model, hourly females are paid on average 20 cents less per hour than their male coun-

---

[109] In other words, these two experience variables are constructed in such a way that the sum of the experience measures is the total amount of time an employee has been at Wal-Mart.

terparts.[110] For Store #2, hourly females are paid on average 3 cents more than males.[111]

179. The regression also indicates that Store #1 values each year of continuous service at 13 cents per hour, whereas Store #2 values each year of continuous service at 43 cents per hour. For each year of prior Wal-Mart experience, Store #1 places a value of 77 cents per hour, compared to Store #2 which places a value of only 22 cents per hour. Such differences in pay for different experience may reflect the local labor markets from which each store draws its employees and/or the variety of skills needed to provide the range of product lines for each store.

180. If the two stores are pooled together into the same database and a single regression analysis is conducted, the results are biased, misleading, and not representative of either of the two stores. The combined gender result is 8 cents per hour in favor of females, which is higher than either of the coefficients for the separate stores. If one were to examine only the combined result, then the incorrect conclusion would be that both stores favor females, thereby masking the result that Store #1 has a negative (but statistically insignificant) gender effect.

181. The differences in the way that the two stores value experience is also striking. Store #1 places a higher value on prior Wal-Mart experience (77 cents per hour per year) than it does continuous service (13 cents). Store #2, however, places a higher value on continuous service (43 cents) than it does prior Wal-Mart experience (22 cents). If one were to examine only the combined result, the conclusion would be that the two stores place a similar value for each type of experience (39 cents for continuous service and 31 cents for prior experience), again masking the substantial differences between the stores and thereby producing biased and misleading results.

[111] This difference is also not statistically significant at 0.21 standard deviations.

182. Based on the above discussion, it is not surprising that the Chow test to determine whether these two stores should be combined or analyzed separately is statistically significant (probability value of 0.01), thus showing that these two stores should not be combined into a single regression.

183. We tested to determine whether or not the stores should be combined in one equation and also whether or not the grocery units within the stores should be estimated separately. In both cases, for each of the hourly pay models reported in this declaration, the result of aggregating the stores was a statistically significant Chow test result. Therefore, I estimated a separate regression for each store and separately analyzed the grocery units. It is clear that Dr. Drogin did not conduct any such tests in his original report, his declaration or his rebuttal report, thus blindly assuming that each subsample should be combined.[112] Indeed, when we conducted Chow tests using Dr. Drogin's regression models and his databases, we found that the Chow tests results were also statistically significant, indicating that Dr. Drogin erroneously combined the data from different stores even for his models of compensation and therefore, that his models cannot produce meaningful results that can be relied upon.

V. Hourly Pay Rates

A. Decision-Making Processes for Hourly Employees

184. Prior to constructing a statistical model that can be used in analyzing pay rates for hourly employees, one must incorporate Wal-Mart's decision-making process. There are two general questions that must be answered. First, it is important to know who decides the pay levels for the hourly employees. Second, we need to understand the factors that the decision-makers rely upon when determining the pay rates for hourly employees. With the answers to these questions, the researcher is able to construct a statistical model that reflects the actual decision-making process as closely as possible, given the available data.

185. The Store Managers (at Wal-Mart Discount and Supercenters) and the General Managers (at Sam's Clubs) are responsible for setting each new hire's starting pay and making decisions about pay raises for the hourly employees in their facilities.[113] While each Division has field compensation guidelines that give general parameters about hourly employee pay, the Store Manager or General Manager (or the Specialty Department Manager in the Specialty Divisions) is given discretion to make decisions within the guidelines and in some instances to make decisions to go outside of them.

C. Hourly Pay Rate Regression Model

190. It is clear that there are multiple compensation structures and decision-making processes for hourly employees for the Division 1 stores (Wal-Mart discount stores and Supercenters) as well as Sam's Clubs. The Chow test results informed us that it was inappropriate to combine all groups of hourly employees into one regression.

191. Because of the differences in compensation structures, we conducted a separate analysis of hourly pay rates for each of the major business types: (a) Wal-Mart stores and non-Grocery Supercenter divisions,[117] (b) Sam's Club,[118] (c) the Specialty Divisions[119] and (d) Grocery divisions.[120] These business types are separable because the compensation decision-making processes are different or the labor markets are different (e.g., in Grocery units) and because the data patterns are different across units in each group. For all of these business types, the analysis of hourly pay rates is accomplished by estimating a multiple regression equation of the pay rate for each group of associates. This model equation controls for the following factors:

- Gender

- Job code[122]
- Years of continuous service (and its squared term)[123]
- Total years of service – years of continuous service (and its squared term)[123]

D. Hourly Regression Results for Wal-Mart Stores and Supercenters (Non-Grocery)

193. Because pay rates for hourly employees at Wal-Mart and Supercenter (non-Grocery) are generally established by the Store Managers, it is appropriate from a theoretical point of view to conduct a separate regression analysis for each store. The "Chow" test described above allows us to determine whether there is a statistical basis for conducting separate regression analyses because there are statistically significant different compensation structures among the stores.[135] When the structural differences between stores are statistically significant, this creates a statistical reason to estimate a separate regression analysis for each store.

[134] We estimated an alternative set of regression equations that included all hourly "management" employees, as defined by Wal-Mart. The pattern of statistically insignificant stores for these estimates was almost identical to the pattern shown in the original model.

[135] See, for example, Greene, William H., Econometric Analysis, 1990, pp. 218-224.

194. The results of the Chow tests we conducted found a statistically significant different hourly compensation structure among Wal-Mart and Supercenter (non-Grocery) stores.[136] The best way to model pay when the Chow test for combining stores is statistically significant is to estimate a separate regression analysis for each store. It is improper to combine the data for all the associates for all stores in one equation that includes these variables.

195. The table below summarizes the results of the regression analyses for hourly Wal-Mart and Supercenter (non-Grocery) employees. The first line of the table presents the results of the model of hourly pay that controls for the factors listed above. Of the 2,608 stores in the database on October 12, 2001 with results,[137] 2,421 (or 92.8%) showed no statistically significant difference in the hourly wage rates between women and men. There were 135 stores (or 5.2%) in which women had a statistically significantly lower hourly wage rate; and 52 (or 2.0%) of the stores that reported a statistically significantly positive hourly wage rate for women. The second line of the table contains a summary of the results of [136] The Chow test produced an F-statistic of 2.70, with a probability value of 0.00. When the probability value is smaller than 0.05 (i.e. 5%) the F statistic is statistically significant and the stores or units should be separated. While the size of the F statistic will vary the statistic always requires separate store-by-store estimation rather than a single equation when the probability that the F statistic is zero is less than 5%.

[138] The regression results for each store for the models with and without starting pay rates are in Appendices F-2 and F-3, respectively.

[139] The total of positive and negative results may not always equal the number of stores, or the number of stores with results, because some stores show zero difference between males and females. This also includes Division 8 (Wal-Mart Radio Grill) employees.

196. As noted above, the table's second line of data presents the results when the starting pay rates are excluded from the regression analysis. This model permitted us to determine whether the large proportion of stores with no significant differences by gender was strongly affected by including the starting pay rate variable in the model. As the table shows, however, the percentage of stores that have no statistically significant results is not much different between the two models. When controlling for starting pay, 92.8% of the stores show no statistically significant result, compared to 89.8% of the stores for the model that does not control for starting pay rates.

197. We also conducted alternative regressions which grouped the store results by store types as defined by the defendant's "alignment files" for this. time period ('2000-Sep-2002-Feb.xls' and 'Sam'sAlignments.xls') and where current grocery employees are defined using the method prescribed in footnote 124. These analyses combined all employees at a store (including Specialty Division employees, but excluding Grocery Divisions' employees). Grocery employees were run separately for the reasons previously explained. The results of these analyses (attached in Appendix C-17) are consistent with the results presented above.[140] For example, the alternative Wal-Mart non-grocery regressions show 92.6% of the stores with no statistically significant result (versus 92.8% in the above table), 5.1% of the stores with results significantly adverse to women (versus 5.2% in the above table), and 2.3% with results significantly favorable to women (versus 2.0% in the above table).

198. At his deposition, Plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Drogin, acknowledged that this statistical showing does not reflect a pattern adverse to women.[141]

E. Hourly Regression Results for Sam's Club

199. As is the case for Wal-Mart Discount Stores and Supercenters, the pay rates for hourly Sam's Club employees are established by the General Manager (again sometimes in conjunction with their subordinate managers). As before, we conducted Chow tests to determine whether the hourly compensation structures are statistically significantly different between clubs. The results of the Chow test again indicate that the clubs' compensation structures are statistically significantly different from one another.[142]

200. The table below presents the results of the regression analyses for hourly Sam's Club employees. Of the 479 clubs represented in the database on October 12, 2001 with results, 458 (or 95.6%) showed no statistically significant difference in the hourly wage rates between women and men after controlling for the factors listed above. There were 16 (or 3.3%) stores that showed a statistically significant lower wage rate for women and 5 (or 1.0%) of the hourly pay equation and did not control for starting pay rates we found that the percentage of stores that show no statistically significant result is still above 94%. Hence, it appears that the starting pay rate is not the determining factor in the result and that in almost all of the clubs there is no significant difference between women's and men's pay rates among hourly associates.

F. Hourly Regression Results for Employees in Grocery Divisions 24-28

202. Employees in Grocery Divisions 24-28 were analyzed separately from the other store types because their pay structure was significantly affected by the demand for grocery experience. In addition, there is often an emphasis on hiring people from outside of Wal-Mart with grocery experience.[145] As before, we also conducted Chow tests to determine whether the hourly compensation structures are statistically significantly different between stores and whether the grocery units had compensation structures that were statistically different from the non-grocery units. The results of the Chow test again indicate that the stores' compensation structures are

Of the 1,079 stores represented in the database on October 12, 2001 with results, 978 (or 90.6%) showed no statistically significant difference in the hourly wage rates between women and men grocery employees after controlling for the factors listed above. There were 73 stores (6.8%) that showed a statistically significant lower wage rate for female grocery employees, while 28 (2.6%) of the stores had a statistically significantly higher wage rate for women.[147]

[146] The Chow test produced an F-statistic of 2.15, with a probability value of 0.00, indicating that there is a statistically significant difference in the compensation structures between stores.

204. For the regression model that excludes starting pay rates, there is a very small decrease in the percentage of stores with no statistically significant difference between women's and men's hourly pay rates (from 90.6% to 89.0%).

[148] The total of positive and negative results may not always equal the number of stores, or the number of stores with results, because some stores show zero difference between males and females. The alternative analysis results for grocery employees are included in Appendix C-17. The regression results for each store are provided in Appendices F-16 through F-19.

G. Hourly Regression Results for Specialty Divisions

205. According to the Field Compensation Guidelines, the pay rates for hourly Specialty Division employees are established at the district level or below. Again we conducted Chow tests to determine whether the hourly compensation structures are statistically significantly different between districts. The results of the Chow test again indicate that the districts' compensation structures are statistically significantly different from one another.

206. The table below presents the results of the regression analyses for hourly employees of the Specialty Divisions.[149] For the Tire and Lube Express division, of the 314 districts represented in the database on October 12, 2001 with results, 278 (or 88.5%) showed no statistically significant difference in the hourly wage rates between women and men after controlling for the factors listed above. There were 28 (or 8.9%) of the districts that showed a statistically significant shortfall for women and 8 (or 2.5%) of the districts had a statistically significantly positive differential for women.[150]

[149] It should be noted that, because the decision making process for the Specialty division is different from Wal-Mart/Supercenters and Sam's, the Specialty division regressions are estimated by district, controlling for store. K. Harper Depo., pp. 32:14 - 34:14.

[150] The regression results for each district are provided in Appendix F-20. The Chow test resulted in an F statistic of 2.04 and a probability value of 0.00, which tells us we should estimate separate equations by district.

207. For the Pharmacy divisions, of the 344 districts represented in the database on October 12, 2001 with results, 329 (or 95.6%) showed no statistically significant difference in the hourly wage rates between women and men after controlling for the factors listed above. There were 11 (or 3.2%) of the districts that showed a statistically significant shortfall for women and 4 (or 1.2%) of the districts had a statistically significantly positive differential for women.[151]

208. For the Jewelry division, of the 147 districts represented in the database on October 12, 2001 with results, 121 (or 82.3%) showed no statistically significant difference in the hourly wage rates between women and men after controlling for the factors listed above. Fourteen districts (or 9.5%) showed a statistically significant shortfall for women and 12 (or 8.2%) of the districts had a statistically significantly positive differential for women.[152]

212. All of these results are presented in the table above. It is clear from this table that the district structure is different among the divisions. However, it is also evident that most of the units have no statistically significant differences in pay rates by gender. The estimated pay differences from these equations generally are consistent with random variation that is not correlated with gender.

213. This table also shows the results of the estimates of pay that do not include the starting pay rates. The regression model consistently demonstrates the fact that the percentage of districts with no statistically significant wage differential between women and men changes only slightly when the starting pay rate is removed from consideration. The model shows little sensitivity to the inclusion of starting pay as an explanatory factor. Regardless of how starting pay is treated, the vast majority of the Wal-Mart Stores, Supercenters and Sam's Clubs do not have a statistically significant wage differential between men and women.[157] in the above regression was for all associates who had ever been management employees because such associates often have different pay structures than the non-management hourly employees. The tables below present results that include all hourly employees who had been managers (but does not include those who had been salaried employees or those who were demoted in the last year). A comparison of these tables to those presented above shows that the inclusion of the hourly managers has very little effect on the conclusion that most stores have no statistically significant gender differences in pay. It is still the case that approximately 90% (and often more than 90%) of the stores in the regressions show no statistically significant difference between women's and men's hourly pay rates. This result holds true regardless of whether the regression model includes or excludes starting pay rate as an independent variable.[158]

I. Regressions Including Employees Who Were Ever Salaried or Ever Hourly Management

215. We estimated regression analyses that included hourly employees who had ever been salaried, those who had ever been management, or those who had been demoted in the last year. They, too, were consistent with the above results. These results are found in Appendix D-9.[159] We also estimated regression analyses for hourly employees excluding those demoted in the last year and those who had ever been management or salaried, but not excluding department managers (job code 101). Here again, the results are consistent with the above results. These results can be found in Appendix D-11.[160]

J. Plaintiffs' Claim that Job, Department, and Store Assignments are "Tainted"

216. The plaintiffs have argued in Dr. Drogin's rebuttal report (without giving any specific data to establish the point) that the use of job and department in a compensation regression analysis will bias the results because they believe that women are channeled into the low-paying jobs, "female" departments, and small stores (for managers).[161] The results from the job posting, Assistant Manager Trainee, and Manager Career Selection databases all reject or fail to support that hypothesis.[162] The results from the job posting and MCS databases show that Wal-Mart's workforce, like the national labor market as a whole, is characterized by a considerable amount of self-selection into different jobs and different departments at Wal-Mart.[163] Women have expressed concerns about hours and relocation requirements of promotions to management.[164] Women tend to apply to a different mix of departments and jobs than their male counterparts.[165] Our results consistently show that when you consider the positions and departments for which people have actually applied, women are being selected in a manner that is either gender-neutral or statistically significantly in favor of females.[166] In other words, females are being placed where they want to go. Thus there is no foundation to the claim that the job, department, and store variables are tainted adversely to females and should not be included in a compensation regression.

K. Plaintiffs' Claim that Starting Pay Rates are "Tainted"

217. Plaintiffs have also claimed that the use of starting pay rate will bias the results because that variable could be used by managers to pay women less. Our regression estimates change very little when starting pay rate is removed from the model. However, in order to investigate this issue further, I have estimated regression equations on starting pay rates, controlling for age at hire (and its squared term as a proxy for prior experience, starting full-time or part-time status, starting pay group, job hired into, department hired into, and the combination of store hired into, hire month, and year (to account for the effects of time and store on starting pay rates). The database is restricted to those between ages 16 and 90, who are assigned to a store and have a known hire date. Age at hire is a variable that assumes the same amount of work experience for men and women who are the same age. However, work histories in national data and other employment data all suggest that men and women are unlikely to have worked the same number of years even when they are working in the same type of job. (In fact, women work fewer years.) Therefore, it is likely that the use of age results in an overstatement of women's prior experience in these models.

218. The results in the tables below show, once again, that approximately 90% of the stores with employees in Wal-Mart Supercenter non-grocery divisions and 92% of the Sam's Clubs showed no statistically significant difference in the starting pay rates offered to men and similarly-situated women. Less than 6% of the Wal-Mart Supercenter non-grocery stores showed significantly adverse results to females, compared to 4.6% of the stores having significantly adverse results to males. The second table shows that 85% of the Grocery divisions in Wal-Mart and Supercenter stores had no statistically significant differences in starting pay rates by gender. There are more statistically significant adverse results for Grocery associates (approximately 13% of the stores) than in the non-Grocery estimates. However, this model does not incorporate any measure of grocery-related experience and both national data and data from the 30,000 Wal-Mart associates who applied for Assistant Manager Trainee, tell us that men are more likely to have such experience.[167] Including grocery-related experience measures in the model (which I have not done) would be likely to reduce the number of stores with statistically significant differences. Overall, these results are consistent with the hypothesis that there is no pattern common across similar units in the same business type that results in starting pay rates that are lower for women at a statistically significant level.[168]

[167] The AMT data contained responses from the applicants on whether or not they had grocery experience and grocery management experience. Men had a statistically significantly greater likelihood of responding yes to both of those questions. Men also had a greater willingness to relocate residence for a promotion. (Appendix D-14)

VI. Management Compensation Programs

219. The analysis of management compensation is more difficult than hourly pay because these associates are paid differently depending upon their position and their store type. In addition, some management associates have special compensation plans that are designed around specific problems or opportunities in their assignment. In this section I discuss some of the characteristics of these varied compensation plans and the absence of key variables for a reasonable compensation analysis.

A. Wal-Mart Division 1 Field Management Compensation

220. Store management at Wal-Mart Division 1 stores (Discount Stores, Supercenters, and Neighborhood Markets) includes the positions of Assistant Manager, Co-Manager, and Store Manager, each one of which has a different compensation plan as set forth in more detail below.[169] District Manager positions are not considered to be part of the field management compensation structure, but are part of the Home Office compensation scheme and are not considered in either plaintiffs' or my declaration.[170]

1. Assistant Managers

221. Assistant Managers receive a base salary and are eligible to receive annual performance and separate merit increases.[171] Assistant Managers who work in stores located in areas where the cost of living is higher also receive Geographical Assistance Pay ("GAP"), which is a cost of living percentage additive that is unique to the store's local labor market and is calculated on their base pay only.[172] In addition, Assistant Managers are eligible to receive a Stakeholder Bonus.[173]

222. The base salary ranges for Assistant Managers are based on the size of the store. In FY 2002, the salary range for an Assistant Manager of a store less than 60,000 sq. feet was $29,500 to $42,000, from 60,000 sq. ft. to 79,999 sq. ft. was $29,500 to $45,000, and $29,500 to $47,000 for large stores over 80,000 sq. ft.[174] Within these salary ranges, Assistant Managers' salaries depend on such factors as their experience, education, skill and expertise at the time they commenced the Management Training Program, and their performance.[175]

223. Merit increases and annual performance increases may be paid to Assistant Managers who have exhibited "exceptional performance."[176]

224. Assistant Managers are eligible to participate in the Stakeholder Bonus program offered to eligible hourly employees. Assistants who meet the eligibility criteria for the plan are eligible to receive one full share under the Plan.[177] Assistants who meet the eligibility criteria and whose current fiscal year performance rating is "exceeds expectations" (3.8 or above) are eligible to receive two full shares under the Stakeholder program.[178] Consequently, a reasonable model of Assistant Manager compensation should consider not only individual characteris-ties of experience, skill and education, where relevant, but also eligibility for stakeholder bonuses and the size of those bonuses.

2. Co-Managers

225. The Co-Manager position is usually a training position prior to being promoted to Store Manager or a larger store than a Store Manager previously managed.[179] Co-Managers, however, have a separate compensation package, including a base salary and incentive program.[180] For FYE 2002, Co-Managers had a salary range of $42,000-47,000 per annum.[181] Co-Managers who live in areas with higher cost of living are paid GAP on their base salary.[182] Co-Managers are also eligible to participate in a separate incentive plan based on the profitability of the store.[183] Co-Managers do not receive merit or performance evaluation salary increases.[184] A reasonable compensation model for Co-Managers must incorporate elements of the incentive plan that impact total compensation.

3. Store Managers

226. Store Managers are paid a base salary based on the size of their store and are eligible to participate in an incentive program. Store Managers are not eligible for merit or evaluation raises.[185] For FYE 2002, Store Managers at stores under 60,000 sq. feet received a base salary of $44,000; over 60,000 sq. feet was $50,000; and Neighborhood Markets were paid $47,000.[186] Store Managers are eligible to receive GAP calculated on their base pay, depending on the cost of living of the area in which they work. GAP is paid only on the base salary.[187]

227. Store Managers also are eligible to receive a Profit Growth Incentive based on the size of the store. The Store Manager is given an "Adjusted Net Profit" threshold and then a percentage formula that will be paid for all Adjusted Net Profit over the threshold amount.[188] Store Managers may receive a portion of their incentive compensation as a draw in their bi-weekly paycheck.[189]

228. New managers and managers sent to stores experiencing special circumstances have different and variable compensation arrangements.[190]

4. District Managers

229. The District Manager position is not considered part of the Field Management compensation structure and instead is part of the Home Office management compensation scheme.[191] Home Office management employees are placed in pay bands based on the level of responsibility and duties of the position.[192] District Managers are eligible for the Home Office Incentive Plan. The District Manager may earn up to a maximum of 32% of base salary.[193] The actual amount of incentive earned depends on the results achieved by the Company against the Pre-Tax Profit improvement goals.[194] To be eligible for payment of any incentive, the District Manager must be employed by the Company prior to November 1, and on the last day of the Plan Year, which is the Company's fiscal year. District Managers hired prior to November 1 of the Plan Year may receive a prorated share of any incentive earned.[195]

sistant Manager, each of which have different compensation plans as described below.

1. Assistant Managers

231. Assistant Managers receive a base salary plus annual performance increases and merit increases, as well as incentive compensation.[196] In FY 2002, Assistant Managers received a salary in a range from $32,000 – $47,000.[197] The General Manager in consultation with the RPM, RVP, and Director of Operations determines what the base salary will be within the above range.[198] Eligible Assistant Managers also receive GAP paid as a percentage of their base salary.[199]

232. As noted, Assistant Managers are eligible to receive merit increases and annual performance increases. Annual performance increases are based upon the employee's performance, and Assistant Managers may receive a percentage increase within an applicable matrix range.[200] Assistant Managers also are eligible to receive separate merit increases based on exceptional performance.[201]

233. Assistant Managers also are eligible to participate in different incentive plans depending on whether they are working in a regular Sam's Club, a new Club, or a Profit Improvement Club.[202] The incentive plans are based on the profitability of the Club and Assistant Managers are eligible to earn up to a maximum of $3,000 for regular SamShare or $750 for new Clubs.

234. Assistant Managers are eligible to receive incentive pay under a Profit Growth Incentive and Sales Growth Incentive Plan. The Profit Growth Incentive is based on the Adjusted Net Profit of the Club. After a $575,000 profit threshold (or $700,000 for Metro Markets) is met, the incentive earned is 0.5% of ANP for Profit Growth. Sales Growth Incentive is based on the Club's achievement of at least 3.5% sales growth. If the Club qualifies, the Assistant Manager will earn .0125% of Sales Growth.[203] New Clubs and Profit Improvement Clubs with special operating circumstances have different incentive plans.[204] acterize the plan under which these associates are paid.

2. Co-Managers

236. In FYE 2002, Co-Managers initially had a salary range of $42,000 – $47,000 per annum.[205] The upper range was increased effective 5/5/2001 from $47,000 to $50,000.[206] The Co-Manager position is usually an 18-month rotation and is a training position prior to being promoted to General Manager.[207] Eligible Co-Managers are also paid GAP on their base salary.[208] Co-Managers do not receive merit or performance evaluation salary increases.[209]

237. Co-Managers are eligible to receive incentive pay under a Co-Manager Profit Growth Incentive and Sales Growth Incentive Plan. The Profit Growth Incentive is based on the Adjusted Net Profit of the Club. After a $575,000 profit threshold (or $700,000 for Metro Markets) is met, the incentive earned is 1% of ANP for Profit Growth. Sales Growth Incentive is based on the Club's achievement of at least 3.5% sales growth. If the Club qualifies, the Co-Manager will earn .1 % of Sales Growth.

ferent Co-Manager incentive plans.[210] Characteristics of these plans and measures of the other variables that affect Co-Manager compensation should be included, where possible, to properly model the pay of associates in this position.

3. Accelerated Managers

239. Accelerated Managers are managers hired with outside experience and are usually brought in for training.[211] Their starting salary can be as high as $50,000, depending on their experience.[212]

4. General Managers

240. General Managers are the Sam's Club managers in charge of a club. In FY 2002, the base salary for General Managers was $50,000 per year or $60,000 for designated Metro Sam's Clubs.[213] GAP is paid only on the base salary.[214] General Managers also are eligible to participate in a General Manager Profit Growth and Sales Growth Incentive Plan

C. Specialty Divisions

241. Each of the Specialty Divisions, including Tire and Lube Express, Photo Center, Optical, and Pharmacy, has a different compensation plan for its Specialty Managers as set forth below.

1. Tire and Lube Express ("TLE")

242. TLE Managers were paid a base salary in the range of $29,500 to $38,000 for FY 2002.[218] TLE Managers also are eligible to receive annual per-

2. Photo Center

D. Statistical Analysis of Salaried Compensation

246. The description of the compensation plans in the preceding section makes it clear that there are multiple compensation structures and decision-making processes for salaried employees in Division 1 (Wal-Mart discount and Supercenters) as well as Sam's Clubs. Therefore, a single regression, such as the one that Dr. Drogin presented for all salaried employees, would inappropriately compare the salaried pay rates of employees who are not similarly situated. This kind of calculation results in misleading conclusions and a misspecification of the compensation analysis.

247. Given available data on store size and employees we may examine preliminary regression analyses of total compensation of Wal-Mart Discount and Supercenter Store Managers, as well as the Sam's Club counterpart, known as the General Manager. Because these Managers receive a significant portion of their compensation as an annual incentive pay award based upon the financial performance of their store or club, one must analyze the manager's compensation against the full year's performance in the facility. Thus, I have restricted this analysis to those who worked at the same store as managers for the full year. The analysis of total compensation for Wal-Mart Discount and Supercenter Store Managers, as well as the Sam's Club General Managers, controls for the following factors based upon the data available to me at this time:

- Gender
- Years of continuous service (and its squared term)
- Years at that store (and its squared term)
- Total years of service – years of continuous service (and its squared term)
- Starting Employee Type (starting hourly/salaried status)
- Number of employees at that store
- Square footage of the store
- Starting full-time/part-time status
- District
- Division
- Store profit per square foot
- Job Code
- Leave Status

248. The number of employees in a store, square footage and store profit per square foot are measures that may be correlated with the managers' incentive plan, as well as their base salary. However, these do not capture the change in net profit from one year to another ("growth") which is a factor in most of the incentive plans.

1. Store Manager Regression Results for Wal-Mart Discount and Supercenters

249. Because the compensation levels are based in significant part on decisions made by the District Managers, it is appropriate to conduct a separate regression analysis for each district when analyzing the compensation of Store Managers. However, the number of Store Managers for Wal-Mart Discount and Supercenters relative to the number of districts makes a separate analysis of districts statistically uninformative. Therefore, I have conducted a regression analysis of total compensation for Store Managers using a single regression analysis that includes estimates of the average amount by which the districts differ.

250. After accounting in my regression for the factors listed above, I find that the difference between the total compensation of men and women is not statistically significant. Men are paid an average of $157.78 a year more than similarly-situated women. This statistically insignificant difference is −0.11 standard deviations.

2. Club Manager Regression Results for Sam's Club

251. The pay rates for the Sam's Club General Managers are generally established by the Director of Operations. Again, although the decisions are made at the district level, the size of the database precludes a meaningful district-by-district regression. Therefore, I have conducted a regression analysis of total compensation for Sam's Club General Managers using a single regression analysis but controlling for district as in the Store Manager estimates.

252. After accounting in my regression for the factors listed above, I find that the difference between the total compensation of men and women is not statistically significant. The average woman is paid over $7,087 more than her male counterparts. This statistically-insignificant difference favoring women is +1.55 standard deviations.

3. Additional Information Needed for Salaried Analyses

253. Further research and data are needed to account for the multiple components of total compensation for salaried employees in the various job classifications under each of the many salaried compensation plans. It is clear that total compensation for these jobs is at least in part a function of factors that are not available in the data provided to either side. For example, the Store Managers' total compensation is based in part upon "Adjusted Net Profit" over a specified threshold, a formula-based driver of variable compensation. This formula should also be examined and considered in determining for sure whether females are being compensated more or less than similarly-situated male Store Managers or General Managers.

254. Some of the other factors that appear to be pertinent to some or all of the compensation programs for the salaried job classifications include starting pay at Wal-Mart, the amount and type of substantive and managerial experience prior to Wal-Mart, pre-Wal-Mart compensation, job history within Wal-Mart, the special challenges presented by the particular assignment and the facility at issue that impact compensation, the GAP and specific indicia of store or profit performance.

255. If appropriate factors are not included in each of the regression models for each of the pay plans, the regression models may not provide a meaningful explanation of variations in total compensation.

VII. Critique of Drogin's Compensation Analysis

A. Introduction

256. Dr. Drogin reports the results of three basic analyses of the compensation of hourly and salaried associates in his report. These analyses considered associates to be "similarly situated"[233] if they met his definition of "similar" with respect to seniority, full- or part-time status, job held, performance (in some analyses) and store.

257. Dr. Drogin's analyses are impaired because his models fail to incorporate key features of Wal-Mart's decision-making practices in their design and implementation and because he omits several critical determinants of employee compensation from his models. These analyses do not reflect the range of relationships that exist between management levels, thereby distorting the decision process. By omitting readily available data, Dr. Drogin's analyses create an over-generalized picture of the workforce that obscures legitimate differences between employees. Finally, his models do not satisfy the basic statistical assumptions of the multiple regression technique he uses, so he has improperly estimated the compensation relationship. The remainder of this section discusses these problems.

[233] Drogin Report, p. 39, 67.

B. Dr. Drogin's Compensation Models Do Not Reflect Wal-Mart's Compensation Practices or Policies

258. Dr. Drogin's models of compensation oversimplify and misrepresent the compensation plans and pay-related decisions within Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. His model leads to conclusions that do not reflect the actual decision process and, in this case, results that are inaccurate and irrelevant to the question of whether the stores and different types of businesses implement their pay decisions according to a common pattern adverse to women. A key feature of a proper modeling process for compensation is to determine the level in the firm hierarchy at which compensation decisions are made for each class of associates. Dr. Drogin's model does not even attempt to properly account for the fact that Store Managers make the pay decisions for hourly associates or that compensation plans for salaried management associates vary both within each store or club assignment and among the different salaried job classifications. This failure to properly model the compensation process at Wal-Mart produced information that cannot be used to determine whether there is a common pattern of gender differences in pay throughout Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. Dr. Drogin's results do not tell us the extent to which adverse pay decisions were made by Store Managers as a common practice among most of the stores or occurred, if at all, among only a small proportion of the Store Managers. Obviously, if only a small proportion of the Store Managers have statistical pay differences adverse to women then certifying a class that includes all stores would include a large group of stores in which the pay differences are either statistically insignificant (i.e. not statistically different) or favor women. Therefore, it is important to know what proportion of the stores has pay differences between men and women that are not statistically significant or favor women. Dr. Drogin's model is not designed to provide that information.

259. In his analysis all hourly associates in the retail stores are placed in one common regression model. As I noted earlier in this declaration, using the variables that Dr. Drogin includes in his model, the equation he estimates does not satisfy the Chow test of whether the store data may be combined. That is – the test tells us that the stores do not have the same pay structure for their hourly employees and, therefore, are too diverse, given that model, to be combined into this single equation. To accentuate the problem Dr. Drogin has even included both hourly and salaried management associates in one of his regression models. A single equation, such as Dr. Drogin estimates, that is supposed to be appropriate for all stores, is equivalent to assuming that there is one common decision-making process (presumably made at Wal-Mart headquarters) for all hourly and/or salaried retail employees. Therefore, the issue that is before the court at this stage of the litigation has been assumed in Dr. Drogin's analysis.

260. The question before the Court is whether the data show a common pattern among the Wal-Mart decision-makers of paying similarly-situated men more than women. To answer that question, we examine the pay decisions made about men and women. Descriptive statistics (such as averages and medians) and improperly constructed statistical analysis models give misleading information, not instructive results.

261. For example, take a comparison of the average wage of all men who work at Wal-Mart to the average wage of all women who work at Wal-Mart. If we were to find that the average wage for men is, for instance, $4 higher than the average wage for women, we would conclude that Wal-Mart pays men $4 more on average than it pays women.

262. Though this approach is appealing due to its simplicity, it does not tell us the full story of how wages are determined and assumes that the pattern of wages is gender neutral. Imagine how misleading this approach would be if each Wal-Mart manager across the nation made wage decisions using different criteria.

263. Suppose, for instance, that the manager at Store A pays men a lot more than she pays women. For the ease of exposition, suppose that Store A employs 3 men and 2 women. Further suppose that every man at Store A earns $20 per hour and every woman at Store A earns $10 per hour. In this case, the math is simple. The men at Store A earn an average of $20 per hour, while the women at Store A earn an average of $10 per hour. We conclude that, on average, the men at Store A earn $10 more per hour than the women earn. This conclusion is consistent with our simple comparison of average wages described above wherein men are paid more on average than are women, assuming all other characteristics are the same.

264. Now suppose that there is a second store that is managed by a person who has very different decision criteria. Suppose that at Store B men are paid less than women are paid even though their job-related characteristics are the same. Suppose that Store B employs 2 men and 2 women. Further suppose that every man at Store B earns $5 per hour and that every woman at Store B earns $15 per hour. Again, the math is simple. The men at Store B earn an average of $5 per hour, while the women at Store B earn an average of $15 per hour. We conclude that women at Store B earn $10 more per hour than the men at Store B earn.

265. What happens if we decide to combine the information about associates in Stores A and B together? To find the aggregated average wage of men for both stores, we add the wages of the men at both stores and then divide by the total number of men; we find that men earn an average of $14.00 per hour.[234] Following the same process for women, we find that women earn an average of $12.50.[235] This approach suggests that men at these stores earn an average of $1.50 more per hour than women at these stores earn.

266. The major problem with the $1.50 difference in wage rates is that it does not give us an accurate picture of the actual wage differences at either store. Store A pays men $10 more and Store B pays men $10 less. Given the aggregate average wage difference alone, we would not have known that men are compensated much better at Store A or that women are, in fact, better off at Store B.

267. Now examine the question before this Court. The most useful piece of information available is the information for each store because the store data show that women are not, in fact, paid less than men in Store B and are paid less than men in Store A. While in Store A women may have the basis for a gender discrimination lawsuit, the women in Store B do not. A disadvantage of examining only the aggregated difference is that it does not tell us about the pattern of pay decisions by store and therefore does not accurately identify the people who may be affected by decisions nor does it identify the people who make those decisions.

268. What this example demonstrates is that each store has its own set of circumstances which determine pay. In statistical terms this would mean that one would need to account for each individual store's decision process in order to capture those unique store-by-store differences. For this reason, it is inappropriate to use Dr. Drogin's method of a weighted sum of the coefficients across different regressions in order to obtain a summary measure of how wages differ between men and women. His aggregation method treats each decision-maker (in this example Store Manager) as having identical decision-making criteria and behavior and does not recognize the workplace differences that people experience in the real world.

269. We can use our simple example from above to illustrate this point. The sum of the differences between men and women in each store is $10 + (-$10) or zero. However, we know from the averages calculated above that the average difference between men's and women's wages for all associates is $1.50. Furthermore, we know that the within-store differences between men's and women's wages in these two stores are even greater (-$10 in Store A and +$10 in Store B). Summing coefficients across equations does not give us any information about the underlying differences between men's and women's wages.

270. This example illustrates the means by which Dr. Drogin sidesteps the issue of "similarly situated" – he simply assumes that it is already the case. It also illustrates the way in which seemingly straightforward calculations can radically misrepresent the situation that they claim to clarify.

271. Wal-Mart policies and practices provided in documents, depositions and the Store Manager declarations do not support Dr. Drogin's assumption. Statistical tests of the data, given his model, do not support his assumption. In our analysis we recognized that the single equation would not be appropriate because, unlike Dr. Drogin, we tested that hypothesis before finalizing our estimates. When we estimated each Store Manager's hourly pay decisions separately, we found that over 90% of the Store Managers made pay decisions that resulted in pay rates that were not statistically significantly different for men and women and the remaining stores either had pay rate differences that statistically favored women or pay rate differences that favored men.

272. It is inappropriate to use Dr. Drogin's method of summing coefficients across different regressions in order to obtain a summary measure of how wages differ between men and women. We know that simply summing the differences between men and women in each store is $10 + (-$10) or zero – no difference.

273. To illustrate that point in the context of a regression analysis we note that averages are a simplified form of regression analysis. For example, if we estimated the gender difference in wages in a regression equation for Store A the gender coefficient would be the only variable in the model. The estimated gender coefficient would have a value of (-$10) because, in Store A, a woman's wage is lower than a man's wage by $10. So, for Store A, we would see the following estimated equation:

- Wage = $20 + (-$10)*gender,
  where gender is 1 if female and 0 if male.

In this equation, the $20 represents the men's wage rate (since $20 + (-$10)*0 is $20). For Store B, the wage equation would have a gender coefficient of (+$10) because women's wage rates are $10 higher than men's wage rates in that store. So, the estimated equation for Store B would be:

- Wage = $5 + (+$10)*gender,
  where gender is 1 if female and 0 if male.

Here, the $5 represents the men's wage rate in Store B ($5 + $(+$10)*0 = $5) and the (+$10) is the difference in store B between men's and women's wages. The gender coefficient is a measure of the average difference between men and women associates in the store. Using Dr. Drogin's method of summing coefficients across equations, he would sum the two coefficients from the equations for the two stores (-10 and +10) [each weighted by 2 because there are 2 women in each store] and get the sum of these differences – or zero ($0).

274. Since the average difference between women's and men's wage rates in this example is $1.50 it is clear that the sum of the regression coefficients do not provide an accurate measure of the difference in wages between women and men in the stores when the decisions are made by individual store managers and the store managers and the associates' data tell us that the decision criteria and their relative importance varies significantly among the stores.[236] Our separate estimates of each store's pay rate differences are more balanced between adverse and favorable results because we have a set of variables in the equation that is more complete, in contrast to Dr. Drogin's model that omits major pay-related variables. Our separate store estimates more appropriately model each Store Manager's decisions.[237]

275. As discussed in Section III of this report (Description of Wal-Mart), compensation decisions for hourly field employees in Wal-Mart Stores, Supercenters, and Neighborhood Markets (Divisions 1, 8, 20, 24-28) and Sam's Clubs (Divisions 18, 59, 64) are made at the store/club level by the Store Managers. Dr. Drogin recognizes that Store Managers have discretion in setting hourly pay for prior experience and local wage variation for particular jobs, but believes it is limited since "exceptional adjustments"

[236] The statistical Chow tests show that these decisions are different based on data.

[237] See, for example, ¶197.

outside of regular pay policy must be reviewed by Regional and District Managers.[238] The suggestion that Store Managers have anything less than wide latitude in making pay-related decisions for hourly employees is inconsistent with Wal-Mart policy documents and the testimony of relevant Wal-Mart employees.[239]

276. As with hourly employees, Dr. Drogin pools all retail salaried employees into one common regression. This assumption that all classes of salaried employees (Assistant Managers, Co-Managers and Store Managers) can be pooled also violates modeling and statistical principles and is an inaccurate reflection of the decision process. Associates in these job classes are compensated in fundamentally different ways for different factors.[240] Consider a few examples of these differences.

- Unlike the other manager categories, Assistant Manager compensation is a function of a performance review.
- Unlike the Store Manager categories, an important determinant of Co-Manager pay is their pay at the previous job.
- While both Store Managers and Co-Managers receive a bonus that is a function of store profitability, the relationship between store profitability and total compensation is much stronger for Store Managers.

277. Pooling these salaried employees, with their very disparate compensation plans, results in inaccurate and biased estimates. The combination of structurally different compensation plans in one model without appropriate variables and adjustments yields a statistical result that is not valid.

278. Perhaps one of the simplest means of demonstrating the invalidity of Dr. Drogin's assumption that only two basic decision processes exist, one for all hourly employees and one for all salaried employees respectively, is to examine the compensation decisions in the Specialty Divisions of Wal-Mart listed below:

- Tire Lube Express (Division 6)
- Pharmacy (Division 10)
- Jewelry (Division 11)
- Shoes (Division 15)
- Optical (Division 30)
- Photo (Division 31)
- Hearing (Division 32)

279. Each of these Specialty Divisions contains hourly and salaried employees and has its own independent compensation decision hierarchy.[241] To consider Specialty Division employees as identical with either their hourly or salaried non-Specialty employees counterparts requires a compensation model that distorts or even ignores some of the actual decision processes at Wal-Mart. However, Dr. Drogin makes no adjustment for these associates' unique compensation structure and simply combines these Specialty Division employees with all other employees in his analysis of salaried and hourly associates' total compensation. Once again, pooling these Specialty Division personnel with the rest of Wal-Mart for either hourly or salary compensation analysis is inappropriate and leads to biased and incorrect parameter estimates.

[241] K. Harper Depo., pp. 32:14 – 34:14

C. Dr. Drogin's Compensation Analyses Suffer Omitted Variable Bias; They Omit Key Compensation Factors

280. Dr. Drogin's models fail to incorporate important factors that are part of the compensation determining process. He admitted that he is not a labor market expert and does not have opinions on those work patterns which would have provided him with a basis for understanding why certain variables are likely to be – and here are – related to compensation.[242] His failure to incorporate some of these important variables leads to estimates of gender differences that will be biased and incorrect when the factors he omitted are differently possessed by men and women associates. That is the case here.

[242] Drogin Depo., p. 467:1-13.

1. Hours Worked (Total Compensation Models)

281. Dr. Drogin does not include a measure of hours worked in the calendar year when analyzing associates' total compensation. This is clearly inappropriate for hourly employees.[243] Furthermore, this omission from the model of total compensation tends to inflate the estimated value of any gender factor included in the regression model because, on average, men worked longer hours than women at Wal-Mart, (see Appendix C-18). The variables used by Dr. Drogin to capture time worked (weeks worked and full-time/part-time) are completely inadequate to account for the fact that a full-time worker works anywhere from 28 hours a week to more than 40 hours, nor do they identify those earning overtime rates for working over 40 hours in a week.[244]

2. Seniority

282. The measure of seniority used in Dr. Drogin's models does not account for breaks in service nor does it measure time spent in different types of jobs.[245] * * *[246]

---

[243] Annual compensation for hourly employees is explicitly (formulaically) tied to hours worked. This is not the case for salaried employees.

[244] Drogin Depo., pp. 130-131.

[246] * * *

3. Leave of Absence

283. Dr. Drogin does not adjust pay rates for those who are currently on or have been on leave of absence from Wal-Mart. These associates' pay rates and total pay may be reduced as a result of time lost, lost opportunities for promotions and missed raises.

4. Full-Time/Part-Time Status at Hire

284. The current full-time/part-time status included in Dr. Drogin's models does not account for employees who changed status during the year over which annual earnings are measured.[247] Therefore the model does not capture the reason for lower earnings of associates in a part-time position for part of the year. Instead, that difference would increase the estimated difference in pay by gender in Dr. Drogin's model because women are a larger part of the part-time workforce.[248]

5. Recent Promotion or Demotion

* * *[249]

6. Prior Grocery Experience

286. Prior experience in grocery, particularly in the departments with higher skill requirements, such as the meat or liquor departments, will affect initial placement and assist in capturing the higher premium paid to attract employees with specialized grocery experience into the Supercenters and Sam's Club.[250]

7. Pay Groups

287. Wal-Mart's pay groups define to a large degree the range of values that the hourly employee's wage can take on. Clearly pay group is an important determinant of the hourly wage for hourly retail employees at Wal-Mart.[251] Dr. Drogin recognized that pay groups guide the setting of wages at time of hire[252] and he apparently experimented with the variable.[253] However, he did not include pay group in his analysis – even though he admits that it is not a tainted variable.[254]

8. Night Shift

288. It is well documented that hourly employees on the night (graveyard) shift are paid a substantial premium (e.g., $1 an hour or more in many stores).[255] Since men, on average, are more likely to be working the night shift than women, this omission is likely to overstate gender wage differences. It is not clear why Dr. Drogin did not attempt to control for this important factor in his model, as he was aware that a premium is paid for the night (graveyard) shift.[256] Indeed, he never studied gender differences in scheduling availability for different shifts.[257]

[250] An analysis of the 2003 Manager Training Program data indicates that male applicants to this program are significantly more likely than females to have had previous grocery or grocery management experience. See Appendix D-14.

9. Department

289. There are significant differences in the hourly wages paid to associates in different departments who are otherwise of the same seniority and full-time/part-time status. Therefore, it is important to adjust for department even for people in the same job (e.g., Sales Associate). This is a market reality. Plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Bendick, testified that, "[i]t's true that people selling different types of goods within the general category of sales workers often are observed to have different wage rates after controlling for things like experience and other qualifications."[258] Dr. Bendick points out that the median sales worker pay for all employers differs, depending on the goods sold, regardless of worker gender: $336 median weekly pay for apparel sales workers, $496 median weekly pay for furniture and home furnishings, $506 median weekly pay for radio/TV/Hi-Fi/appliances, $480 median weekly pay for hardware/building supply sales workers, and $458 for parts sales workers.[259] Dr. Bendick goes on to explain some of these national pay differentials: ". . . generally, economists would divide all the factors that might influence that decision into supply and demand considerations . . . . they would list things like how much knowledge is perquisite to the sales job, . . . special licenses involved in the sales job, the conditions of work, . . . whether the sales job also involves any kind of hard physical labor like lifting heavy goods or whether there are . . . alternative occupations that people doing the selling might engage in; for example, people selling hardware might also work as carpenters, . . . where people selling shoes probably couldn't have an alternative employment . . . at least [as] skilled carpenters."[260]

290. Dr. Drogin does not include any kind of department indicator in his compensation regression models, although he admits that he would not be surprised if some departments are more profitable than others.[261] He considered that department is correlated with gender and could be a tainted variable, but he did not provide any evidence of this possibility.[262] He also has no opinion as to whether men and women might have different preferences for working in different departments, such as the hosiery department.[263] Wal-Mart's job posting data show statistically significant differences in the department preferences that employees express in their job bids. See Section III.L. Since employees, far more than not, bid for jobs outside of their own departments, they do not appear to be constrained by Wal-Mart policy or actions.

10. Store Size

291. Stores that are more complex and have more revenue potential generally pay more to salaried employees.[264] Dr. Drogin does not include this relevant factor in his models of retail salaried compensation, although he did have data on the square footage of each store.[265] He believes that his store indicator control will account for differences in pay due to store size,[266] even though these indicators do not isolate the effect of store size. Small stores are not distinguished from large stores in his model. A store variable can only capture individual differences unique to each store and will not capture manager decisions affecting gender differences in pay. Group differences, like small stores or large stores, must be captured with a group variable (like store size).

11. Store Profitability

292. Managers operating Wal-Mart's more profitable stores are rewarded for this superior performance with higher compensation through payments under various Profit Incentive Plans and Profit Improvement Plans.[267] These data are readily available to Dr. Drogin and Dr. Drogin agrees that they affect manager pay, but he chose not to include such data in his analysis.

D. Dr. Drogin's Alternative Calculation Provided in His Response Report

293. The aggregation of our store-by-store results that Dr. Drogin attempted in his Rebuttal Report still provides the wrong information. It assumes first, that the appropriate question is "How big is a difference in pay rates? (a liability or damage question) when the appropriate question is "Do we see a pattern of statistically reliable differences across the stores that reflect a common practice of paying women less than men?" It also assumes that it is appropriate to combine the results of each of the individual regressions we analyzed as if they were independent variables. This is not an accurate assumption either since each of the stores have different pay distributions and his aggregation does not capture the differences between the stores in those decision processes. In fact, the only proper way to estimate the pay differences between groups of data with this much variation is to disaggregate.[268]

294. Dr. Drogin's aggregated analysis is not useful for determining whether there is a class with typicality, commonality, and numerosity. Not only is his aggregation faulty in that he double counted Specialty Divisions in his aggregation and that he used results that did not control for prior experience, but he loses the important information these equations provide about the extent to which there is a common pattern across the stores (decision-makers). His aggregation obscures the fact that more that 90% of the stores did not show a statistically significant adverse pay difference for women, and the difference he did obtain by this aggregation was only 26% of the difference computed by his own faulty estimates. Further, his estimate of the statistical significance of this estimate is faulty since it does not account for variations among the pay practices.[269]

E. Summary

295. Dr. Drogin's compensation models do not reflect the Wal-Mart compensation policies or guidelines. They do not reflect the Store Manager's practices. His models do not satisfy the statistical as-[268] "If the variances differ across groups,...,the pooling the observations will result in one biased estimate of both disturbance variances. In addition, the usual estimate of the covariance matrix of the coefficients will be incorrect. In this instance, the proper approach is to disaggregate the data and use the subsamples separately." sumptions necessary to obtain unbiased estimates. Further, these models do not provide information to the Court regarding whether or not there is a common pattern of compensation differences adverse to women, because he assumed that pattern when he combined all of the stores and store types together in single regressions. In addition to these problems, Dr. Drogin's compensation models omit many significant variables that are known to affect pay decisions at Wal-Mart and elsewhere. The omission of these variables has resulted in inaccurate and overstated gender pay differences.

---

VIII. Response to Dr. Bendick's Management "Availability Analysis

A. Introduction

296. Plaintiffs' expert, Marc Bendick, Jr., Ph.D., has offered an opinion that purports to support plaintiffs' claim that Wal-Mart has not promoted a sufficient number of Wal-Mart female employees into store and club management positions. However, he provides, instead, an attempt to measure the existence of managers in possibly comparable films. It is my opinion that the measure of availability he developed is not appropriate for comparisons to Wal-Mart retail store management and that he has not performed any type of promotion analysis.

B. Dr. Bendick Does Not Provide a Reasonable Measure of Female Availability for Promotion to Wal-Mart Management Jobs

297. Instead of using the female availability among actual applicants for Wal-Mart's jobs, Dr. Bendick computed the representation of women in the Officials & Managers jobs in EEO-1 reports that he believes 20 other companies submitted to the EEOC in 1999 and defined that statistic as the availability of women for promotion at Wal-Mart.[270] Dr. Bendick compared the gender composition of Wal-Mart's Officials & Managers in its store (and other) locations to the gender composition of the Officials & Managers at this group of 20 unnamed firms and concluded that the difference in the percentages reflected a "shortfall" of women promoted by Wal-Mart. These comparisons are not useful in making a determination for class certification since his benchmark of availability is biased and inappropriate. The representation of women employed in Officials & Managers jobs at the 20 unnamed firms does not constitute a methodologically sound sample from which to draw any conclusion about the availability of women at Wal-Mart for promotion to management positions at Wal-Mart for numerous reasons, including:

(i) The labor force from outside of Wal-Mart is not persons who could have been 'promoted' to Wal-Mart management jobs because one must already be a Wal-Mart employee to be "promoted." Thus, non-Wal-Mart employees do not constitute a reasonable pool from which to compute the gender representation among those interested, qualified and available for promotion at Wal-Mart. In this case there are extensive official Wal-Mart records of hundreds of thousands of actual applicants for such hourly and salaried management jobs filled by promotion during the period from 1997 through early 2003. The pool of actual promotional applicants for these Wal-Mart jobs reflects the best measure of availability for promotion in this case.

[270] Deposition of Marc Bendick, Jr., ("Bendick Depo."), pp. 21-22. Different unnamed firms are identified as comparators in other years analyzed.

(ii) The EEO-1 reports from which Dr. Bendick took a very small sample present an incomplete picture of managerial employees in a given industry, even when the entire database is used. Generally the only employers who file EEO-1 reports are federal contractors who have 50 or more employees or employers with 100 or more employees.[271] Dr.

[271] The EEO-1 filing instructions specifically state:

"Standard Form 100 must be filed by -

A. All private employers who are: (1) subject to Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (as amended by the Equal Employment Opportunity Act of 1972) with 100 or more employees EXCLUDING State and local governments, primary and secondary school systems, institutions of higher education., Indian tribes and tax-exempt private membership clubs other than labor organizations; OR (2) subject to Title VII who have fewer than 100 employees if the company is owned or affiliated with another company, or there is centralized ownership, control or management (such as central control of personnel policies and labor relations) so that the group legally constitutes a single enterprise, and the entire enterprise employs a total of 100 or more employees.

B. All federal contractors (private employers), who: (1) are not exempt as provided for by 41 CFR 60-1.5, (2) have 50 or more employees, and (a) are prime contractors or first-tier subcontractors, and have a contract, subcontract, or purchase order amounting to $50,000 or more; or (b) serve as a depository of Government funds in any amount, or (c) is a financial institution which is an issuing and paying agent for U.S. Savings Bonds and Notes.

Bendick estimates that more than 50% of the U.S. workforce is likely to be excluded from EEO-1 counts.[272]

(iii) To exacerbate further the small sample problem, Dr. Bendick then used the other firm data for Wal-Mart locations so that when only One or two of the films were actually present in that location the comparison would be based on only one or two firms.

(iv) Because Dr. Bendick used only EEO-1 data (and then only a small portion of that), he excluded approximately 96% of the work force holding management jobs in the retail sales field. This is observed by comparing the 178,716 individuals in Officials & Managers jobs in the sample that Dr. Bendick used for 1999 to the approximately 4,896,000 individuals employed in "Sales occupations, Supervisor and proprietors" reflected in the 2000 Statistical Abstract of the United States for 1999.[273]

(v) Although Dr. Bendick testified that retail sales in the Standard Industrial Classifications 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57 and 59 were "comparable" to Wal-Mart,[274] and he gathered the available set of EEO-1 data for establishments with headquarters in these SIC codes, he did not use most of these firms in his analysis. He arbitrarily confined his analysis to two SIC codes, neither of which is Wal-Mart's SIC Code: SIC code 53 (General Merchandise Stores) and SIC code 56 (Apparel and Accessory Stores). He then used data from only 20 companies in 1999 (as well as Wal-Mart) that he pulled from the broader "comparator" data; his data represent only SIC 53 and 56 and a very small number of the employers that filed EEO-1 reports in those SIC codes.[275] This use of an arbitrarily restricted data set in lieu of the full data set for the "comparator" SIC codes is not justified and greatly distorts the numbers that Dr. Bendick presents.

298. Neither Dr. Bendick's work nor our examination of his work can establish the reasonableness of his decision to select the 20 firms he uses and identifies as "comparable," since neither Dr. Bendick nor I know the identity of his selected "comparator" [274] "Q. . . . Why were those SIC codes selected by you?

A. What I was interested in doing was finding firms that were the most directly comparable to Wal-Mart. . . ." Bendick Depo., p. 68:4-7.

[275] The number of stores varied from one year to another but remained in the neighborhood of 20 for the years he studied. See the column for the "number of units reporting" for these SIC codes in the Table below titled, 2-Digit SIC Coded Industries Representing Wal-Mart Product Lines.

firms.[276] Thus, Dr. Bendick does not know and we cannot assess whether the firms truly are comparable and whether the jobs that those firms elect to include and not include in the Officials & Managers category of their EEO-1 reports are comparable to the jobs that Wal-Mart does and does not include.[277] In order to know whether it is appropriate to include or exclude firms from this already-limited EEO-1 dataset to obtain good comparator firms, we would need to know the following types of information about each of the firms and their data:

(i) The actual job titles, duties and qualifications of the jobs each company includes in its EEO-1 Officials and Managers category. Dr. Bendick and I have no information about these duties and qualifications for any of the jobs in the companies that he uses as comparators.[278] The specific jobs included by a given employer in that EEO-1 category can substantially affect the amount of female representation because there are vast differences in labor market availability for different types of management positions. For example, 61.8% of the personnel manager jobs in the country in 2000 are filled by women – about double the representation of women in grocery manager positions.[279] If one of the companies Dr. Bendick calls a "comparator company" has a personnel manager in every retail store and classifies that manager as an Official & Manager, an availability rate based on that firm's data cannot be comparable to Wal-Mart for purposes of the analysis that Dr. Bendick has performed because Wal-Mart does not have personnel managers coded as Officials & Managers in its stores. Thus, Wal-Mart would not be averaging into its Officials & Managers data a highly-female occupation that other companies include.

(ii) The different ways in which the companies Dr. Bendick calls "comparators" and Wal-Mart classify their department managers for EEO-1 purposes -- differences that could greatly skew the results.[280] Approximately 75-80% of Department Managers at Wal-Mart are women.[281] Wal-Mart does not classify them as Officials and Managers in its EEO-1 report, even though the EEO-1 definition includes those who: "direct individual departments or special phases of a firm's operations. Includes: . . . department managers."[282] Wal-Mart Executive Vice President Coleman Peterson, however, believes that some other firms include in their EEO-1 count individuals who perform the same functions as Wal-Mart's Department Managers.[283] Wal-Mart's EEO-1 female representation would be in the top tier of the unknown comparators that Dr. Bendick uses in his report if it similarly placed its Department Managers in the Officials and Managers category.

[280] Dr. Bendick argues that differences in reporting do not affect comparisons with Wal-Mart because the percentage female among Officials & Managers for "comparators" with the most similar managers per store or managers per 100 employees is still higher than that at Wal-Mart. Such a comparison presumes that the "comparators" are comparable to begin with and that they and Wal-Mart have similar jobs and organizational structure, despite Wal-Mart's substantially larger size (at least 3 times larger than the next largest comparator).

[281] See Table 7, Drogin Report, p. 15.

(iii) The schedules and working hours of each of the jobs. Dr. Bendick and I have no information about these issues or even about the days and hours of operation for any of the companies that he uses, but they have a marked impact on gender because, on average, women in the United States workforce show less interest in working nights (graveyard shift) and work fewer hours than men.[284] Dr. Bendick has made reference to this phenomenon in some of his research and in his deposition.[285] Salaried Wal-Mart managers, particularly Assistant Managers and Co-managers, work a lot of night shifts.[286]

(iv) The store types of the included comparator firms' establishments or of Wal-Mart. Dr. Bendick cannot determine from his data the different store types (e.g., retail clothing store; Wal-Mart Discount store; Wal-Mart Supercenter that sells meat, produce, liquor and other groceries; membership club) among Wal-Mart facilities or those of its "comparators."[287] (Dr. Bendick simply notes that each "comparator" firm is a different "mixed bag" of store types.)[288] As a consequence, he cannot take into account differences in female representation of Officials & Managers that exist for different store types. For example, as Dr. Bendick previously has opined, the availability of women for retail grocery management jobs is in the neighborhood of 37.1% according to the EEO-1 data he uses, while the availability of women for retail sales management jobs in furniture and home furnishings is 32.3%.[289] A Sam's Club membership-only club that sells gasoline at gas pumps and large appliances does not exhibit similarity of business with, nor would it be expected to draw the same applicants as, a women's clothing store.

(v) The product lines and the share of business associated with each product line as they, too, impact the pool of qualified and interested workers for jobs that handle such product lines. Dr. Bendick cannot determine whether his "comparators" sell comparable volumes or types of products that many Wal-Mart establishments sell: meat, bakery items, frozen foods, alcohol, wireless devices, electronics, guns, fishing equipment, optical products, pharmacy products, deli, floral, paint, or appliances.[290] While Dr. Bendick knew that Wal-Mart or Sam's Clubs sell food and grocery products and that managers must manage these areas, he had no idea how much time managers devote to that management, or what share of Wal-Marts have grocery product lines.[291]

(vi) The amount of EEO-1 data that the EEOC captured from employers filing EEO-1 reports but did not provide to Dr. Bendick. Dr. Bendick is aware that the EEO-1 database he uses is several years old and incomplete, but he does not know what percentage of the EEO-1 data submitted by employers to the government is missing from the database he used.[292] Specifically, he believes that the EEOC deletes records every year from employers who submit EEO-1 data in order to maintain establishment confidentiality, but he does not know what percentage of records are deleted.[293] Dr. Bendick further acknowledges the inexplicable fact the EEO-1 data for the year 2000 have substantially more deleted records than other years and, thus, may not be comparable to employment patterns in other years.[294]

[294] Bendick Depo. pp. 72-73.

(vii) The error rate in the submissions that employers make when they report their EEO-1 data. Dr. Bendick admits that there is no independent audit of the accuracy of the numbers the employers submit to the EEOC in the EEO-1 reports.[295]

299. The comparative benchmark on which Dr. Bendick bases his conclusions is a biased benchmark that created results adverse to Wal-Mart. If Dr. Bendick (1) had used actual applicant flow data for Wal-Mart positions filled by promotions (which would be the best measure of availability for those actual jobs), or (2) had broadened his choice of firms to include those in which Wal-Mart product lines fit (and which, therefore, would be more fairly reflective of persons with the requisite skills in the outside labor market), he would have found that the percentage of women promoted to management jobs at Wal-Mart from 1997 to 2003 is nearly identical to the female percentage of those who applied for the actual promotions and higher than the female percentage among Officials & Managers in those comparative industries. The remainder of this section provides a more detailed discussion of this opinion.

C. Additional Flaws in Dr. Bendick's Criteria for Selecting His Small Number of Comparators from an Inappropriate Sample

300. Dr. Bendick states that he began his analysis of women in management by "defining appropriate comparator firms as those large, multi-state retail chains that are widely recognized by Wal-Mart itself and by standard sources of business and financial information as comparable to Wal-Mart in such terms as products, services, market niche, size, scope, operational style, and expected financial and operational results."[296] In practice, however, Dr. Bendick cannot say that the companies are the ones that Wal-Mart or others deem "comparable" to Wal-Mart because, as noted above, he does not, in fact, know who they are. He selected firms based on two criteria that exclude a majority of companies from which Wal-Mart is likely to draw experienced talent for Officials & Managers jobs if it hires from the outside.[297] The two criteria Dr. Bendick used to draw his comparator firms are:

a) The firm's company-wide level record reports the firm in a Retail industry (Standard Industrial Codes (SIC) of 52-Building Materials & Garden Supplies, 53-General Merchandise Stores, 54-Food Stores, 55-Automotive Dealers and Service Stations, 56-Apparel and Accessory Stores, 57-Furniture and Home Furnishings Stores, 59-Miscellaneous Retail respectively), excluding Eating and Drinking Places (58).

b) The firm had at least 100 separately-reporting establishments in SIC 53.

301. The first criterion restricts Dr. Bendick's potential comparables to applicants from outside for jobs only in Wal-Mart Discount Stores and Supercenters, and does not provide comparators for Sam's Clubs, since no membership or wholesale industry firms (like Sam's) are included. Dr. Bendick's criteria exclude any establishments for which the parent film is in the Wholesale distribution industries (SIC 50, 51), more akin to a Sam's Club. This omission is inexplicable.

[296] Bendick Report, p. 9.

302. The second criterion implies that the number of separately-reporting establishments in each company would somehow affect the gender composition of the Officials & Managers in a given facility. However, the basis for such an implication is not articulated and is not a reasonable methodology in this case because, when Wal-Mart stores hire from outside of the company, they recruit local talent, whether it be from a single-store entity (such as a privately-owned grocery store or meat market), a small local chain, or a national enterprise, all of whom are "competitors" when it comes to hiring management talent from outside of Wal-Mart.[298]

303. When Dr. Bendick applied his two criteria listed above, he obtained a list of 20 firms for 1999 identified in the table in paragraph 22 of his report (reproduced below). This table shows that he actually included only two of the six major SIC industries he testified were "comparators" – SIC 53 (General Merchandise Stores) and SIC 56 (Apparel and Accessory Stores). He omits the other SIC industries that even he testified were "the most directly comparable to Wal-Mart": SIC 52, 54, 55, 57 and 59. Consequently, this narrow "competitor" pool that Dr. Bendick constructed at a minimum does not include reasonable comparators for Wal-Mart Supercenters, which sell Groceries, nor does it include reasonable comparators for Sam's Clubs.

304. Dr. Bendick provides no other data on any of the other criteria that he described in his report –

[299] Dr. Bendick's footnote reads: "Individual Wal-Mart retail establishments that variously report themselves in SIC 531 (Department Stores), 533 (Variety Stores), or 539 (Miscellaneous General Merchandise Stores) do not appear to be distinct from each other in obvious ways. For example, in 1999, total employees per store averaged 294 for those in SIC 531, 272 in SIC 533, and 284 in SIC 539, all within a few percentage points of each other. Moreover, between 1996 and 1999, more than 700 Wal-Mart establishments changed their SIC one or more times." (Bendick Report, p. 12, fn. 15.) Dr. Bendick, however, fails to recognize that a government employee, not Wal-Mart, assigns an SIC code to an establishment; it is not visible on the EEO-1 form for Wal-Mart to even check it. Bendick Depo., pp. 66-67. We have no information about how much information the government employee has about each facility.

such as "scope, operational style, and expected financial and operational results." Since Dr. Bendick testified that he does not know this information, his conclusions lack the requisite support.

305. Dr. Bendick's criteria identify an unduly narrowly-focused group of firms and establishments that are not conceptually likely to be similar to Wal-Mart in important ways. First, none of the 20 "comparators" that Bendick selects as "comparators" A through T have the same company-level EEO-1 SIC code as Wal-Mart: Variety Stores (SIC=533).[300] Instead, these "comparators" have EEO-1 codes of Department Stores (531), Misc. Apparel & Accessories Stores (569), Family Clothing Stores (565), and Misc. General Merchandise Stores (539), that reflect a more limited range of products.

306. Second, as noted, Dr. Bendick's criteria exclude any establishments for which the parent firm is in the Wholesale distribution industries (SIC 50, 51), more analogous to a Sam's Club.

307. Third, by focusing on the General Merchandise Stores (SIC 53), Dr. Bendick ignored the fact that Wal-Mart establishments offer a variety of product lines. Wal-Mart has indicated that these product lines require management talent from retail sales establishments likely found in other SIC codes - codes that Dr. Bendick testified were "comparable" to Wal-Mart, such as Hardware (525), Grocery Stores (541), Fruit and Vegetable Markets (542), Women's Clothing Stores (562), Furniture and Home Furnishings (571), Household Appliance Stores (572), Radio, [300] Bendick Depo. p. 152.

Television, and Computer Stores (573), and Liquor Stores (592).[301]

308. Fourth, Dr. Bendick's actual comparisons to Wal-Mart establishments were based on only one SIC code (53) and ignored comparators in the same SIC codes as those assigned to the 71 Wal-Mart facilities from (421) Trucking and Courier Services (and one facility from the Miscellaneous Food Stores industry (549)).[302] He argues that this is reasonable since he says that these facilities have a similar distribution of employees as other Wal-Mart stores.[303] He made no similar examination of and adjustments in the EEO-1 data for the companies he labels as "comparators," A through T.[304] Nor could Dr. Bendick even determine whether the Wal-Mart establishments for which he ignored differences in EEO-1 codes or which he analyzed were Wal-Mart Discount Stores, Supercenters, Neighborhood Markets, or Sam's Clubs.[305] Dr. Bendick admitted that his "comparators" A through T may have retail type establishments that could be coded as SIC 421, so he does not know if coding changes in comparator data would be appropriate.[306] In fact, more than 96% of his comparator establishments were in SIC 531, but Wal-Mart had about 20% in that SIC code and almost 70% in SIC 533.

309. The propriety of Dr. Bendick's ignoring differences in SIC codes for 71 Wal-Mart establishments (from SIC 421 to SIC 53) so that he could add more employees ad hoc to his Wal-Mart analysis, combined with his decision to restrict the SIC codes for any alleged comparators' establishments, cannot be evaluated with any reasonable degree of scientific certainty because he turned over only the records he used, not the entire EEO-1 file from which he pulled limited records. Also, as discussed above, he does not even have the identities of the companies he calls comparators.

D. The EEO-1 Data from All SIC Codes that Dr. Bendick Says are Comparable (SIC codes 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57 and 59) are More Representative, Albeit Not Nearly as Accurate, a Measure of Availability as the Actual Applicants for the Promotions in Question

310. When the EEO data are included for all retail sales SIC codes (industry groups) that Dr. Bendick testified were "comparable," the female representation among Officials & Managers (37.4%) is similar to the female representation (40.4%) of those promoted to Officials & Managers jobs at Wal-Mart Discount Stores, Supercenters and Neighborhood Markets.[307]

311. As the table's data show, the female percentage among Officials & Managers in retail sales establishments having product lines relevant to Wal-Mart's product lines generates an average availability benchmark for Officials & Managers of 36.4%. This benchmark is much lower than the 56.5%

"availability" that Dr. Bendick uses for retail Wal-Mart stores.[308]

312. This 36.4% female external labor market availability for Officials & Managers jobs in retail sales entities is consistent with information in some of Dr. Bendick's prior analyses. As noted by Dr. Bendick in his deposition, the female representation in Officials & Managers positions in various categories of retail sales establishments that cover many of Wal-Mart's product lines is much lower than the "availability" he elected to present in this report, which he restricted to a few establishments in SIC 53 and 56. In one expert report he gave for plaintiffs (Shores, et al. v. Publix), Dr. Bendick wrote that "while precise estimates vary depending on which data source, time period, and definitions is [sic] used, the representation of women among managers in the supermarket industry is between 30 percent and 40 percent for all managerial personnel within stores and between 10 and 15 percent for Store Managers."[309] (In that report, Dr. Bendick cited a Food Marketing Institute Survey that indicated the female representation of retail food Store Managers ranged from 7.3% to 15.4%.)[310] In another expert report he gave for plaintiffs (Butler, et al. v. Home Depot), Dr. Bendick calculated the range of availability of women for retail sales management trainee positions to be from 34.43% in 1990 to 40.24% in 1997.[311] In this case, however, Dr. Bendick's use of an unduly restrictive group of retail stores – fewer than those even he believes to be comparator industries – and his restriction to only 20 companies with multiple facilities in those types of retail stores – greatly and improperly increased the availability benchmark Dr. Bendick used.

313. When the EEO-1 data are included for all industries that most closely match Sam's Club establishments, the female representation among Officials & Managers of 31.7% is similar to the 33.0% representation of women selected for Assistant Manager Trainee positions at Sam's Club from December 27, 1998 through March 8, 2002, based on Global PeopleSoft data.

E. Three-Digit SIC Codes

315. We also matched 3-digit SIC industries to individual departments representing product lines at Wal-Mart and Sam's Club (based on the WM AREA_CODE field). The industries identified by the 3-digit level provide a more precise match between Wal-Mart and Sam's Club product lines and relevant outside industries. This is particularly true here where the presence of women varies widely from one industry to another. The percentage of women

F. Dr. Bendick's Conclusion is Not Supported by Appropriate Industry Data

316. After calculating the inflated availability benchmark of 56.5% for retail stores, Dr. Bendick compared that percentage to the female representation of 34.5% among Wal-Mart's Officials & Managers workforce. The difference between those two numbers, of course, is statistically significant. However, a comparison of two numbers that are not reasonably expected to be related is not an appropriate basis on which to develop conclusions. Further, his analysis does not provide a foundation for the conclusion he reaches – namely, that the "causes of Wal-Mart's shortfall are likely to be found in how Wal-Mart hires, trains, selects, assigns, treats, promotes, or retains women employees, not a lack of interested, qualified women candidates."[314] Dr. Bendick's own criteria for drawing his conclusion "with a reasonable

317. First, as noted earlier, Dr. Bendick does not have "sound data" that is accurately "representative of the phenomenon that it's purporting to represent."[316] The quality of the comparison between Wal-Mart and Bendick's selected comparators is poor because the data are unavailable to define the mix of industries and jobs at supposedly "comparator" firms. Indeed, Dr. Bendick's selected "comparators" come from only a limited share of the industries that represent product lines at Wal-Mart, thus calling into question the relevance of the selected data.

318. Second, as noted earlier, an availability benchmarking analysis does not represent the process by which promotions are filled and may be irrelevant for that reason as well. Dr. Bendick admits that his model has pitfalls, acknowledging that most – 70%, he believes – of the moves into management come from within the company – not from the outside workforce represented by his data.[317] More precise applicant flow analysis, using job posting information, will more accurately reflect the process by which Associates, including women, move into management positions, but this was not the analysis Dr. Bendick performed.[318]

[317] Bendick Depo., pp. 181-182.

319. Dr. Bendick testified that the disparity between his (unfounded) benchmark and Wal-Mart's gender composition among managers can support the extreme conclusion he drew because it is "consistent" with results of other analyses conducted in Drogin's reports.[319] In fact, however, that conclusion is based on an analysis of incumbent employees (not those promoted) as well as a set of assumptions about the data and the characteristics of Wal-Mart and his "comparators" that are completely different from anything in Dr. Drogin's report. Further, his conclusion that there is some support for his result in Dr. Drogin's report completely ignores the fact that, as he testified, MCS, hourly job posting and Assistant Manager Trainee posting data had not been analyzed by Dr. Drogin in his report.[320]

320. A more appropriate conclusion that may be drawn from this data is that the "significant" result Dr. Bendick found simply reflects a comparison of Wal-Mart to a heterogeneous group of "comparators" whom he has not established to be comparators and from which no reasonable or relevant conclusions can be drawn. Indeed, the difference reflects (i) data on companies and industries without sufficient known characteristics to assess their appropriateness as comparators and (ii) the failure to properly select comparators that reflect the variety of product lines at Wal-Mart.

[320] Bendick Depo., pp. 121-124; Bendick Depo., Exhibit 5.

G. Dr. Bendick's Analyses of Non-"Retail" Establishments are Also Inadequate

321. Dr. Bendick also compared the representation of women among managers to Wal-Mart associates in management at headquarters, in establishments with a majority of employees in Managers & Professionals EEO categories, in establishments with a majority of employees in Craft, Operatives, or Laborers EEO categories, and in establishments with a majority of employees in the EEO categories of Clerical and Technician positions. None of these positions falls within the definition of the purported class.[321] While the same flaws identified above apply to each of these analyses, this analysis is also flawed because it makes a comparison with firms that do not have the same employee distribution among the other EEO categories.

322. Relevant portions of the labor force are excluded from the benchmarks in all analyses, e.g., firms with less than 100 separately-reporting establishments in SIC 53 and other comparator SIC's (which likely would exclude from Dr. Bendick's analysis most grocery and food stores, electronics stores, furniture and home furnishings stores, lawn and garden stores, building materials stores, and sporting goods stores, to name a few that are sources of employees for Wal-Mart).

323. Dr. Bendick's comparisons between Wal-Mart and all comparator firms as a group were not made (as they should be) by including only establishments in the same Metropolitan Statistical Areas

[321] Third Amended Complaint, ¶ 14.

(MSA's), but instead are made on a nationwide basis. Dr. Bendick believes that the varying geographic location of these establishments is most likely to have a significant effect on the availability of women among jobs for clerical employees, but not for the other EEO categories.[322] However, there is no control for geographic location in his analysis of non-store establishments where the majority of Wal-Mart's clerical employees are likely to be. Nor does Dr. Bendick include a control for MSA's for the analysis of female representation among Officials & Managers at locations at which most of the employees are locally recruited and are largely Craft, Operatives and Laborer employees.[323]

H. Conclusion

324. The Motion for Class Certification in this case indicates that promotion decisions during the time frame from December 26, 1998 to the present are at issue – not initial hiring decisions. Dr. Bendick's analysis of female availability is flawed in that it does not differentiate between those women hired into management and those women promoted into management. Furthermore, Dr. Bendick's analysis does not differentiate between promotion decisions made during the time frame relevant to this litigation, versus promotion decisions made prior to the time frame relevant to this litigation. Dr. Bendick's analysis is a "static" or "snapshot" analysis that merely looks at the composition of the work force at a point in time and does not differentiate between decisions that are relevant to the time frame and those that are irrelevant because they preceded the time frame.

[322] Bendick Depo., pp. 158-159.

[323] Bendick Report, Attachment F, (4) and (5) analyses.

325. A flow analysis of the actual applicants for promotion and promotions made during the time frame relevant to the litigation is more useful to the question at issue when, as here, a reliable sample of that data is available. Dr. Bendick's analysis is flawed because it does not compare the female composition of the actual applicants for management promotions at Wal-Mart to the female composition of actual promotion decisions made by Wal-Mart during the relevant time frame. Instead, Dr. Bendick's availability analysis compares his artificially-defined and constructed external labor-force benchmarks against the female representation of Wal-Mart's Officials & Managers jobs.

326. Had Dr. Bendick used the actual applicant flow, he would have found no shortfall of women among the promotions to management jobs at Wal-Mart. Had he used all of the EEO-1 data for the retail sales Standard Industrial Classification codes that he admits are comparable, he again would have found no shortfall in the female representation of promotions to management during the limitations period.

327. Dr. Bendick's limitation of his analysis to 20 retail establishments is too narrow and his assumption that an availability analysis tells him that the "causes of Wal-Mart's shortfall are likely to be found in how Wal-Mart hires, trains, selects, assigns, treats, promotes, or retains women employees, not a lack of interested, qualified women candidates" is unsupported and unfounded.

IX. Summary and Conclusions

328. In this declaration we discussed the Wal-Mart policies and practices that guide a researcher in this field to model the actual decision-making process for promotion and for pay. The model for promotion decisions was based on the actual applicant flow data that had been submitted over the years and used in most stores throughout the country. These data showed several things:

- The promotion of women at Wal-Mart stores is favorable to women or consistent with a neutral decision process for Support Manager, for hourly management positions and salaried management positions, as well as selections for the Assistant Manager Trainee positions in 2003.

A. Hourly Promotion Analyses

- Women have been promoted into hourly management positions, such as Department Manager/Team Leader, Support Manager and Customer Service Manager at rates that exceed their representation among the 580,000 applications for such promotions.
- There were 1,692 stores in which women received more hourly management promotions than predicted by their application rates compared to approximately 800 stores with fewer women promoted than predicted. There were 67 stores in which these decisions were made that had statistically significantly favorable rates of promotion for women and only 5 that had statistically significant adverse results from December 28, 1998 through September 30, 2002.

- The first Assistant Manager Trainee program in 2003 (for the first quarter) selected 200 more women than predicted by their share of the applications (44%). There was only one job division (Optical Center) in which fewer women were selected than predicted at a statistically significant rate and 17 job divisions in which women were selected at a rate consistent with their application rate or at a greater rate.

B. Salaried Promotion Analysis

- This same favorable pattern held true when we examined the salaried positions that were filled during this period by promotion. The Management Career Selection (MCS) process had over 55,000 applications and over 5,000 promotion decisions were made.
- Women received approximately 200 more promotions to salaried positions, including Store Manager, Assistant Manager and Co-Manager positions, out of the MCS application process than expected from their application rate.
- Women were as likely as men to be promoted to salaried management positions, regardless of store size or job level.

- In a nationwide posting in January 2003, women were 44% of those who expressed an interest in entering the Assistant Manager Trainee program. During a second posting in April – May 2003, women comprised 41% of the applicants. This 41-44% range is close to the percentage promoted into that training from December 27, 1998 to March 2002: 40.4% female at Wal-Mart Discount stores and Supercenters. It is also nearly the same as the proportion of women who expressed a desire to fill Support Manager vacancies (46%) – which plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Drogin, believed was a key position for advancement to salaried management.
- The selections among those associates who expressed an interest in the 2003 Assistant Manager Trainee positions also favored women. More women were selected than predicted by their interest in Wal-Mart Discount and Supercenter stores and in Sam's Clubs.
- In summary, women were promoted into management jobs at rates that were even greater than their application rates at the store level, in the various jobs they applied for and by department.

C. Hourly Pay Decisions

329. The model for hourly pay decisions recognized, both as a result of the Wal-Mart guidelines, policies and practices, Store Manager declarations and from statistical testing, that pay decisions must be modeled at the store level. Dr. Drogin improperly assumed that all the stores could be combined into a single equation, without testing to see whether the data supported that assumption. The Chow test (a commonly used statistical test of whether the models are the same for subsets of data out of a large population) showed that his model could not be estimated with statistical reliability if all the stores' associates were combined into one data set as he did. Thus, Dr. Drogin's model suffers from "aggregation bias" and does not yield meaningful results. The application of the Chow test to my pay models also confirmed (i) that the stores should be estimated separately, and (ii) that Grocery divisions should be estimated separately by store and not combined with non-Grocery employees.

330. My pay models were developed to include a variety of factors that helped to capture the variation in the experience that associates had at Wal-Mart. Dr. Drogin's models of pay for hourly employees omitted important variables that resulted in biased estimates of pay differences between men and women. Thus, Dr. Drogin's models suffer from "omitted variables" too. When statistical estimates of pay differences between men and women were properly constructed, the data showed that there was not a common pattern of significantly lower pay for women associates in most Wal-Mart stores. At more than 90% of the stores, the hourly pay rates are not statistically significantly different between men and women – regardless of store type. Women are paid more in some of the stores in which there is a statistically significant gender difference and men are paid more in others.

- The model of pay rates for hourly employees included adjustments for the associates' job, department, measures of Wal-Mart experience, part-time/full-time status, night shift status, pay class, first performance rate and other related variables. One set of regressions included starting pay rate, and a second set of regressions excluded that variable. The results were very similar in both models.
- The male-female differences in pay rate in over 90% of the stores (non-Grocery, Grocery or Sam's Clubs) were not statistically significant. The remaining stores either paid statistically significantly higher pay rates to women or statistically significantly lower pay rates, but these stores were few in number relative to the rest of the stores.

D. Salaried Pay Decisions

331. The model for salaried employees' pay should include a variety of factors in order to capture the compensation structure at Wal-Mart. Omitting important factors in a salary model will result in biased and inaccurate estimates of differences by gender whenever those omitted factors are correlated with gender. When statistical estimates of pay differences between men and women Store Managers were examined using the available data, the results showed that there was not a common pattern of lower pay for female Store Managers in Wal-Mart stores and Sam's clubs.

- The salaried pay structure is quite complex and is greatly influenced by the incentive structure that has target profitability rates. These data and other data that measure, or are proxies for, relevant factors in the salary determination are not currently available.

- Therefore, more research is needed to more properly model the compensation systems for most of the jobs held by salaried employees.
- The total compensation of Wal-Mart Store Managers and Sam's Club General Managers is not statistically significantly different between men and women when the available, relevant factors are included in the model. Sam's Clubs women salaried managers are paid more annually than male managers by about $7,000 but the difference is statistically insignificant. In the other Wal-Mart stores the men receive an average of approximately $158 more than women annually, but that difference is also statistically insignificant.

332. Dr. Bendick did not do either a promotion analysis or a pay analysis. He constructed a measure of availability of women for manager positions that was inappropriately limited to only 20 firms, none of which he can name with certainty, and thus excluded many of the firms in industries whose products are part of the Wal-Mart product line. He does not know the names or duties of their jobs, products, hours of operation, schedules and a myriad of other factors that must be checked to determine whether they are comparators at all. Dr. Bendick attempted to use a snapshot of part of the U.S. workforce as a benchmark to suggest the expected female representation of promotions of Wal-Mart employees. However, his benchmark overstated the availability of women in this industry by a substantial amount. Alternative measures, including the applicant flow data from Wal-Mart itself, and alternative measures of the external labor force working in sales management, demonstrate that benchmarks better matched to Wal-Mart jobs are available and that Wal-Mart promotions to management jobs are similar to those more reasonable benchmarks.

333. Dr. Drogin's analysis of promotions at Wal-Mart ignored the important applicant flow data of approximately 530,000 hourly associates for hourly management and other higher-level hourly positions, 30,000 (now 41,500) associates applying for the Assistant Manager Trainee program and over 46,000 applications for salaried vacancies through the MCS during the limitations period. His artificial promotion pools inflated the availability of women and failed to model the decision process by which these decisions were made.

334. The hourly pay analysis that Dr. Drogin produced did not recognize the way in which these decisions were made, so that he failed to estimate pay differences at the store level. In addition, he assumed that the analysis of pay should include all the stores of all types together. He did not recognize that the statistical properties of the data and the appropriate model were such that he must estimate the hourly pay systems for each store (grocery and then non-grocery) separately. Consequently, his hourly pay estimates failed to produce reliable information because the models he developed did not reflect the decision process, omitted important relevant variables and failed to meet required statistical assumptions because they suffer from aggregation bias. Dr. Drogin's pay analysis for salaried employees also failed to meet the required statistical assumptions and did not accurately model the complex pay structures that are used for managers in these stores. Consequently, these estimates also fail to provide useful and accurate information about pay differences between men and women.

I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State of California and United States of America that the foregoing is true and correct.

Case No. C-01-2252-MJJ

DECLARATION OF CHARLYN JARRELLS PORTER IN SUPPORT OF DEFENDANT WAL-MART STORES, INC.'S OPPOSITION TO MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

Date: July 25, 2003
Time: 10:00 a.m.
Courtroom: 11, 19th Floor
Judge: Martin J. Jenkins

Complaint Filed: June 8, 2001
Trial Date: None Set

DECLARATION OF CHARLYN JARRELLS PORTER

I, Charlyn Jarrells Porter, declare:

1. I have been employed by Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. ("Wal-Mart" or "Company") since 1992. Since 2000 I have been in charge of the People Division for the Wal-Mart Stores Division. I became a Vice President in January 2000 and Senior Vice President in December 2000. My prior jobs in the Company include Corporate Counsel, Manager of Corporate Policy and Drug Screening, Manager of Labor Relations and Director of Labor Relations.

2. I have personal knowledge of the facts set forth herein, except where stated upon information and belief and, if called as a witness, I would and could competently testify thereto.

Introduction

3. Wal-Mart's Store Managers are responsible for hire, assignment, pay and promotion decisions affecting the hourly Associates in their stores. District Managers, with input from store-level management and Regional Personnel Managers, select Associates for entry into the Assistant Manager Trainee Program (also known as the Management-in-Training Program), Co-Manager and Store Manager.

4. These employment decisions, and the treatment of our Associates, must be consistent with Wal-Mart's fundamental principal of respect for the individual, our policies requiring equal employment opportunity ("EEO") and nondiscrimination and our commitment to diversity in the workplace.

Wal-Mart's Corporate Culture

5. Wal-Mart is a company built on three basic fundamental principles that have guided Wal-Mart in its growth and development. Foremost among these is "respect for the individual," a value that serves as the basis for nearly all of Wal-Mart's programs and policies, including those pertaining to diversity. Our Employee Handbook, a true and correct copy of which is Exhibit "A," is one of the means we use to communicate this message to every one of our employees.

6. Wal-Mart believes that having a diverse workforce is not just "the right thing to do," but a business mandate that enables the Company to better recognize, understand, and be sensitized to the wants and needs of its customers and to provide appropriate service in light of those needs.

7. In creating a diverse workforce, Wal-Mart upholds its two other basic beliefs: commitment to customer service and striving for excellence. By adhering to these three beliefs, Wal-Mart employees are expected to practice the so-called "Platinum Rule": they treat people as they believe those people would like to be treated.

8. Wal-Mart has achieved enviable results in creating a culture with a strong support for EEO and diversity. For example:

- Wal-Mart received the 2002 Ron Brown Award, the highest Presidential Award recognizing companies for outstanding achievement in employee and community relations
- The National Action Network (NAN) presented Wal-Mart with the 2002 Community Commitment Corporate Award for Wal-Mart's community involvement and diversity practices
- Latina Style magazine has named Wal-Mart one of the top 50 corporations in America offering opportunities for Latinas
- Black Collegian Magazine named Wal-Mart one of the top 20 employers of African Americans
- Hispanic Business Magazine named Wal-Mart one of the Top 25 Diversity Recruitment Programs in 2001 for its aggressive program to hire and promote Latinos

- The Wal-Mart Foundation received the NAACP 2000 Pacesetter Award for corporate leadership in the NAACP's 2000 National Corporate Campaign
- The Hispanic Association of Colleges and Universities (HACU) presented Wal-Mart with the 2000 Outstanding Private Sector Partner Award for being a leader in establishing the Wal-Mart/HACU national scholarship fund benefiting Hispanic college students nationwide
- Wal-Mart attained the prestigious 2001 Billion Dollar Roundtable Award for spending more than $1 billion with women-owned and minority-owned businesses
- Wal-Mart won the Hispanic National Bar Association's "Corporate Partner of the Year" award in 2002
- Wal-Mart is recognized as one of the leading employers of disabled people in the nation. In a most recent annual poll by CAREERS & the DISABLED magazine, Wal-Mart was ranked 13th among all U.S. companies in providing a positive working environment for people with disabilities.

Wal-Mart's EEO Policies

9. Wal-Mart's EEO policies, known as the "People Action Plan," were adopted to ensure legal compliance and proactive efforts to ensure equal employment opportunity. These EEO policies apply to Wal-Mart and all of its divisions. A true and correct copy of the current version of the policies is attached as Exhibit "B" to this Declaration. This document available to all Wal-Mart employees via our intranet, known as Pipeline.

10. Everyone at Wal-Mart is encouraged – indeed, expected – to play a role in the implementation of EEO and diversity policies. The company's "People Action Plan" begins, "We expect all Associates to demonstrate sensitivity to and respect for all other Associates and to demonstrate commitment to the company's Equal Employment Opportunity and People Action Plan objectives." See Exhibit "B."

11. Wal-Mart also takes steps to ensure that all of its employees – from entry level associates through senior management – understand their responsibilities under the EEO laws. The company's training programs incorporate its conviction that diversity and EEO are not just legal obligations, but an essential part of Wal-Mart culture. Our Coaching for Improvement Guide, our Management Career Selection Guide (addressing selections for management openings), and our Leadership Express Guidelines (that identify diverse high-potential employees) also quote and require compliance with our EEO and diversity objectives.

Wal-Mart's Communication of and Training on Its EEO and Diversity Expectations

12. Wal-Mart spends considerable time during its training programs explaining the company's commitment to diversity and to EEO laws. Like the policies themselves, the training programs are reviewed and updated regularly. Wal-Mart strives to ensure that employees at every level in the organization receive and complete their training in a timely manner. These training endeavors include:

13. Diversity Presentations by Top Management at Meetings: Wal-Mart's and SAM'S

CLUB's top executives, including Lee Scott, Chairman & CEO of Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., Tom Coughlin, Vice Chairman, Mike Duke, new CEO of the Wal-Mart Stores Division, Kevin Turner, CEO of SAM'S CLUB, Coleman Peterson, Executive Vice President of People, Jim Haworth, Director of Operations for Wal-Mart Stores, Greg Spragg, Director of Operations for SAM'S CLUB, Sharon Orlopp, the new Vice President of SAM'S CLUB People Division, and/or I raise the issue and importance of diversity at nearly every major meeting. These include holiday and year-beginning meetings (attended by all store managers and approximately half of the assistant managers), as well as shareholder, district, key leader, executive committee, and divisional meetings. Diversity goals, initiatives and accomplishments are discussed at other meetings as well.

14. New Associate Orientation: New associates are introduced to Wal-Mart culture and diversity policies, as well as EEO laws, in part by new associate orientation. This includes an introduction to the Associate handbook, videos – both in-store and broadcast, daily meetings and posters, and Computer-Based Learning ("CBL") modules that first were developed and introduced in the mid-1990s.

15. CBL Modules: One CBL module, devoted exclusively to the topic of "Diversity Awareness," was rolled out in the 1990s. Today we have one mandatory Diversity Awareness module for all employees and a second that is mandatory for all of our management employees. Other modules cover our policies prohibiting harassment. These modules are available on "Pipeline," the company's intranet.

16. Management Training in EEO and Diversity: Those hired or promoted to various management and supervisor positions explore EEO topics in even more depth. Examples include:

(a) "Avoiding Discrimination in the Workplace": This facilitated video training is conducted by the District Managers for new hourly supervisors and management. Scenario-based training teaches supervisors how to recognize and respond to discrimination in the workplace.

(b) The Walton Institute: The Walton Institute, an educational center dedicated to providing training for Wal-Mart store managers, conducts leadership development seminars for Wal-Mart's store managers and SAM'S general managers on the laws governing equality of opportunity; the company's diversity policies are also discussed throughout the four-and-a-half day program. Walton Institute materials also demonstrate ways in which retail managers can best adhere to the letter and spirit of these laws and incorporate them into their practices.

(c) The Advanced Leadership Development Class: This program for "multi-unit" managers, such as district managers, directors of operations, and occasionally regional personnel managers, incorporates training on diversity as well.

(d) Regional Personnel Manager, People Division and Recruiter Training: Regional personnel managers ("RPM") participate in the RPM Development programs held multiple times per year. A significant portion of the RPM-specific training is dedicated to EEO issues. For example, they spend one-half day with members of the legal department, who discuss how to investigate harassment and similar claims. RPMs also discuss turnover, diversity, and other EEO issues at regular meetings throughout the year. EEO and diversity are regular topics at various and People Division meetings. Wal-Mart's training for recruiting managers likewise emphasizes applicable laws and company policies as they relate to diversity and EEO in the hiring process. A true and correct copy of "Our People Make the Difference Always – Management Policy Workshop" materials are attached as Exhibit "C."

(e) Other Training: Wal-Mart sponsors a Management Policy Workshop, a 17-week Retail Leadership School or Management Training Program, Leadership Foundations, and Management Skills 101 (an entry-level manager program) that similarly instruct participants as to what these laws and Wal-Mart policies require.

17. Culture Saturdays: All of Wal-Mart's stores, as well as SAM'S CLUB, have daily meetings, at which time culture and store sales are discussed. Wal-Mart's regional leaders meet every Saturday morning, and also devote the first Saturday of every month entirely to discussing aspects of Wal-Mart culture, including its commitment to diversity and equal opportunities. Although SAM'S CLUB has its own Saturday morning meeting, it always joins the Wal-Mart group each month on "Culture Saturday."

Recent Culture Saturday speakers have included Maya Angelou, Dexter King and Tavis Smiley, as well as celebrations of Cinco de Mayo and our country's veterans.

18. Awards to Recognize EEO Achievement: Good EEO performance is publicized by recognizing good performance through awards including the following commenced in 2003:

- Diversity Champion Award: At Wal-Mart's annual meeting in Kansas City, this award was given to the District Managers in each of Wal-Mart's six operating divisions who had the best improvement in diversity representation. An award also was given to a District Manager in each of the Specialty Divisions.
- Compliance Award: This award is given to a District Manager in each Wal-Mart operating division who is recognized by Regional Personnel Manager as excelling in the area of HR compliance.
- Get It Done Award: Awards are given weekly to Regional Personnel Managers to recognize those who have excelled in HR compliance.

19. Wal-Mart Pipeline: Wal-Mart's "Pipeline" educates associates about Wal-Mart's culture, policies, and history, as well as the Saturday morning meeting topics. The Pipeline also contains a variety of informational materials about diversity including the Diversity Toolkit and "Diversity – Valuing Difference – Working Together." See Exhibit "B."

20. Diversity Newsletter and Brochure: Wal-Mart distributes its Diversity Newsletter and Diversity Brochure to its employees. True and correct copies of various diversity brochures are attached as Exhibits "D," "E," "F," "G," "H" and "I."

21. Wal-Mart World: Wal-Mart also includes diversity-related items in "Wal-Mart World" (formerly known as "Wal-Mart Today"), a monthly internal magazine circulated to all stores. SAM'S CLUB has and similarly uses its own newsletter, entitled "In the Loop."

22. Wal-Mart's Culture Pocket Handbook: This handbook includes a summary of our diversity policies. A true and correct copy of one edition is attached as Exhibit "J."

23. Reports to the Board of Directors on Diversity: Each Quarter, Coleman Peterson, Executive Vice President of People, makes an in-person presentation to the Compensation, Nominating and Governance Board Committee on diversity and other people related issues. I participate in some of these presentations. At least annually, Coleman Peterson also makes an in-person presentation to the full Board on diversity and other people issues.

24. Annual Performance Reviews: At yearly performance reviews, those in management positions are evaluated on their diversity goals and activities.

Diversity Goals and Programs Specifically Designed to Advance Diversity Goals

25. During the past decade, Wal-Mart has implemented many programs, including "Twelve Major Initiatives," to create a more diverse work force. These initiatives include training and development of current female and minority Wal-Mart associates, internships for those interested in a career with Wal-Mart, and scholarships, partnerships and recruitment efforts aimed at developing the company's future managers, officers and directors. True and correct copies of some of the documents that describe these initiatives are attached as Exhibits "B," "D" and "K." SAM'S CLUB has similar initiatives. I am informed and believe that Exhibit "L" is a true and correct copy of one document reflecting some of SAM'S CLUB initiatives. Other programs implemented by Wal-Mart include:

(a) Mentoring Program: All Regional Vice President, Regional Personnel Managers, District Managers, Store Managers and other managers have been challenged to select three Associates who do not look like them, to whom they will provide support and career advice. Tom Coughlin, now Vice Chairman, has called upon managers at meetings to name mentees and report on their progress in advancing them.

(b) "Women in Leadership": Founded in 1992, Women in Leadership is a network of women exchanging best practices and mentoring one another to successfully achieve company goals while promoting the career development of women at all levels within Wal-Mart. The group has held seminars and created videos, widely distributed to tens of thousands of women in the field, challenging them to volunteer for leadership roles in their communities and to mentor other women, both within and beyond Wal-Mart. The Main Event (also known as Women-Future), is another Women in Leadership Initiative. This yearly program, that Wal-Mart began broadcasting live via satellite to "high talent individuals" in the company in 2002, features prominent women across various industries and professions who discuss issues surrounding women in the workplace.

(c) Women's Leadership Development Conference: Michelle Whitehead, then a Regional Personnel Manager in the Boston area, founded the Women's Leadership Development Conference, a series of one-day seminars on women's issues hosted by Wal-Mart's women leaders. These conferences were so successful that they have been expanded to a broader audience, and women in the field now suggest topics they would like to be addressed. More than 35 of these conferences will be held across the United States in 2003.

(d) Leadership Express: This diversity initiative is a mentoring program designed to assist in identifying and developing the future leaders of the company. Mentors and participants jointly create an individualized development plan for each participant to ensure that the necessary training and experience is received. Almost half of the participants in this program are female.

(e) SAM'S C.A.M.P. ("Calling All Management Potential"): The goal of this program is to identify and develop those hourly associates who are interested in and are able to assume more leadership responsibility within the company. Employees interested in management careers with SAM'S sign up for this program in their clubs.

(f) SAM'S "Leadership Link": This program for SAM'S employees focuses on teaching women networking skills.

(g) "Women's Executive Breakfast": This is another program that Wal-Mart and SAM'S use to help women network.

(h) Intern Programs: Since 1987, Wal-Mart has sponsored a Corporate Intern Program to develop outstanding students interested in retail as a career. Participants in the Summer Internship Program complete a 12-week training rotation. During 2002, 43.22% of our field (store) interns were women, as were 51.67% of our Home Office interns.

SAM'S has its own internship program and likewise is active in recruiting diverse individuals.

(i) Outreach Recruiting: Recognizing that recruiting women and minorities is the first step, and a critical step, in developing a managerial workforce that is representative of the greater community, Wal-Mart recruits men and women from many minority Colleges and Universities. In 2003 Wal-Mart will recruit from 17 minority colleges and universities, as well as 30 other schools with diverse student bodies. Wal-Mart also participates yearly a variety of Women and minority career fairs across the country. This year we will attend over 50 women and minority career fairs. The company actively tracks its diversity recruiting efforts.

(j) Scholarships: Wal-Mart also donates considerable sums to a number of scholarship programs benefiting diverse groups of students. The "Life Gets Better" partnership with Florida A & M University, for example, provides minority and female students with a full scholarship and summer employment. Wal-Mart's support of the United Negro College Fund, NAACP local scholarships, the Hispanic Association of Colleges and Universities, the League of United Latin American Citizens, the American Indian College Fund and the National Asian Pacific American Bar Association, among others, likewise provides significant opportunities to minority and female students. Wal-Mart's Pharmacy Scholarship program provides opportunities for junior pharmacists, and its Competitive Edge Scholarship helps students pursue careers in technological fields vital to the long-term growth and prosperity of the United States. In addition, Wal-Mart executives and managers often participate in the Students in Free Enterprise (SIFE) program, an organization that involves a large number of women and minority students at many schools across the country. All of these programs have helped Wal-Mart move further toward building a diverse workforce from top to bottom.

(k) Diversity Directory: In 1999, Wal-Mart began to develop the "Diversity Directory," a contact list available to all associates who wished to discuss their career advancement (or other issues) with Wal-Mart's successful female or minority leaders.

(l) Women of Wal-Mart (WOW): This is another group formed by Wal-Mart's female leaders that meets quarterly. The meeting topics alternate between professional development and networking opportunities.

Diversity Goals and Monitoring of Progress

26. Wal-Mart has set diversity goals and has implemented structured programs to assess its progress in meeting those goals. These include the Diversity Report Cards prepared for the People Directors, the Diversity Report delivered quarterly to Wal-Mart's Board of Directors, and various other reports. We currently track placements, turnover and representation. A true and correct copy of one current report is attached as Exhibit "M."

(a) Diversity Goals: Since 1994-95, numerical "diversity goals" have been set, communicated and tracked to help Wal-Mart measure its progress in diversifying its managerial workforce. We frequently circulate reports that depict our goals (set by job classification) and our progress. A true and correct copy of our most recent year-end report is attached as Exhibit "N." Exhibit "O," created for this declaration, shows the continual rise over the past ten years in female representation in Officials/Managers EEO-1 category management jobs in our Wal-Mart discounts stores and Supercenters, SAM'S CLUBS and Specialty Divisions. The second page shows the rise in total company Officials/Managers EEO-1 category management jobs.

(b) Annual Evaluation of Management EEO Performance: Wal-Mart measures manager's efforts and success in meeting the diversity goals as part of the Yearly Performance Evaluations. True and correct copies of current evaluation forms for Wal-Mart are attached as Exhibit "P," while a SAM'S CLUB form is attached is Exhibit "Q."

(c) Diversity Reports and Report Cards: The quarterly Diversity Reports and Report Cards are used to track the company's progress in reaching its diversity objectives that are set for every store, district, division and the company overall. True and correct examples are attached as Exhibit "R." Regional Personnel Managers receive a monthly diversity report for their area of responsibility. The People Division of SAM'S CLUB does the same. SAM'S People Division also issues a "Quarterly Report of Accomplishments and Issues"; diversity and retention goals and accomplishments are part of these reports. A true and correct copy is attached as Exhibit "S."

(d) People P&L: This report, which tracks community and associate demographics for each particular store and other location, is another tool for measuring the company's progress on diversity goals. SAM'S CLUB sets and tracks its diversity goals and has its own People P&L reports. True and correct copies of these reports are attached as Exhibit "T."

(e) Rising Star, Leadership Express and First-in Line Minority/Female Participation Tracking: Wal-Mart tracks minority and female participation in programs that often lead to management positions: Rising Star, Leadership Express and First-in-Line, a management training program for Wal-Mart employees who are currently in college and interested in a career at Wal-Mart.

Complaints and Feedback to Management

27. Wal-Mart uses a variety of methods to give associates an opportunity to critique the company and its managers, and to report and resolve incidents of harassment, discrimination and retaliation.

(a) "Open Door" Policy: Under this policy, Wal-Mart associates are encouraged to discuss with any supervisor their concerns, grievances, or ideas, without fear of retaliation. In this way, Wal-Mart empowers all of its associates to confront challenges head-on and provide input that can improve the company as a whole. The policy is described in countless publications that are distributed to and available online to employees, including the Employee Handbook, a copy of which is attached as Exhibit "A." Every store posts the names, pictures and contact information for multiple members of management, just to remind associates that they are able, and encouraged, to contact any member of management to discuss any issues, whether relating to themselves or to others. Not only does Wal-Mart encourage employees to speak their minds, it expects those in charge of handling complaints or inquiries to take prompt action when problems arise and trains them how to do so. The company's "Sundown Rule" states that associates should respond to "any request, either from an external customer or an internal customer [associate], before the sun goes down."

Notwithstanding all of the training and admonitions we provide about the importance of respectful treatment, EEO and diversity, we have had some instances of improper conduct by a small number of our 1.3 million employees. When such instances come to light, we move quickly to investigate and take appropriate remedial action. Suffice it to say that there are serious consequences for managers, supervisors and all employees who do not adhere to Wal-Mart's EEO commitment. Violation of an EEO policy may result in a coaching, up to and including termination. Examples of actual management coachings/terminations for violation of EEO policies are:

- An Assistant Manager made sexually related comments to an hourly Associate. The Assistant Manager was terminated for inappropriate conduct, and the Store Manager was also terminated for failing to properly investigate the sexual harassment allegations.
- A District Manager investigated an allegation of sexual harassment and terminated the accused harasser. The District Manager improperly indicated on the exit interview form that the Associate could be considered for re-hire and did in fact re-hire the Associate 90 days after the termination. The District Manager was demoted.
- After an investigation was conducted of an allegation that a SAM'S CLUB Vision Center Manager made inappropriate comments of a sexual nature to an hourly Associate, the Vision Center Manager was terminated for inappropriate behavior.

(b) Ethics Hotline: The "Ethics Hotline," a toll-free telephone number available to all associates, receives reports from associates who believe that discrimination, harassment, retaliation or other conduct they deem inappropriate has occurred. Upon receiving a call, the Hotline administrators immediately e-mail a summary of the complaint or concern to the appropriate Regional Personnel Manager or District Manager. Callers are not required to give any identifying information. The Home Office logs and maintains a database of both the issues raised and the action taken by the appropriate supervisor. Information about the Ethics Hotline is available to all employees in the Employee Handbook, attached as Exhibit "A," on the intranet (Pipeline), and various in-store postings.

(c) Grass Roots Survey: The yearly Grass Roots Survey is a series of questions administered by computer to all Wal-Mart and SAM'S CLUB associates in the field. The anonymous results are compiled and distributed to Personnel Managers, Store Managers, Assistant Managers, and District Managers who use them to identify areas of concern or weakness and develop a plan to address these areas. While the company's commitment to Grass Roots and the goal of the program itself have not changed over the years, its method of administering the survey and analyzing the results are reviewed and updated regularly.

(d) Leadership Survey: Wal-Mart and SAM'S CLUB also conduct "Leadership Surveys," in which employees may anonymously evaluate their direct Store Managers and District Managers. Surveys periodically are administered on Assistant Managers, as well.

Other Outreach

28. The object of Wal-Mart's "Store of the Community" policy is to ensure that each Wal-Mart store meets and represents the unique needs of the community it serves, in staffing, stocking and active participation in the community.

29. Wal-Mart strives to inform the communities it serves of its efforts and accomplishments in creating a company in which individuals are valued and equal opportunity is afforded to all. Each Wal-Mart store strives to build relationships with a variety of community-based organizations, including active participation in organizations benefiting women and minorities, and dedicates considerable time and resources to a variety of community outreach programs. This includes participation in programs and functions hosted by organizations, including (but not limited to) the NAACP, the Congressional Black Caucus, the National Council of La Raza, and the Speaking of Women's Health Initiative.

30. Wal-Mart has been applauded for its commitment to purchasing from female-and minority-owned vendors and suppliers. During 2002, it spent more than $ 2.5 billion with companies that are owned by women or persons of color.

Upward Mobility

31. Job Postings: Hourly openings for Wal-Mart's higher-level store positions, including Department Manager, are posted in the store in which the vacancy exists. (Employees may be reassigned laterally without a posting.) Official electronic records of the postings, the bidders and the job advancements are maintained in the ordinary course of business.

32. Management Career Selection: The Management Career Selection ("MCS") system is an electronic posting system historically used to post Store Manager and District Manager openings and others on an as-needed basis. Store Manager and District Manager openings are posted consistently, and the Vice President of Operations People and the Senior Vice-President of Operations People must approve any exception. This expectation has been communicated by me in various management meetings, including Regional Personnel Manager meetings and Operations meetings. An exception report is generated on a weekly basis. The MCS postings have been expanded so that today the following positions are posted: Store Manager, District Manager, Pharmacy District Manager, Shoes and Jewelry District Manager, Vision Center District Manager, Vision Center Regional Manager, TLE District Manager and Photo Center District Manager.

33. Management Trainee Career Selection: The Management Trainee Career Selection ("MTCS") system is an electronic pre-registration system started in January 2003 that allows hourly Associates to express an interest in the Management Trainee position. Sam's Club also utilizes the Management Trainee Career Selection system.

34. I initiated this system to ensure that we would identify talent for the 6,000 management positions that we believe will be filled in 2003. I introduced the MTCS to the District Managers, the primary users of the system, at the Year Beginning

Meeting in Kansas City, MO in January 2003. As with many presentations at Year Beginning Meetings, I incorporated discussion of diversity into this kickoff of the MTCS program. I emphasized how important diversity is to and made absolutely clear our strong commitment to developing future leaders of our company who represent the myriad of backgrounds and diversity of our customers throughout the country and the world. I urged our District Managers to use the many opportunities we will have to select managers in 2003 to enhance our diversity profile from among equally qualified people. I told the District and Regional Managers that the Regional Personnel Managers would be involved to carefully monitor the promotion decisions.

35. The Exhibits attached to this Declaration (other than "O" that was created for this Declaration) are true and correct copies of Wal-Mart business records for which I am a custodian of records and that were maintained in the ordinary course of business.

I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State of California and United States of America that the foregoing is true and correct.

DECLARATION OF JINA JORDAN

I, JINA JORDAN, declare:

1. I am a female. I am the Co-Manager at the Wal-Mart Supercenter, Store # 723, in Troy, Alabama. I have held this position from 1999 to the present. I have worked for Wal-Mart since 1985, and was an Assistant Manager from 1986 to 1999. From approximately March 1999 to October 1999 and from April 2000 to April 2001, Katheryn Johnson was an associate at Store # 723.

2. I have read the "DECLARATION OF KATHERYN JOHNSON IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION." In paragraph 3 of her declaration, Ms. Johnson claims that she was denied a promotion into the Management Training Program because she is a woman. I am submitting this Declaration in rebuttal to that claim.

3. Ms. Johnson worked at Wal-Mart as a part-time sales associate until she graduated from college in December 2000. From October 1999 to April 2000, Ms. Johnson took a leave of absence from Wal-Mart. Up until she graduated from college, Ms. Johnson had expressed interest in working in her chosen field of study, sports medicine, after graduation.

4. In early 2001, Ms. Johnson told me that she was interested in joining the Management Training Program. I encouraged her to submit an application and resume to the District Manager, James Pike. I also encouraged her to make herself known to Mr. Pike because he was more likely to place in the training program an associate whom he had met and could recognize. Since I have been a Co-Manager at Store # 723, I have encouraged other female hourly associates, including Sylvia Williams and Jackie Smith, to enter the Management Training Program.

5. Ms. Johnson resigned from Wal-Mart in April 2001. This was only approximately two months after Ms. Johnson first expressed interest in joining the Management Training Program.

6. Since I have been the Co-Manager at Store # 723, I recall only two associates from Store # 723 being placed into the Management Training Program. One was a male, Brandon Jones, and the other was a female, Jackie Smith. Both were promoted from hourly supervisory positions – Jones was promoted from a Department Manager position, and Smith was promoted from an Inventory Control Team Lead position. When I joined the Program in 1986, I had spent four to five months as a Support Manager.

7. Associates are placed into the Management Training Program when there are Assistant Manager openings in our District. If there is not a need in the District for additional Assistant Managers, associates generally are not placed in the Program. During the approximately two months between the time that Ms. Johnson expressed interest in being placed in the Program and her resignation, there were no Assistant Manager openings in the District.

8. Ms. Johnson was not promoted because there were no openings for Management Trainees in the District during the short time that Ms. Johnson expressed interest in the Program.

9. In Paragraph 15 of her declaration, Ms. Johnson alleges that I told her that Mr. Pike does not like to place women in the Management Training Program. I did not make this statement, nor do I agree with it. In addition to Jackie Smith, I know of at least three other women Mr. Pike has promoted within the past two years, including Kathy Mills, Jennifer Ross, and Pinkie Sparks (who was promoted by Mr. Pike from Assistant Manager to Co-Manager).

I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State of California and the United States of America that the foregoing is true and correct.

DECLARATION OF MARIE PERKINS

I, MARIE PERKINS, declare:

1. From September 2001 to December 2002, I was the Tire & Lube Express ("TLE") Manager in Store # 1615 in Pittsburg, California. I have been employed by Wal-Mart since approximately 1992. I am a female.

2. This Declaration is based on my personal knowledge, and my review of business records that are maintained in the ordinary course of business. If called upon to testify under oath, I could, and would, testify competently as follows:

3. I have read the "DECLARATION OF EARNESTINE GORDON IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION." In paragraphs 2, 10, 11 and 12 of her declaration, Ms. Gordon claims that she was denied a promotion from hourly associate to a salaried management position because she is a woman. I am submitting this Declaration in rebuttal to that claim.

4. Throughout the time that I was a TLE Manager at Store # 1615, Earnestine Gordon was a TLE associate whom I supervised. From the time I arrived at the store in September 2001 until I demoted her to Sales Associate in February 2002, Ms. Gordon held the position of TLE Support Manager, an hourly position.

5. When I arrived at Store # 1615 in September 2001, Ms. Gordon had an active "decision day" coaching in her file, resulting from her abuse of overtime (i.e., working overtime without management approval). Prior to this "decision day" coaching, Ms. Gordon had received a verbal and a written coaching, also for abuse of overtime. Her "decision day" coaching made her ineligible for promotion during the twelve months that it was active. The coaching remained active through the time of her demotion, in February 2002.

6. Ms. Gordon had serious performance issues as a TLE Support Manager. She showed far less productivity than I expected of any associate in TLE. For example, every day had a "slow period" during which few customers were in the department. During this period, associates were expected to "maintain the integrity" of the department, i.e. restock the shelves, clean, and otherwise upkeep the appearance of the sales floor. Instead of performing these duties, Ms. Gordon spent these slow periods resting next to the sales counter.

7. When I first arrived at Store # 1615 in September 2001, I was appalled by the appearance of the TLE department. The sales floor was in disarray, and the sales counter looked like a garbage dump. Surfaces throughout the department were filthy, and the computer terminal was black with oil smudges. I immediately instructed the TLE associates that they were to maintain and clean the department on a daily basis. At that time the department had been without a TLE Manager for two to three months, and Ms. Gordon, as Support Manager, was one of the two ranking members of the department. I asked Ms. Gordon how she could have allowed the department to reach such a state, and her answer was "I can only do so much." I found this answer unsatisfactory, because the daily "slow periods" mentioned above allowed sufficient time for anyone to keep the department clean and orderly.

8. Ms. Gordon demonstrated to me a lack of the motivation necessary for promotion into salaried management. When I attempted to teach her how to use the Telxon handheld computer, which is one of the necessary tools of a TLE Manager, she showed very little interest. When I asked her to reset a series of four-foot shelf sections that house the department's merchandise – a reasonable task for any associate, given the amount of "downtime" in the department – Ms. Gordon reset a single four-foot section, and accomplished nothing further with the project over the course of the next week.

9. Because of Ms. Gordon's lack of productivity, TLE District Managers Bobby Jones and Ed Brockman both, on separate occasions, suggested that I demote her from her Support Manager role. Nonetheless, I continued for five months to give Ms. Gordon the benefit of the doubt.

10. In Paragraph 14 of her Declaration, Ms. Gordon claims that she was demoted to a Sales Associate because she was not available to work on Sundays. In fact Ms. Gordon's availability problems were significantly greater. In addition to being unable to work at all on Sundays, Ms. Gordon refused to work any evenings. Because a Support Manager is required to be available for both evening and weekend hours, Ms. Gordon could not effectively meet the demands of her position. For this reason, I demoted her to a Sales Associate position in February 2002.

11. In Paragraph 10 of her Declaration, Ms. Gordon claims that she expressed to me interest in the TLE Manager position. On the contrary, Ms. Gordon never expressed to me any such interest. Rather, she indicated her lack of interest in holding a management position. For example, while watching me perform my duties, she would make such comments as, "I don't see how you do it."

12. Because of Ms. Gordon's lack of productivity and motivation, as described above, she clearly was not qualified for promotion.

13. As the TLE Manager at Store # 1615, I encouraged both men and women whom I felt were strong performers to enter the Management Training Program. Examples include Kay Saceho and Erica Nunez.

I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State of California and the United States of America that the foregoing is true and correct.

DECLARATION OF MARGARET DANIEL IN SUPPORT OF WAL-MART STORES, INC.'S OPPOSITION TO MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

DECLARATION OF MARGARET DANIEL

I, Margaret Daniel, declare:

1. I have been employed by Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. ("Wal-Mart") for seventeen years. I am currently employed as a District Manager in Region 11. As a District Manager in Region 11, I have responsibility for six stores located in northern New York state and part of Vermont. Approximately 1250 associates are employed at stores within my District and last year my District had gross sales of over $280 million dollars. I have just accepted the job of Operations Coordinator at the Home Office and will be moving to Bentonville, Arkansas in July 2003 to begin a one to two year training period to work toward my goal of becoming a Regional Vice President.

2. Since becoming a District Manager in 1998, my achievements and contributions have been recognized by the Company. I was recently awarded the District Manager of the Company for the first quarter of 2003, based on a sales increase of 17% and a 2% increase in profitability in my District. In 2002, I was honored as the District Manager of the Year for the Company, based on improved profit over 1.3% and double digit sales increases in my District, and also was the District Manager of the Company for the first quarter of 2002. I also was proud to win the 1999 Company Hero Award. This is an award for excellence which was given to me in recognition of my District being the best in the Region in reducing turn-over in the District in both management and hourly associates. I was rated as a top 25% District Manager for all six years that I have been in that position. I was designated as a "rising star" District Manager, which I understand means I am promotable to the next level. Approximately one month ago, I was advised that I had been selected to be in the Leadership Express Program, which I believe indicates management's view that I am capable of being promoted two levels.

3. I began my employment at Wal-Mart as an Assistant Manager in Florida in 1986. At the time I was hired, I already had two years experience as an Assistant Manager with Montgomery Wards department store and a high school degree. There was not a formal Assistant Manager Training Program when I started working at Wal-Mart, but I received hands-on training by the Lead Assistant Manager in the store, who had completed his training and was waiting for a store to open.

4. From 1986 to 1991, I worked as an Assistant Manager in four different Wal-Mart stores located in Florida and gained experience in all areas of the store. In 1991, I was promoted to the position of Co-Manager of a store in Stuart, Florida. After I had been a Co-Manager for one year, I was promoted to become the Store Manager of that store when the prior Store Manager left. After two years as a Store Manager in Florida, I moved to Utah where I gained more experience by working as the Store Manager at a larger store for approximately three years. In 1998, I was promoted to be a District Manager in Syracuse, New York and, in 2001, moved to Plattsburgh, New York, to manage another District.

5. During my career at Wal-Mart, I was aware of promotional opportunities within management that were posted on the Management Career Selection program. I also had knowledge through the Associate Handbook and other training materials that if an associate was interested in promotion, he or she should communicate that interest to the Store Manager. During the annual evaluation process, I usually discussed with my Store Manager what my goals were and advised the Store Manager that I was interested in promotion and in obtaining additional experience which would lead to promotional opportunities. On the evaluation form, there was a space at the end of the evaluation for the associate to comment and indicate his or her goals. I always indicated that I was interested in promotion.

6. When I expressed interest in being promoted, various Store Managers and District Managers mentored me and assisted me in achieving my goals. I particularly recall Fred Bunch, who was my Store Manager at the Sarasota, Florida store. Fred encouraged me to become a Store Manager and always challenged me to do more. As a result of his encouragement and mentoring, I became a Lead Associate Manager and took the Retail Manager Training Seminar ("RMTS"), which is a one week training program at the Home Office, and was promoted to the Co-Manager position in 1991. A year later, with the recommendation of my Regional Vice President and Divisional Vice President, I became a Store Manager.

7. As a manager, I have responsibility for making compensation decisions. I generally follow the compensation guidelines, but I sometimes pay a manager a higher starting rate for additional experience, education, or special skills. For example, we had an opportunity to hire a female who had over 12 years experience at K-Mart, three and a half of which was as a Store Manager. She was paid more than the guidelines when we brought her in as an Accelerated Assistant Manager of a store with the hope that she would soon be ready to be promoted to an available Store Manager position. I would have made her a Co-Manager, but I did not have such a position available until March 2004 when a Supercenter in the District will open.

8. As a manager, I pay people fairly and make fair and nondiscriminatory employment decisions. I have learned at Wal-Mart that a good manager should always be trying to replace herself or himself; so I make every effort to mentor others.

9. I have been chosen to represent the Company at different functions. For example, I recently was one of the Company representatives present when Wal-Mart received the Career and Disabled Magazine Award for doing the most to promote access for disabled persons in the private sector. I also represented the Company when Wal-Mart accepted the Ralph Jonas Philanthropic Award for education at Long Island University for providing scholarships to students for further education and at an event sponsored by the National Mass Retailer Association, honoring Tom Coughlin, President and CEO of Wal-Mart Stores Division and SAM'S CLUBS.

10. I also have participated in three women's conferences sponsored by Wal-Mart. During the last two years, these one day conferences for female managers at all levels have been held twice a year in my Region with all expenses paid by Wal-Mart. Approximately 40 to 50 female managers have attended the conferences in my Region with the goal of mentoring female managers who are interested in growing with the Company. Two of the female managers in my District who attended these conferences have been placed on the "rising star" list.

11. When I was hired by Wal-Mart, I was married and had two children – a son who was 10 and a daughter who was 13. Although I had a rotating schedule as an Assistant Manager, my Store Manager generally was able to accommodate my requests to have time off to attend my children's activities at school and other important family events as long as sufficient advance notice was given. When my father was ill and recently passed away, I received a personal telephone call from Jim Haworth, Executive Vice President of the Company, to express his sympathy, and he told me to take as much time off as I needed.

12. I have personal knowledge of the facts contained in this Declaration. If called and sworn as a witness, I would testify competently to those facts.

13. I make this Declaration entirely of my own free will and choice. No promises of benefits or threats have been made to me to persuade me to sign it.

I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State where I execute this declaration, the State of California, and the United States of America that the foregoing is true and correct.

DECLARATION OF SANDY ELLISON IN SUPPORT OF WAL-MART STORES, INC.'S OPPOSITION TO MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

Date: July 25, 2003
Time: 10:00 a.m.
Courtroom: 11, 19th Floor

Complaint Filed: June 8, 2001

DECLARATION OF SANDY ELLISON

I, Sandy Ellison, declare:

1. I have been employed by Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. ("Wal-Mart") for twelve years. I currently am employed as a District Manager in Region 45. As a District Manager in Region 45, I have responsibility for eight stores located in Wyoming, Nebraska, and Colorado, with a total area of over $1.2 million square feet of retail space. I currently have responsibility for the largest square footage of any District Manager in my Region. Five of these stores are Supercenters, and three are Division 1 Discount Stores. Over 2,000 associates are employed in the stores within my District.

2. I began my employment at Wal-Mart in 1991 after being recruited at the University of Wyoming to join the Wal-Mart Management Training Program ("MTP"). In my MTP, there was another female who also had been recruited upon graduation from college. I currently have responsibility for recommending associates for the MTP. In the MTP starting in my District on Monday, June 16, 2003, there are six persons, three of whom are females. Three are female Department Managers who were recommended by their Store Managers and approved by me for the program. During the time that I have been a District Manager, a substantial number of female hourly supervisory associates have been recommended by their Stores Managers to participate in the MTP. I now have two female Co-Managers in stores in my District.

3. After training in the Cheyenne, Wyoming store for approximately six months, I became an Assistant Manager in the Vacaville, California store. After about two years as an Assistant Manager at that store, I spoke to my Store Manager about openings in Montana because I was interested at that time in moving closer to home and gaining additional experience. When an opening became available in the Bozeman, Montana store, I moved to Bozeman as an Assistant Manager in 1993. I then moved to Kalispell, Montana store in 1995, where I became a Training Assistant Manager. This position is used as a training position to become a Co-Manager. I transferred to the Missoula, Montana store in December 1995, and in January 1996 became the Co-Manager at that Store. The Co-Manager position is generally an 18-month training position to gain experience prior to being promoted to a Store Manager position. In order to gain more experience in a higher volume store, I accepted an opportunity to move to Hays, Kansas as a Co-Manager. After I completed a training period as a Co-Manager, I contacted the Regional Vice President of my Region to express my interest and readiness to be promoted to a Store Manager position and, shortly thereafter, I was offered a promotion to be the Store Manager in Sheridan, Wyoming and accepted that position in October 1996.

4. Sometime shortly after my promotion to Store Manager, the Company began posting openings for management positions on the Managers' Workbench, which is a intranet computer site which contains company information for use by managers. In early 1998, I applied for a position of Store Manager in Spokane, Washington. The available opening was a larger store with a higher volume in a metropolitan area, and I believed that it would be a good opportunity to gain more experience and advance my career. After being recommended by my District Manager and interviewing for the position, I was selected for the position and transferred to become the Store Manager of a Spokane, Washington store in April 1998.

5. Thereafter, in approximately July 1999, I expressed interest in a Regional Personnel Manager ("RPM") position to my Division Vice President, Kendall Schwindt. Mr. Schwindt encouraged me to pursue the RPM position and, although no position was currently open at that time, I underwent a series of interviews in the event that such a position became available in the future. I was approved as a qualified candidate for the position in 1999 and when a position became available in Region 12 in January 2000, I was selected for the position and moved to Bentonville, Arkansas. I was originally a RPM in Region 12, which had responsibility for 26 stores in Alaska, Hawaii, and Seattle. Five months later, I was asked to become the RPM for Region 19, which had 90 stores in California, Oregon and Washington. Both the RPM positions were located in Bentonville, Arkansas, although I frequently traveled to my Region.

6. After gaining this Home Office experience, I applied for a promotion to a District Manager position in Cheyenne, Wyoming. This position was posted on the Managers' Workbench. I was recommended for the position by the Regional Vice President and interviewed for the position. I was offered the District Manager position and accepted the position effective in November 2001.

7. In my opinion, a person is in charge of his/her own destiny in any job. Success does not just happen if a person sits back and does nothing to pursue his or her goals; it is important for a person to take ownership of any plans to succeed. Whenever I expressed interest in being promoted at Wal-Mart, my management was supportive and assisted me in achieving my goals. Various Store Managers and District Managers mentored me over the years. I particularly recall Mel Stos, who was the District Manager when I was first promoted to be a Store Manager in Sheridan, Wyoming. Mr. Stos frequently visited my store when I was a new Store Manager and provided invaluable one-on-one training and direction as well as being an excellent example of leadership. Mr. Stos was very approachable and always available to answer any questions. He also appeared to genuinely care about me as a person and found time to have a coke with me in the store and ask how my family was doing.

8. In August 2002, my Regional Vice President, J.R. Lee, informed me that I had been placed in the Leadership Express Program because I was designated as someone who has the capacity to do more with the Company. I have been advised that this is a special mentoring program to help me grow within the Company and to provide me with additional experience outside of my area. Since that time, I have traveled to various meetings with Mr. Lee and gained valuable experience outside my District. I also have assisted Mr. Lee with special projects in the Region.

9. As a Manager, I have responsibility for making compensation decisions. I generally follow the compensation guidelines, but I sometimes pay an associate a higher starting rate for additional experience, education, or special skills or based on competitive market factors. I pay people fairly and make fair and nondiscriminatory employment decisions.

10. I am married and have a daughter who is now ten years old. She was born when I was an Assistant Manager in the Vacaville, California store, and I took a paid leave of absence when she was born. While she has been young, I have been willing to move to advance my career. I have, however, advised my Regional Vice President that when my daughter starts middle school, I need to be in one area because I believe it is important for my daughter to be able to complete those middle and high school years in one place. The Company has been very supportive of this decision, and I anticipate that I will be able to stay in one location while my daughter is in middle and high school.

11. I have personal knowledge of the facts contained in this Declaration. If called and sworn as a witness, I would testify competently to those facts.

12. I make this Declaration entirely on my own free will and choice. No promises or benefits or threats have been made to me to persuade me to sign it.

I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State where I execute this declaration, the State of California, and the United States of America that the foregoing is true and correct.

DECLARATION OF VICTORIA HOWARD

I, Victoria Howard, declare:

1. I am currently a Store Manager at Wal-Mart Store # 1815 in Fresno, California. I was hired as a seasonal temporary employee in 1995 in the Tire & Lube Express ("TLE") Department at Wal-Mart Store # 1826 in Visalia, California. Because of my hard work, I was the only one of several temporary associates to be offered a permanent part-time position with the TLE Department. A few weeks later, TLE Manager Holly Thomas offered me a full-time position in the department.

2. At the time that I was employed full-time in Store # 1826, I was dealing with numerous time pressures outside of work. I was going through a divorce, and was fighting to keep custody of my two year-old son, Garrett. I was taking classes at a junior college, and working the evening shift at Wal-Mart, which usually lasted until midnight. Holly Thomas, my TLE manager, was very understanding of my situation, and offered me flexibility in my scheduling so I could handle these demands on my time.

3. At least twice while I was a TLE associate at Store # 1826, TLE Manager Holly Thomas offered to help me join the TLE management training program, through which I would become a salaried manager in TLE. Each time I declined, because I did not feel that I had enough experience, and because I wanted to continue exploring other opportunities through college classes.

4. The TLE Department included five women, two of whom were Manager Holly Thomas and me. I did not observe the female TLE associates receive any discriminatory treatment from male associates, nor did I ever hear suggestions from the men that women should not be working in an automotive department.

5. In 1997, I learned of a new store, Store # 2536, opening in Tulare, California. I introduced myself to the Store Manager, Jesus de los Santos, and informally interviewed with him for an hourly supervisor position, TLE Department Manager. Although I believe the position was posted, I did not go through a formal application process. Soon after our interview, Mr. de los Santos offered me the position.

6. When I arrived at Store # 2536 as a TLE Department Manager, my primary duty, like all the Department Managers in the store, was to set up my department for the store's grand opening eight weeks away. Through hard work and a strong sense of urgency, I set up the TLE Department more quickly than any department in the store. Store Manager de los Santos, during his tours of the store, told me how impressed he was with the progress my department was making. Moreover, he had created a large chart that allowed the Department Managers to track one another's progress during this setup period, and the chart showed that my department was always well ahead of everyone else's.

7. As a result of my hard work in setting up the TLE Department, after the grand opening and after only eight weeks as a Department Manager, Store Manager de los Santos promoted me to Support Manager, an hourly position. In this position, I helped to oversee the operation of the entire store. During this time I recognized the compensation potential of pursuing a career with Wal-Mart, and decided to stop taking classes at junior college.

8. After approximately two months as a Support Manager, I approached Store Manager de los Santos and expressed my interest in the Management Training Program, whereby I could become a salaried manager in Wal-Mart Division 1. I explained to him my plan to move up the ranks as a Wal-Mart manager. Within two weeks of this conversation, Mr. de los Santos called me into his office and offered me a position as an Assistant Manager Trainee. I understood that after completing the training program, as an Assistant Manager, I would likely have to transfer to another store to fill a vacant Assistant Manager position. I explained to him that, because of the custody order resulting from my divorce, I was required to live in Tulare County in order to retain custody of my son, and that I could only transfer to stores within approximately 50 miles of my home. Mr. de los Santos responded that this would not be a problem. In April 1997, having worked for Wal-Mart approximately eighteen months, I joined the Management Training Program.

9. As an Assistant Manager Trainee, I was given the opportunity to train at Store # 2536, the same store where I had been promoted. The three male and two female Assistant Managers at the store were very supportive of me, helping me master the leadership qualities needed for the position. In particular, male Co-Manager Don Wallace was diligent about offering me help and making sure I understood everything I needed to learn to successfully complete the Management Training Program.

10. Partway through the 17-week training, I was faced with a difficult decision. Because I was spending more time at work than I had as a non-management employee, I was seeing less of my son, Garrett. I found out from his teachers that Garrett seemed very upset at preschool. He was not playing with the other children, and would spend much of the day alone, often on the swing set, crying for his mommy. After I heard this, I came to work crying, feeling guilty that I had not been spending as much time with my son during nights and weekends. I told District Manager Ron Smoot that I wanted to step down from my Trainee position and become a Department Manager. Ron Smoot's response was that I should take all the time I needed as an hourly employee, and that as soon as I felt ready, he would promote me right back into the Training Program where I had left off.

11. After approximately two months as a Department Manager, I felt I had reached a point with my son that he and I both could adjust to the schedule required by the Training Program. I told District Manager Ron Smoot that I was ready to rejoin the Program, and I immediately resumed my training. To this day, I view Ron Smoot as having been instrumental in my career at Wal-Mart.

12. Before I had completed my full 17 weeks as a Trainee, Ron Smoot approached me and another female Trainee and told us that there was a need for Assistant Managers in the district, and offered to promote us both to Assistant Manager if we felt we were adequately prepared. We both enthusiastically accepted the promotion, and in November 1997 I became an Assistant Manager.

13. As an Assistant Manager I was transferred to Store # 1645 in Hanford, California. My short-term goal when I arrived at Hanford was to learn every part of the store, beginning with the overnight shift. Store Manager Sean Evans supported me in my goal, and granted my request to be placed on overnights. Although I voluntarily sought the overnight shift, no manager has ever required me to work overnights. I spent approximately nine months on overnights, and over the following eighteen months I learned Front End and Softlines, and supplemented the knowledge of Hardlines I had gained as a TLE associate and TLE Department Manager.

14. In October 1998, Store Manager Sean Evans gave me an opportunity I felt was very valuable both in my career and personally. Hurricane George had struck Puerto Rico, devastating the Wal-Mart stores there. Emails were sent to Store Managers and Assistant Managers throughout the company, asking for volunteers to help the Puerto Rico stores recover from the disaster. The project in Puerto Rico was scheduled for four weeks, and I needed Sean Evans' approval to be away from our store for so long. When I asked him for approval, Sean encouraged me to go, telling me that I was moving up in the company, he wanted me to advance, and this would be a great opportunity to learn about store planning and setup, and a way to increase my management experience. Soon after I returned from Puerto Rico, he was promoted to Regional Personnel Manager and replaced by Gisel Ruiz. To this day I remain in contact with Sean Evans, who is currently based in Las Vegas and continues to call and check up on my well-being.

15. During most of my tenure as an Assistant Manager at Store # 1645, my Store Manager was Gisel Ruiz, whom I continue to regard as my teacher, mentor and friend. Gisel Ruiz brought my knowledge of store operations to another level, instructing me in budgeting, controlling expenses and Profit & Loss statements. In addition, she placed me in the Rising Star Program, thereby both recognizing me for my outstanding work and increasing the pace of my advancement in the company.

16. Three of the specific accomplishments for which I was recognized while an Assistant Manager at Store # 1645 were: successfully running a "Store Within A Store," or "SWAS"; effective use of the "Retailtainment" concept; and successfully reducing turnover and increasing productivity at the Front End. These accomplishments are explained in greater detail below.

17. The Store Within A Store concept involves creating and executing plans for specific areas and departments within the store. I have often observed other Assistant Managers devote less attention to the SWAS concept than it deserves. For example, I worked with my Department Managers to create 30-, 60- and 90-day plans for merchandising in the various departments. At my direction the Department Managers filled their plans with extensive details and packaged them in SWAS binders so that associates and managers could see the plans at a glance.

18. The Retailtainment concept involves combining the customer's shopping experience with various forms of entertainment. For instance, during the time that I oversaw the Softlines area of Store # 1645, I coordinated events for the customers such as a Spring Fashion Show and mini-"baby showers," complete with games and prizes. I also arranged for the store to receive "visits" from Santa Claus and the Easter Bunny.

19. When I first began overseeing the Front End at Store # 1645, there were problems with high turnover (cashiers were quitting after spending a short time in the position) and with low "Items Per Hour," or "IPH," scores (cashiers were not scanning items quickly and efficiently). I developed creative methods for solving these problems. For example, all newly hired associates had to complete a 90-day probation period. Whenever cashiers completed their 90 days, I held a graduation ceremony and party for them, during which I played "Pomp and Circumstance" to honor their accomplishment. In addition, I held "Cashier Rodeos" in the morning before the store opened, during which cashiers would compete to scan the most items in a short period. These events helped to boost morale at the Front End. Due to my efforts, both cashier turnover and IPH numbers improved at the store.

20. My work at Store # 1645 drew special recognition from District Manager Ron Smoot. He told me that he wanted to help me develop my public speaking skills, and he suggested I attend district meetings and make presentations on my accomplishments to the Store Managers in the district. I made between five and six such presentations to the Store Managers, on a variety of areas in which I had proven my skill and hard work, including Store Within A Store, organization of the Back Room, and improving Front End morale and performance.

21. My Store Within A Store presentation at one of the district meetings caught the attention of Regional Vice President Jon Sims, who invited me to make a SWAS presentation to a regional meeting of District Managers in Van Nuys, California. On another occasion while I was at Store # 1645, because of my Rising Star status and because there was a shortage of field trainers in California, Jon Sims asked me to attend a "Train the Trainer" class in Porterville, California. After taking this class I taught two sessions in Orange County, California attended by other Assistant Managers, in which I trained them in scheduling, SWAS, and other operations-related topics. Although Jon Sims is now located in Boston, I recently ran into him at a seminar. I was surprised at how many details he recalled about my family, and he invited me to call him whenever I needed support on any issue.

22. While I was an Assistant Manager at Store # 1645, I expressed interest to District Manager Ron Smoot in being promoted to Co-Manager. Ron Smoot responded with enthusiasm, telling me, "You would make a great store manager." He instructed me on areas in which I needed to improve to be ready for promotion, and I worked diligently to improve those areas. However, I was concerned, despite his encouragement, and even though I had been placed on the Rising Star list and received numerous other forms of recognition as an Assistant Manager, that my inability to move out of Tulare County would be an obstacle to my being promoted above Assistant Manager level. Even though Ron had offered me his recommendation, he still needed approval from Regional Vice President Jon Sims and Regional Personnel Manager Vince Martinez.

23. In February 2002, Ron invited me to sit in on a call over a speaker phone, during which he spoke with Regional Personnel Manager Vince Martinez about my career prospects with Wal-Mart. Ron told Vince Martinez, "Victoria is ready to move up, her areas are always running great." I explained to Martinez that I could not move from Tulare County, but was willing to commute. Ron then asked Martinez directly, "Do you see Victoria moving up to Co-Manager, without leaving Tulare County, as a possibility?" To my great happiness, Martinez responded that it was a possibility. Within two weeks I was transferred to Store # 1826 in Visalia, California, in the same district, as a Co-Manager.

24. After working for a year as a Co-Manager, which I understood to be the minimum amount of time necessary to be eligible for promotion, I began searching for Store Manager job postings in the area around Tulare County. Such openings were rare, and after a few months I became concerned about finding a position. Only one vacancy had been posted in that time, and I had interviewed for it but was not selected. However, both Store Manager Ben Spaley and District Manager Matt Tinney gave me support and encouragement. They assured me that they both had applied for several store manager positions before they were finally selected for promotion. Regional Personnel Manager Marcus Ludwig offered me a position in Anaheim, California, which I declined because it was too far away. In October 2001, after I had been a Co-Manager for nineteen months, a position opened at Store # 1815 in Fresno, California. I applied for a second time to become a Store Manager, and was offered the position.

25. From the time I was hired by Wal-Mart in 1995 until November 2002, when I remarried, I was a single mother. Far from seeing this as an obstacle to my work performance, both District Manager Ron Smoot and District Manager Matt Tinney have given me the flexibility in my scheduling that I needed to take an active role in my son's life. I continue to volunteer at Garrett's elementary school as a "Room Mom," taking part in reading sessions with his classmates and coordinating holiday parties and other events with their parents. Ron Smoot in particular has encouraged me to pursue these activities and to adjust my work schedule when necessary.

26. As a Store Manager, I determine starting pay for new hires in my store. I sometimes raise a new hire's pay above the starting rate if they have experience in a specific department, or if they have supervisory experience with a competitor.

27. I make every effort to treat the associates in my store equally regarding pay increases and promotions. When I give merit raises to high performers in the store, the raises are always 5% of the associate's current pay. When interviewing candidates for promotion, my Assistant Managers ask each candidate the same set of questions, which are focused on customer service and how the candidate relates to and interacts with other associates. Candidates are assessed according to specific criteria, including their past evaluations, their current performance, their attendance, and their past coachings. Although open positions are posted on the computer terminals, to which all associates in the store have access, we also post these openings on paper to alert everyone in the store to the fact that there is a vacancy.

28. I never discriminate on the basis of gender in any of the pay or promotion decisions I make in my store.

29. I treat my associates with respect. I make exceptions to Wal-Mart policies when I believe it the reasonable, appropriate, and considerate thing to do. For example, associates in the store sometimes encounter personal or family emergencies, and are forced to miss their scheduled work hours. In such cases I am supportive of the associate, and make an exception to the policy that would normally call for me to give them a coaching for an unscheduled absence.

30. I actively encourage associates in my store, both male and female, to seek promotions to management. Since I have been a Store Manager I have encouraged seven outstanding associates in my store to seek an Assistant Manager Trainee position. Four of those associates, two of them women, have since gone on to join the Management Training Program, and I believe the other three will be enter the Program as openings appear.

31. I have personal knowledge of the facts contained in this Declaration. If called and sworn as a witness, I would testify competently to those facts.

32. I make this Declaration entirely of my own free will and choice. No promises of benefits or threats have been made to me to persuade me to sign it.

I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State of California and the United States of America that the foregoing is true and correct.

DECLARATION OF JULIE JENEANE MURPHY

I, JULIE JENEANE MURPHY, declare:

1. I am currently a District Manager for District 186 at Wal-Mart. I have held this position since approximately January 2000. This Declaration is based on my personal knowledge. If called upon to testify under oath, I could, and would, testify competently as follows:

2. District 186 includes seven Wal-Mart stores. There are 6 stores in eastern central Illinois and 1 store in Indiana. There are 5 Supercenters and 2 Division 1 stores. I visit each store approximately once every 2 weeks. Originally, my District office was located in Clinton, Indiana which was approximately 15 miles from my home. The Paris, Illinois Store was built in approximately October 2000 and I relocated my District Office there because it is closer to my home.

3. The Wal-Mart stores in my District are diverse. For example, the Terre Haute Store is the largest volume store in my District. There are also many more competitors surrounding the Terre Haute Store, therefore I spend more time monitoring competitor's prices for this store than is the case with my smallest volume store in Marshall, Illinois. The Savoy, Illinois and Champaign, Illinois stores both are located in metropolitan college communities. There, the store managers hire lots of students.

4. I hold a bachelors of science degree in Management from Southwest Missouri State University. I interviewed with Wal-Mart prior to graduating from college in the Spring of 1985. I also interviewed with other retailers, including Kmart, in search of a sales representative position. I received an offer of employment from both Kmart and Wal-Mart. The Kmart offer would have allowed me to remain in Springfield, Missouri, while the Wal-Mart offer required me to relocate. I chose to work for Wal-Mart because I was more familiar and comfortable with the company as they had a stores in the area where I grew up.

5. Wal-Mart recruited me as a salaried Assistant Manager Trainee. I relocated 6 hours from Springfield, Missouri to Store #233 in Anna, Illinois and began as a Trainee in June 1985. In November 1985, I completed my training, at which point District Manager Bob Miljan promoted me to Assistant Manager at Store #596 in Herrin, Illinois, which is in the same District as Store #233 (where I trained).

6. While working at Store #596, I became engaged. My fiancé, and now husband, lived in Springfield, Missouri, and I wanted to move closer to Springfield to be with him. I recall that on one of Regional Manager Ray Hobbs' visits to the Store, during the wrap-up discussion that occurs after a tour of the store, Mr. Hobbs asked me, and the other managers at the meeting, if there was anything he could do for us. I voiced to Mr. Hobbs my desire to be closer to my family. Mr. Hobbs responded that he would check to see what positions were available and get back to me. Within 30 days, I was offered a transfer to the Springfield Store. I was surprised at how quickly my request was granted. In April 1986, I relocated to Store #179 in Springfield.

7. While working at Store #179, I received valuable guidance from Lead Assistant Manager Randy Epley. He helped to train me and encouraged me to seek promotions to the next level of management. For example, since I was new within the Company and did not have the experience of working as an hourly associate, I initially was not confident in some of my decisions. Mr. Epley gave me the self-confidence to make decisions by pointing out what I was doing correctly, areas where I needed improvement, and how to handle various circumstances arising at the store. I believe that Mr. Epley helped me establish a good style of management.

8. While at Store #179, I told District Manager Jim White that I wanted to advance within the Company. I mentioned this goal both on my evaluations and during discussions while he was touring the store. In response, Mr. White asked if I was interested in transferring to Store #86, also in Springfield. He told me that the experience of working at this higher-volume store would be a good opportunity and would help me to get promoted. In July 1987, I transferred to Store #86.

9. While working at Store #86, District Manager White and I had numerous conversations about my goal of being promoted to Store Manager. At that point, I was unsure of my ability to take on a Store Manager position successfully. I was advancing quickly, and had just recently become comfortable with the Assistant Manager position. Mr. White, however, had confidence in me and encouraged me to consider a promotion. He told me that he did not want me to limit myself only to stores that were close to my home because it would be harder for me to gain advancement opportunities. He encouraged me to take a chance and to move to a new area for the promotion.

10. In April 1988, after less than 3 years with the Company, Mr. White approached me and made me aware of a Store Manager opportunity in Versailles, Missouri. I agreed to take the position and was promoted to Store Manager of Store #357 in Versailles, Missouri.

11. In 1990, I spoke to District Manager Arlen Hickman and Regional Manager Edwin Fountain about my interest in managing a larger volume store. I told them that I was willing to move anywhere as my daughter was not yet in school. Mr. Fountain responded that he would support me and would get back to me with available positions in higher volume stores. Mr. Fountain called me back with 2 locations:

Clinton, Indiana and Charleston, Illinois. I chose the Clinton Store and transferred there in June 1990.

12. While working at the Clinton Store, a Store Manager position opened in Terre Haute, Indiana, a town that was approximately a 30-minute commute from my home. I told my District Manager, Curtis Morgan, that I was interested in managing that store. Mr. Morgan passed my name along to the Regional Personnel Manager. I heard that a man – a former Assistant Manager at the Terre Haute Store – also was interested in the position. I believed that the Regional Personnel Manager was more familiar with the male candidate and I felt that this might disadvantage me. At Mr. Morgan's suggestion, I used the Open-Door Policy to speak to David Glass, the President of Wal-Mart stores. I requested that Mr. Glass include me in the group of individuals being considered for the Store Manager position. I also told Mr. Glass that I hoped he would choose the most qualified candidate. I was selected for the Terre Haute position and started as Store Manager there in July 1992.

13. In 1994, Regional Personnel Manager Kent Morris and Mr. Fountain visited with me and encouraged me to seek a promotion to Regional Personnel Manager at the Home Office. The position of Regional Personnel Manager is often a step on the road to becoming a District Manager. Because my daughter would soon be starting school I had no desire to relocate, I chose not to pursue the opportunity.

14. In 1999, Regional Manager Fred Wesson approached me about the possibility of promotion to District Manager. District Manager Curtis Morgan, who managed the neighboring District, was retiring and his District was becoming available. I agreed to pursue this opportunity and Mr. Wesson recommended me for this District Manager position. In January 2000, Divisional Manager Dave Jackson promoted me to District Manager.

15. There have been times during my career with Wal-Mart when my family situation has required me to take a leave of absence, including the birth of my children, my mother's surgery, and my father's illness and death. My managers at Wal-Mart have always been understanding in these circumstances and have given me the time off I needed. I was never asked, in any of these cases, when I would be returning. My male supervisors understood and respected my need to be with my family.

16. In my career at Wal-Mart, I have never felt that I was denied an opportunity because I am a woman. Indeed, the men that I have worked for and with, including Randy Epley (Lead Assistant Manager at Store #179), Jim Lunn (District Manager), and Fred Wesson (Regional Manager) have provided me with the training and guidance to develop professionally and encouraged me to seek out opportunities where I might not have done so on my own. For example, when I was Store Manager at the Terre Haute store, Mr. Wesson would talk to me during his tours of the store about my interest in becoming a District Manager. We spoke about different options for my career advancement. Mr. Wesson encouraged me by telling me he believed that I would add strength to his Region and that I had the ability to become a District Manager.

17. As a Store Manager, I never consider gender, race, or national origin when making pay or promotion decisions. My decisions were based upon objective factors such as experience, productivity, supervisor recommendations, and attendance.

18. As a Store Manager I had discretion to set the pay of new associates above the Company guidelines when I believed it is necessary. As a District Manager, my Store Managers have the same flexibility. As District Manager, I receive an exceptions report notifying me of any new associates pay rate within my District set above the guidelines. This comes to me after the associate has been hired, but gives me a chance to be informed about decisions made by Store Managers.

19. I make this Declaration entirely of my own free will and choice. No promises of benefits or threats have been made to me to persuade me to sign it.

I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State where I execute this declaration, the State of California, and the United States of America that the foregoing is true and correct.

DECLARATION OF JANICE TREE IN SUPPORT OF WAL-MART STORES, INC.'S OPPOSITION TO MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

Date:	July 25, 2003

Courtroom:	11, 19th Floor

DECLARATION OF JANICE TREE

I, Janice Tree, declare:

1. I am twenty-seven years old and the General Manager of Sam's Club 4703 in Albuquerque, New Mexico. I began working at Sam's Club almost six years ago. At the time, I was living in North Carolina and attending school during the day to become a dental assistant; and I was looking for a place to work in the evenings. I applied with Sam's Club at a job fair, was called back the next day, and was hired as a part-time Cashier at the Goldsboro, North Carolina Club.

2. After about five months as a Cashier, I decided to leave dental assistant school. When I did so, I began to talk to members of the management team about management opportunities at Sam's Club. For example, one evening when I was still a Cashier, Freddie Cox, who at the time was my Business Manager, asked me where I wanted to go with the company and whether I would be willing to learn a new position. I told him I was interested and he encouraged me to apply for the Checkout Supervisor position. I applied and he promoted me to that position. I held the Checkout Supervisor position until about April 1999.

3. While I was a Checkout Supervisor, I told my Merchandise Manager, Mike Roberdy, that I was interested in becoming a part of management. He told me on a number of occasions that I had potential to do great things at the company and that I should pursue it. On one such occasion, he told me that he would talk to our Director of Operations, Jerry Boggs, recommend me to Jerry, and see if Jerry would be willing to interview me for any open management positions. After he spoke with Jerry, Mike asked me if I would be willing to move to the Cary, North Carolina Club, which I told him I happily would do. A couple days later, Mike got back to me and told me there was Front End Manager opening in the Cary, North Carolina Club and encouraged me to pursue the opportunity, which I did. I interviewed with Nancy Anderson, who was the General Manager at the Cary Club. About a week later, she and Jerry called me together and offered me the position, which I accepted.

4. I worked as a Front End Manager at the Cary, North Carolina Club until about October 2000, when my then-husband was transferred to Colorado Springs. At that time, I approached Nancy Anderson and told her about my situation. I also told her that I would love to stay with the Company and asked if there were any positions available in Colorado Springs, and that I would be willing to take a step down if it would facilitate the move. Nancy informed me that she intended to speak with Paul Stone, who was in charge of management development and training for the division (including Club 6219 in Colorado Springs), and recommend me for a Business Manager position there. It is my understanding that she did so. Paul later called me to talk about the potential move, and subsequently hired, me for the Business Manager position (a promotion), even though a Front End Manager position (the same position I was in at the time) was also open. Shortly after that, and for the next two months before my move to Colorado, Nancy put me in the Assistant Manager Training Program.

5. I was a Business Manager until about January 2002. During that time, one of the things I did was work with Teresa Alexander, who was the Front End Manager, to improve the Front End (which is where the Cashiers work). We did things in order to improve customer service, reduce turnover, and increase morale among Cashiers, including increasing training (e.g., developing new hire training programs instead of simply having new Cashiers spend a few hours on the register with another Cashier before sending them out on their own), establishing biweekly meetings, increasing one-on-one training for Checkout Supervisors and Cashiers, recognizing good Cashiers, and showing them our appreciation. These changes brought about much better member service, fewer member complaints, shorter lines, and lower turnover among the Cashiers. Al Roberts, our Director of Operations, spent a lot of time in our Club because it happened to house his regional office. As a result, he had the opportunity to see the changes that we were making on the Front End. Al talked to us about these changes, telling us that ours was one of best Front Ends in the region. It was about this time that he began to ask me where I wanted to go with the company and encourage me to get out on the sales floor (e.g., in a Merchandise Manager position) to learn what I needed to learn to move up in the company. I told him that I wanted to be a General Manager as soon as possible.

6. Around January 2002, Thom Gary promoted me to a position on the sales floor – Merchandise Manager II (skipping over the Merchandise Manager I position, which is the usual next step in management). I have observed, based on my personal familiarity with the backgrounds of numerous management associates, that associates almost always spend time as a Merchandise Manager I, Merchandise Manager II, and as a Business Manager before being promoted to Co-Manager. I believe this is so they will become, by the time they are Co-Managers and General Managers, more familiar with each management position in order to be able to teach and train their management associates more effectively. I made up for my lack of Merchandise Manager I experience by taking on extra work to learn about the areas supervised by that position. My attitude was that I was responsible not just for two areas of the Club, but for the entire Club. I often offered to help the Merchandise Manager I and other associates on various shifts and with various jobs in the fresh departments (which are supervised by the Merchandise Manager I) in order to learn about those areas. For example, the fresh areas had monthly inventories that usually took place between 9 p.m. and midnight. I often would show up for these inventories and offer to help. At times, when the Merchandise Manager I was not present, I was the only manager there. I also spent time working in those areas of the Club offering to help the hourly associates. For example, when the Meat or Bakery Areas were short-staffed, I would offer to help. I often ended up grinding meat or wrapping bakery products. (As part of my training for management, I had completed all the health and safety-related computer based learning modules necessary to work there.) This experience gave me a better understanding for what these associates do, how their respective areas should look and operate, and what my reasonable expectations on them should be.

7. I continued to work hard and, around September 2002, was promoted to Co-Manager at Club 6408 in Santa Fe, New Mexico. I took it upon myself to look upon the Club as my own, acting as I would have had I been the General Manager – always working hard and taking as much responsibility as I could get. I worked as a Co-Manager until February of this year, when I saw on the Pipeline (which contains, among other things, information on management jobs that are open for posting and is accessible to management employees in all the Clubs), an opening for Club Manager at 4703. I called Al Roberts, my Director of Operations, and told him I was interested in the position. Al agreed to recommend me for the position. In February of this year, I was promoted to my current General Manager position.

8. I always knew what to expect in the jobs I sought because I asked a lot of questions of those already in management and watched how they performed their jobs (including the kinds of hours they worked). I always knew that management meant working long hours, but that was never (and is not now) a problem for me.

9. I have been promoted ahead of men who, as I understand it, have been with the company longer than I have. For example, when I became a Merchandise Manager II in Colorado Springs, I took over the position opened up when Ben Orf was moved from that position to Merchandise Manager I. Ben still is a Merchandise Manager I. Also, Darryl Bennett, who was the Co-Manager at that Club and a person I consider a mentor, still is a Co-General Manager (though at a different Club).

10. I have worked for a lot of honest people at Sam's Club, who told me when I was ready for a promotion and when I needed to learn more before moving on. Throughout my career at Sam's Club, I have worked hard to succeed. My managers frequently asked about my plans and encouraged me to seek higher-level positions. I believe that they did so because they appreciated the results of my hard work. Mike Roberdy, Freddie Cox, Al Roberts, and Thom Gary, for example, always listened to me when I expressed an interest in promotion, gave me advice, and encouraged me. Many of these people have acted as mentors to me. For example:

(a) Nancy Anderson was the first General Manager I worked for and I like the way she ran her business. She was tough, but extremely fair and honest. I still try to emulate her. Today, I try to do so in the way I run my Club.

(b) Freddie Cox, who was my Business Manager when I began with Sam's Club, always exerted a positive influence on me. He told me what I needed to work on for a promotion, then he was the one who promoted me into a supervisory position. He also always stressed the positive before offering any constructive criticism. And he always made time to help prepare me for management, including spending his personal time teaching me about reports and computer programs that I would need to be familiar with to move up in management.

(c) Thom Gary also spent a lot of time preparing me for management, including showing me how to prepare and review budgets and touring my areas with me. When Thom toured with me, he would ask me questions about those areas, such as whether the features were correct, if seasonal concerns had been accounted for, whether and how I was planning the area for the future (not just the next week, but the next six months). He also reviewed cleanliness and safety issues with me. I also learned from those tours how to tour a management associate when I was in a position to do so, including the diplomacy that it called for. Thom also inspired me with his own story at Wal-Mart – for example, how he emphasized the "we" concept instead of the "I" concept in his career. Thom always made time to help me.

(d) Angel Valdez was my General Manager when I was a Co-Manager. He role modeled what it meant to be a General Manager and I tried to mirror him. He also showed concern for me as a person and encouraged me to balance work with family. For example, when I was having marital problems, he offered to let me take time off.

(e) Darryl Bennett was a Co-Manager when I was a Merchandise Manager. Darryl also went out of his way to train me to become a Co-Manager. He is another role model who was an inspiration to me and made me a better associate. He did so by challenging me to be my best. I also benefited greatly from the times he toured with me, when he would quiz me on features that were on display and make sure I was prepared to speak intelligently if upper management came into the store and wanted to tour with me. He shared with me his own experiences at Sam's Club and inspired me to accept the challenges and responsibilities associated with management.

11. As a Club Manager, I decide what to pay associates in my Club, and I make those decisions in a fair and nondiscriminatory way. The Starting Rate for hourly associates in my Club is $8.50 per hour. I have the authority and the flexibility to start an associate at a level above that rate based on, for example, the associate's skills and prior experience. As long as that extra pay I am authorizing is within a reasonable amount of the minimum pay for a given position (e.g., $1.50 or $2.00), I do not seek the approval of my Director of Operations. I have only sought such approval once, which involved an associate in Produce with 15 years of prior experience whom I wanted to pay $13.00 per hour. My Director of Operations approved that amount. I don't give associates raises just because they ask for one. Instead, I want to see evidence of hard work, dedication, and quality performance before giving someone a raise. When I do see those things, I award the raise I consider appropriate.

12. I am excited about my Club because I have seen a lot of changes in the four months that I have been the General Manager. I am a firm believer that the only way to succeed is to empower your people. I believe a well-run Club is one where the associates are empowered to run their own departments and do not feel they need to call management to make decisions for them. I trust my associates and want my associates to trust me. I try to have fun, promote teamwork, show my associates I appreciate them, give them a lot of feedback, and improve morale. I have also tried to be available to associates, including spending time with them on the floor so they can find me if they want to talk. This makes it easier for associates to raise "open door" issues with me. For example, on several Saturdays, I have put on a butcher's coat and ground meat with the Meat Cutters. They told me that was the first time a General Manager had ever done that with them.

13. These efforts are paying off. For example, we just reached 90 consecutive days accident-free, which is the longest accident-free stretch in the Club since it opened in November 2000. Also, when I took over, we were classified as a "high-shrink Club," unable to reconcile $70,000 in inventory. We have reduced that number to $7,000 and no longer are classified as a "high-shrink Club." Not only are sales and profits up – and sales are up 40% from the same month last year and profits have quadrupled from the same month last year – I have seen real improvement in morale. For example, at our recent Club picnic, there were about 100 people there at any given time, which is a much higher turnout than in recent years.

14. I have personal knowledge of the facts contained in this Declaration. If called and sworn as a witness, I would testify competently to those facts.

15. I make this Declaration entirely of my own free will and choice. No promises of benefits or threats have been made to me to persuade me to sign it.

I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State where I execute this declaration, the State of California, and the United States of America that the foregoing is true and correct.

DECLARATION OF STACY WIGGINS IN SUPPORT OF WAL-MART STORES, INC.'S OPPOSITION TO MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

Date:	July 25, 2003
Time:	10:00 a.m.
Courtroom:	11, 19th Floor
Judge:	Martin J. Jenkins
Complaint Filed:	June 8, 2001
Trial Date:	None Set

DECLARATION OF STACY WIGGINS

I, Stacy Wiggins, declare:

1. I am a female. I am the Store Manager at Wal-Mart Store # 2844. Store # 2844 is a Supercenter in Half Moon, New York, which is approximately ten minutes outside of Albany, New York. The Supercenter is approximately 204,000 square feet in size.

2. I have been a Store Manager for over four years. I have held my current position for the past 1½ years.

3. I am a high school graduate. Prior to coming to work at Wal-Mart, I worked for approximately two years as a waitress. Prior to that I served in the Army for three years. While in the Army, I was an E4 Specialist in Graphics Illustration.

4. On September 14, 1992, I was hired by Wal-Mart as a part-time Cashier in Mechanicsburg, Pennsylvania. Shortly thereafter, I became a full-time Cashier.

5. After I had been a Cashier for two months, my Store Manager approached me and asked me whether I would like to become a Customer Service Manager. I accepted the position and soon afterward I became the Head Customer Service Manager.

6. After becoming a Customer Service Manager, I told my Personnel Manager that I was interested in becoming part of Wal-Mart management. She told me to tell my Store Manager, a male, and I did so.

7. Shortly after I spoke to my Store Manager about my interest in advancing at the Company, he offered me the position of Support Manager. Then, approximately eight weeks later, he offered me a position in the Management Training Program. I became a Management Trainee in the Gettysburg, Pennsylvania store in June 1995.

8. After I completed the Management Training Program I became an Assistant Manager in the Hanover, Pennsylvania store. While I was an Assistant Manager, my Store Manager (a male) recommended me for a Sam Walton Hero Award, which I received. This is an award that is given each year to approximately six Assistant Managers selected from the entire Company. It is a big honor to receive this award. I received the award because my overnight associates wrote to the home office and told my Store Manager that they felt I was the best Assistant Manager they had ever seen. As a result of winning this award, I received a plaque and a gold watch, and became a member of the Rising Star program.

9. After I had been an Assistant Manager for approximately three years, my Regional Personnel Manager (a male) called and asked me if I would be willing to go to Millville, New Jersey to be a Co-Manager at a store there. I accepted the position and was promoted to Co-Manager in February 1998.

10. After approximately eight months as a Co-Manager, the same Regional Personnel Manager (a male) called and told me that he felt that I was ready for my own store – i.e., to be a Store Manager. I then applied for a Store Manager position in Pennsville, New Jersey via a computer-based learning ("CBL") terminal. It was common knowledge among Assistant Managers and Co-Managers that this was the way to apply for Store Manager positions. I received the Store Manager position in Pennsville, New Jersey.

11. After becoming a Store Manager, I was selected for the Company's Leadership Express program. Only 50 associates in my entire Division, which includes the upper Northeast portion of the country, are part of this program. The Leadership Express program is designed to help associates whom the Company believes have the potential to be two steps higher in management than they currently are. The program will help me progress even further with the Company.

12. During my time at Wal-Mart, there have been a number of managers who treated me well and helped ensure that I was getting the experience and training that I needed to progress. These include several male Store Managers to whom I have reported – Todd Harbaugh, Jim Spencer, Ron Frank, and Brooke Garrison – as well as District Manager Al Jenkins and Division Manager Mike Huffaker. In particular, Al Jenkins has been a mentor to me. He was my District Manager until recently. He frequently took the time to show me the reports with which he worked as a District Manager, and took me from store to store to see what he did. I still feel like I can call him if I need help or advice about my career.

13. As a Store Manager, I am responsible for making decisions about hourly employees' compensation. For new hires, I base decisions about pay upon the job the associate will be doing and the associate's prior experience. For current employees, I base pay decisions on job performance. In no instance do I consider a person's gender in making decisions about pay.

14. As a Store Manager, I also make promotion decisions within the store. I make hourly supervisor opportunities known by posting them on the CBL terminal and by the time clock, and I also announce them at store meetings. I select people to move up within the Company based on merit. I do not consider a person's gender in making promotion decisions.

15. I am very happy with my career at Wal-Mart, and with how I have been treated since joining the Company.

16. I have personal knowledge of the facts contained in this Declaration. If called and sworn as a witness, I would testify to those facts.

17. I make this Declaration entirely of my own free will and choice. No promises of benefits or threats have been made to me to persuade me to sign it.

I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State of New York, the State of California, and the United States of America that the foregoing is true and correct.

DECLARATION OF LINDA DONATH

[IN REBUTTAL TO DECLARATION OF DESIGNATED CLASS MEMBER SHEILA ACREE]

Date: July 25, 2003
Time: 10:00 a.m.
Courtroom: 11, 19th Floor
Judge: Martin J. Jenkins

Complaint Filed: June 8, 2001
Trial Date: None Set

DECLARATION OF LINDA DONATH

I, LINDA DONATH, declare:

1. I am a female. I am an Assistant Manager at Store # 135 in Chillicothe, Missouri. I have held this position since 1988. From approximately 1994 to April 2001, Sheila Acree was a sales associate at Store # 135. I sometimes supervised Ms. Acree's employment, depending upon the particular department in which she was working.

2. I have read the "DECLARATION OF SHEILA ACREE IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION." In paragraphs 3 and 6 of her declaration, Ms. Acree claims that she was denied a promotion into hourly supervisor positions and the Management Training Program because she is a woman. I am submitting this Declaration in rebuttal to that claim.

3. Throughout her tenure at Store # 135, Ms. Acree had serious attendance problems. For weeks at a time she would call in absent once or twice a week. Store Manager Frank Chaney and the Assistant Managers attempted to accommodate Ms. Acree. We understood that Ms. Acree's absences initially were related to her husband's heart problems and, later, to her divorce from that husband.

4. Ms. Acree's absentee problems made her unqualified for promotion.

5. In paragraph 12 of her declaration, Ms. Acree claims that she left Wal-Mart in 2000 "in frustration with being passed over for promotion and the lack of information about promotional opportunities." This is not true. On or about May 2000, Ms. Acree approached me and asked permission to take the night off so that she could travel to Kansas City with her boyfriend to pick up his truck. At that time we were understaffed. I said to her, "I'm sorry, but I just don't have enough coverage in the store to let you go tonight." Ms. Acree became upset, and soon afterwards approached me again to tell me that she was quitting. She also complained to me that no one at the store liked her.

6. During the majority of the 14 years that I have been at Store # 135, the Assistant Managers have all been female.

7. Store # 135 is a training store. Assistant Manager Trainees from elsewhere in the District come to Store 135 to train. I have seen a number of female Assistant Manager Trainees train in our store.

8. 17 of the 19 department managers at Store # 135 are women.

9. I believe that Store Manager Frank Chaney is extremely fair to his employees, and that he does not discriminate against employees on the basis of their gender.

I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State of California, the State of Missouri and the United States of America that the foregoing is true and correct.

II) Date: July 25, 2003 Time: 10:00 a.m. Courtroom: 11, 19TH Floor Judge: Martin J. Jenkins Complaint Filed: June 8, 2001 Trial Date: None Set

DECLARATION OF SANDRA JEAN ELLISON

I, Sandra Jean Ellison, declare:

1. I have been employed by Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. ("Wal-Mart") since May, 20, 1991. I currently hold the position of District Manager in District # 322, and I have responsibility for eight stores located in Colorado, Nebraska, and Wyoming, and have held this position since November, 2001. Prior to that time, my experience at the Company includes approximately 3 1/2 years as a Store Manager at two different stores. As such, I have personal knowledge of the facts set forth herein except where stated upon information and belief and, if called as a witness, I would and could competently testify thereto.

1. As a Store Manager during the period October, 1996 through January, 2000, I had responsibility to make or approve all hiring decisions for hourly associates within my store. I also had responsibility to set the minimum Store Start Rate for my individual store based on the local market where my store was located and to determine whether to pay new hires the minimum starting rate based on the Store Start Rate and the pay classification of the new hire or some appropriate higher starting pay rate. After I determined the appropriate starting rate of pay to offer an applicant and the applicant accepted the Company's offer of employment, I advised the Personnel Manager at the store to input the new associate information including his/her starting pay rate into the Company's computerized payroll system called the SMART system. Any starting pay rate for the new hire up to 6% above the minimum starting rates based on the Store Start Rate could be entered into the SMART system without my manual override as the Store Manager. If the Personnel Manager entered a starting pay rate 6% over the minimum starting rate, a "pop-up" notification would appear on the computer screen advising the user that the pay rate does not adhere to the Company's guidelines and that it is necessary to enter the Store Manager's password to override the system and enter a higher starting rate for the new hire. For example, if the Store Start Rate was $7.00 per hour, the Personnel Manager could enter a starting pay rate for a Sales Associate at a pay class 1 an hourly rate of up to $7.45 (Store Start Rate plus 6% rounded up to nearest nickel) or for a Cashier at a pay class 2 an hourly rate of up to $7.70 (Store Start Rate plus $0.25 plus 6% rounded up to nearest nickel).

2. If I made the decision to pay a new associate more than 6% above the minimum starting rate, I could simply enter my password as a Store Manager and the new associate would be paid whatever amount I designated. There was no maximum amount for this manual override, and I had discretion to pay a new hire up to $2.00 over the minimum starting rate without consulting my District Manager. However, if the minimum starting rate was exceeded by more than 6%, an exception report would be generated and sent to the District Manager to whom I reported. I do not recall any District Manager ever contacting me when I was a Store Manager to question any pay issues that were listed on the exception report. Nor did any District Manager ever change any pay decision that I had already made after receiving an exception report.

3. As a District Manager, I now receive exception reports for all the stores that are within my District. These exception reports and the procedure for handling these reports has not changed during the period of time that I have been a District Manager. Exception reports cover a two-week period, and I generally receive the exception report approximately a week or more after the close of this two week period. These exception reports list all payroll "exceptions" that are outside the pay guidelines, including new hires, merit increases, differentials, job changes, etc. Although the exception report provides information such as the name of the person whose pay was outside the guidelines, the store, the job classification, the position, and the date, the report does not identify the starting pay actually paid to the new hire or the excess amount paid over the minimum starting pay. I sometimes quickly review exception reports, but they are not something that is particularly useful to me. I do not recall ever contacting a Store Manager to question him or her about an exception report. I have never changed a payroll decision that already has been made by the Store Manager.

I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State of Wyoming, California and the United States of America, that the foregoing is true and correct.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECLARATION OF CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, NAMED PLAINTIFF, IN REPLY TO DEFENDANT'S OPPOSITION TO MOTION FOR CLASS CERTIFICATION

I, Christine Kwapnoski, declare:

1. I have read the references to me in Wal-Mart's brief in opposition to Plaintiffs' Motion for Class Certification. I offer this declaration in response.

2. I was an hourly associate at Sam's Club from 1986 until approximately two weeks after this lawsuit was filed. At that time, I was promoted to Area Manager, which is a management position. Because it was a salaried position, and I no longer received overtime, I actually earned less than I had as an hourly employee. However, because I was told I would be in that position for approximately one year and then be promoted to Assistant Manager, I welcomed the promotion. I remained an Area Manager for more than eighteen months, until a few days after the deposition of Greg Spragg, Executive Vice President of Sam's Club. At that time, I was promoted into the Management Training Program. I completed the program in May 2003, and assumed the responsibilities of an Assistant Manager (Bakery Manager) at the Sam's Club in Concord, California in June 2003. Contrary to Defendant's representation, I was not "briefly a 'lowest level manager at a Sam's Club" (Opp. Brief, 33:9-10). Instead, I have been an hourly employee, an hourly supervisor, an Area Manager, and now an Assistant Manager. I have held salaried management positions for two years.

3. I am a single mother of two children. My children live in another state with their father. My children have spent summer vacations and Christmas vacations with me for the last nine years. Throughout these years, I was scheduled for vacation from approximately Christmas Day until after the New Year. I have been told by my current General Manager that I cannot have this time off this year. I have attempted to use the Open Door to discuss this issue. I have been diverted in my several attempts to contact Greg Johnston, the Regional Vice President, and instead have been directed to speak with the Regional Personnel Manager. The promised confidentiality of the Open Door was not maintained. I was told I was not going to be permitted to have the time off to be with my children, although I had received this time off for the last nine years. I am aware of no policy which prohibits me from having the time off.

4. It is well known in the store that I have been actively involved in this litigation.

5. I have reviewed the Declaration of Victoria Howard in Support of Wal-Mart's Opposition, who states that Wal-Mart was willing to accommodate her family needs when she went into Management Training. Wal-Mart has refused to accommodate my family needs now that my involvement in this suit has become common knowledge.

6. I have personal knowledge of the foregoing facts and if called, could and would testify competently thereto. I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the State of California and the United States of America that the foregoing is true and correct. Executed this 2 day of July, 2003 at San Francisco, California.

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, CLEO PAGE, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, DEBORAH GUNTER, KAREN WILLIAMSON AND EDITH ARANA, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiffs, vs. WAL-MART STORES, INC., Defendant	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ SUPPLEMENTAL DECLARATION OF DR. RICHARD DROGIN IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' REPLY BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF MOTION TO STRIKE PORTIONS OF HAWORTH DECLARATION FOR FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH FED. R. CIV. PRO. 26(a)(2) Date: July 25, 2003 Time: 10:00 a.m. Courtroom: 11

I, Dr. Richard Drogin declare:

I make this declaration of my own personal knowledge and could testify thereto if called as a witness.

1. I have reviewed the declaration of Dr. Joan Haworth submitted in opposition to plaintiffs' Motion to Strike Portions of Haworth Declaration. I have also reviewed the email correspondence attached as exhibit 6 to the Supplemental Seligman Declaration.

2. Neither Dr. Haworth, or defense counsel Nancy Abell identify any computer files or paper documents containing Chow analyses of grocery/non-grocery subdivisions, or of my regressions, that were produced to plaintiffs prior to Dr. Haworth's deposition.

3. I have reviewed the analyses that were attached to the Abell emails, and have searched the computer files and paper documents produced by Wal-Mart prior to Dr. Haworth's deposition. Based on searches by filename and content, I have not located any Chow analyses of grocery/non-grocery subdivisions, or of my regressions, in the productions.

4. I reviewed Dr. Haworth's Report and Amended Report, and attended her deposition. I understood from her Report and deposition that she had sub-divided the stores into grocery, non-grocery, and specialty sub-divisions, as I explained in my Rebuttal Report and Declaration in Support of Plaintiffs' Reply Brief in Support of Class Certification. I also explained in my rebuttal report and reply declaration that if Dr. Haworth's hourly regression disparities were aggregated over her store sub-units, women were underpaid relative to men by about 12 cents, and this underpayment was statistically significant. To reach this conclusion, I took the regressions labeled grocery and non-grocery from Dr. Haworth's alternative analyses, produced three days before her deposition, and the specialty regressions from her initial, apparently unchanged regressions. I assumed that the initial specialty regressions were unchanged, given the text and labeling in Dr. Haworth's initial and Amended reports. Thus, for example, in her Red-lined Amended Report, Dr. Haworth states at pp 50-51 that she had conducted "a separate analysis of hourly pay rates for each of the major business types: (a)Wal-Mart stores and non-Grocery SuperCenter divisions, (b)Sam's Club, (c)the Specialty Divisions and (d)Grocery Divisions." She later reports "alternative regressions" for non-grocery and grocery employees. Id at p. 53. These reports made a clear distinction between non-grocery and specialty divisions, a distinction Dr. Haworth continued to make in her deposition testimony. The amended report nowhere stated the fact that the new analyses and amended report had combined specialty sub-units with non-grocery sub-units in the same regressions. Dr. Haworth's Amended Report continued to report separate specialty regressions.

5. My reply declaration in support of class certification did not change any of my analyses, as I clearly state therein. See Drogin Declaration in Support of Plaintiffs' Reply Brief in Support of Class Certification at 2:14-16. After that declaration was filed, I understand that defendant's counsel has asserted that I "double-counted" the specialty employees in my aggregation, and provided supporting documentation to this effect. I have reviewed this material and conclude that Wal-Mart's counsel is correct that I double-counted the specialty employees in my aggregation. I believe, however, that this error is the result of my reliance on Dr. Haworth's Reports and deposition testimony and the failure of her amended report to disclose that she had in fact combined specialty and non-grocery employees in her regressions analyses

6. My over-all conclusion that aggregated Haworth regressions demonstrate women are paid less then men at Wal-Mart based on Dr. Haworth's variables and that this pattern is statistically significant is unchanged. The only change is that the overall difference in pay between men and women is about nine cents, instead of twelve cents, after aggregating

Dr. Haworth's regression disparities from her store sub-units.

I declare under penalty of perjury that the foregoing is true and correct.

BRIEF FOR PETITIONER

INTRODUCTION

The Ninth Circuit's decision allowing this class action to proceed contradicts Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23, departs from this Court's precedent, and endorses an approach that would abrogate the substantive and procedural rights of both Wal-Mart and absent class members.

The certification order is flatly inconsistent with Rule 23(a)'s prerequisites. The class members—potentially millions of women supervised by tens of thousands of different managers and employed in thousands of different stores throughout the country—assert highly individualized, fact-intensive claims for monetary relief that are subject to individualized statutory defenses. The named plaintiffs' claims cannot conceivably be typical of the claims of the strangers they seek to represent. These intractable problems are compounded by a virtually boundless class definition that produces an across-the-board class pervaded by conflicts among its members. This kaleidoscope of claims, defenses, issues, locales, events, and individuals makes it impossible for the named plaintiffs to be adequate representatives of the absent class members.

Nor can the certification order be reconciled with the requirements of Rule 23(b)(2), which is limited by its terms to claims for "injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief." Plaintiffs seek billions of dollars in individual monetary relief, yet seek to evade the additional procedures required for fair adjudication of monetary claims, including notice and opt-out rights for absent class members.

The certification order is harmful to the rights of everyone involved. It distorts basic principles of class-action and anti-discrimination law, eviscerates fundamental procedural protections for class-action defendants, and allows three class representatives to extinguish the rights of millions of absent class members without even telling them about it. The decision below should be reversed, and the class decertified.

OPINIONS BELOW

The Ninth Circuit's en banc opinion (Pet. App. 1a-161a) is published at 603 F.3d 571. Superseded panel opinions are reported at 509 F.3d 1168 and 474 F.3d 1214. The district court's certification order (Pet. App. 162a-283a) is published at 222 F.R.D. 137. A related evidentiary order is published at 222 F.R.D. 189.

JURISDICTION

The Ninth Circuit's judgment was entered on April 26, 2010. Justice Kennedy extended the time for filing the petition for a writ of certiorari to August 25, 2010. No. 10A19. The petition was filed on that date and granted on December 6, 2010. This Court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1).

STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

Pertinent provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (as amended), the Rules Enabling Act, and Rule 23 are reproduced in this brief's appendix.

STATEMENT

The district court certified under Rule 23(b)(2) a class of "[a]ll women employed at any Wal-Mart domestic retail store at any time since December 26, 1998, who have been or may be subjected to Wal-Mart's challenged pay and management track promotions policies and practices." Pet. App. 283a. The Ninth Circuit, in a 6-5 en banc decision, affirmed in substantial part. Id. at 99a-102a.

1. Wal-Mart is the Nation's largest private employer. At the time of class certification (in 2004), Wal-Mart's U.S. retail operations comprised 7 divisions, 41 regions, 400 districts, 3,400 stores, and more than 1,000,000 employees. Pet. App. 163a; see also id. at 114a (Ikuta, J., dissenting). Each store employed 80 to 500 people, with hourly employees assigned to 53 departments in 170 different job classifications. Ibid.

Wal-Mart's company-wide policy, then and now, expressly bars discrimination based on sex, and Wal-Mart has consistently promulgated and enforced equal opportunity policies to foster diversity, ensure fair treatment, and prohibit unlawful discrimination. Pet. App. 196a; J.A. 1576a-1596a. As the district court recognized, "Wal-Mart has earned national diversity awards and its executives discuss diversity and include it in company handbooks and trainings. The company has diversity goals, performance assessments, and penalties for EEO violations." Pet. App. 195a (citations omitted).

When the complaint was filed in 2001, individual store managers had "substantial discretion in making salary decisions for hourly employees in their respective stores" and "promotion decisions for in-store employees." Pet. App. 177a, 180a. Wal-Mart's policies cabined that discretion by setting salary ranges and establishing objective standards for its local managers to apply when making these decisions. J.A. 1468a-1469a, 1498a-1511a, 1609a, 1616a; D.C. Dkt. 270-508.

2. Only three of the named plaintiffs remain members of the certified class. See Pet. App. 115a (Ikuta, J., dissenting). They worked at different stores, at different times, in different positions, for different managers. They were promoted to (and demoted from) different jobs, disciplined for different offenses, paid different amounts for performing different jobs, applied for different management training opportunities (or not), and kept working (or not) for different reasons. J.A. 606a–624a, 743a–749a, 997a–1006a. Their testimony illustrates their differing experiences:

a. Edith Arana worked at the Duarte, California store from 1995 to 2001. J.A. 606a. She worked in a number of different positions and was promoted and received numerous raises. Id. at 606a–618a. In 2000, she approached the store manager regarding management training; on one occasion the manager "did not reply" but "simply shrugged his shoulders and walked away," and on another the manager "did not respond and brushed [her] off." Id. at 614a. Ms. Arana concluded that the manager "was denying [her] the opportunity to advance with the Company because [she] was a woman." Id. at 614a–615a. She initiated internal complaint procedures, after which a (female) supervisor advised Ms. Arana to "apply directly to the District Manager" if she had concerns with her store manager. Id. at 616a–617a. Ms. Arana, however, "decided against this," and she never again applied for management training. Id. at 617a–623a. The following year, she was fired for failure to comply with Wal-Mart's timekeeping policies. Id. at 623a; C.A. App. 337–340.

b. Betty Dukes was hired as a cashier at the Pittsburg, California store in 1994. J.A. 743a–745a. She sought and received a promotion to customer service manager. Id. at 745a–748a. Ms. Dukes's "eligibility for [further] promotion was limited," however, by a series of disciplinary violations, which led to her demotion to cashier and then (after an unspecified injury) to greeter. Id. at 745a–746a. She does not deny violating company policy, but maintains that the disciplinary actions were "retaliat[ion]" (by a female supervisor) for invoking internal complaint procedures and asserts that she is "not aware of any male employees who have been disciplined for similar transactions." Ibid. She also claims that two male greeters in the Pittsburg store are paid at a higher rate than she is. Id. at 748a–749a.

c. Christine Kwapnoski has "spent most of [her] adult life" working for Sam's Club—a division of Wal-Mart—in Missouri and California. J.A. 997a. She worked in many positions and "received annual raises and merit raises upon occasion," as well as an eventual promotion to a supervisory position. Id. at 999a, 1004a–1005a. She claims that a male manager "yelled at [her] frequent[ly]" and "scream[ed] at other female employees, but seldom did he scream at men." Id. at 1000a–1001a. Allegedly, the same manager later "told her to 'doll up,' to wear some makeup, and to dress a little better." Id. at 1003a.

3. The named plaintiffs seek "injunctive and declaratory relief, back pay, and punitive damages, but not traditional 'compensatory' damages," on behalf of every woman employed in every Wal-Mart retail store nationwide during the relevant period. Pet. App. 5a. With one exception (pharmacy), the class includes every job classification in every department—from part-time entry level hourly workers to salaried managers earning well above $100,000 per year. At the time of certification, the class definition

"cover[ed] at least 1.5 million women . . ., thus dwarfing other employment discrimination cases that have come before." Id. at 165a.[1]

Plaintiffs moved for class certification, alleging (as they had in their complaint) that Wal-Mart "fosters or facilitates gender stereotyping and discrimination, . . . and that this discrimination is common to all women who work or have worked in Wal-Mart stores." Pet. App. 5a; see also J.A. 47a–57a, 73a–76a; D.C. Dkt. 99 at 1–4. They were unable, however, to identify "a specific discriminatory policy promulgated by Wal-Mart." Pet. App. 59a. In "the absence of" such a policy (ibid.), plaintiffs premised their motion on statistics, sociology, and anecdotes.

The district court accepted plaintiffs' theory and certified the class. The court "recognize[d] that there is a tension inherent in characterizing a system as having both excessive subjectivity at the local level and centralized control." Pet. App. 192a. It nevertheless concluded that "in-store pay and promotion decisions are largely subjective and made within a substantial range of discretion by store or district level managers, and that this is a common feature which provides a wide enough conduit for gender bias to potentially seep into the system." Ibid.

On virtually every contested issue, however, the district court declined to make findings on the ground that the "merits" of the case could not be considered at class certification. Pet. App. 166a, 169a

[1] Of these, about 500,000 were employed as of the date the complaint was filed. Pet. App. 6a n.3. Wal-Mart has employed more than three million women since then.

170a, 173a, 192a–193a, 196a–198a, 208a, 211a–212a, 222a, 224a–226a.

a. Statistics. Plaintiffs' theory is premised on alleged ad hoc discrimination by local store managers. However, plaintiffs' statistical expert, Richard Drogin, did not identify any store-level pay differentials. Instead, he aggregated the data on a regional or national basis to justify opining that such data show pay and promotion disparities between men and women. Pet. App. 200a–201a.

Wal-Mart's expert, Joan Haworth, explained that "more than 90% of the stores had no pay rate differences between men and women that were statistically significant" (J.A. 1344a), and Drogin submitted nothing to rebut these data.

b. Sociology. Plaintiffs' expert, William Bielby, opined that Wal-Mart is "vulnerable to" gender bias, although he "conceded that he could not calculate whether 0.5 percent or 95 percent of the employment decisions at Wal-Mart might be determined by stereotyped thinking." 222 F.R.D. at 192 (emphasis added).

c. Anecdotes. Plaintiffs submitted declarations from 112 current and former Wal-Mart employees, only 63 of whom remain members of the class. See J.A. 590a–624a, 632a–653a, 660a–685a, 707a–734a, 743a–749a, 772a–778a, 789a–804a, 813a–816a, 822a–826a, 844a–863a, 874a–880a, 896a–906a, 916a–919a, 934a–957a, 964a–991a, 997a–1006a, 1011a–1015a, 1022a–1047a, 1053a–1087a, 1093a–1096a, 1104a–1111a, 1131a–1135a, 1144a–1164a, 1168a–1173a, 1190a–1194a, 1215a–1221a, 1228a–1241a, 1248a–1253a, 1261a–1278a, 1302a–1305a, 1315a–1321a. These declarations depict a relative handful of widely divergent, and often entirely unique, events.

4. The Ninth Circuit en banc majority recognized the error in the district court's approach to contested issues (Pet. App. 52a n.20), but nevertheless affirmed the certification order in substantial part.

a. The majority agreed that plaintiffs had satisfied Rule 23(a)'s requirements of "commonality," "typicality," and "adequacy."

i. The court concluded that plaintiffs' evidence was sufficient "to raise the common question whether Wal-Mart's female employees nationwide were subjected to a single set of corporate policies . . . that may have worked to unlawfully discriminate against them in violation of Title VII." Pet. App. 78a. Furthermore, "[e]vidence of Wal-Mart's subjective decision-making policies suggests a common legal or factual question regarding whether Wal-Mart's policies or practices are discriminatory." Ibid.

The court thus found class treatment appropriate based not on a showing of any commonly applied policy or practice but rather on the basis of a "common question" whether female employees at Wal-Mart had experienced discrimination. Pet. App. 78a. In reaching this conclusion, the court flatly rejected, as a "hypothetical in clear dicta" (id. at 42a n.15), this Court's holding that a plaintiff seeking class treatment in this context must offer "[s]ignificant proof that an employer operated under a general policy of discrimination" that was implemented "through entirely subjective decisionmaking processes." Gen. Tel. Co. of the Sw. v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 159 n.15 (1982) (emphases added).

ii. The majority declared that the claims were "sufficiently typical," "[e]ven though individual employees in different stores with different managers may have received different levels of pay or may have been denied promotion or promoted at different rates, because the discrimination they claim to have suffered occurred through alleged common practices—e.g., excessively subjective decision making in a corporate culture of uniformity and gender stereotyping." Pet. App. 80a.

iii. The majority's adequacy analysis consisted of its observation that "courts need not deny certification of an employment class simply because the class includes both supervisory and non-supervisory employees." Pet. App. 82a.

b. The Ninth Circuit also found that plaintiffs' claims for billions of dollars in backpay could be certified pursuant to Rule 23(b)(2), which authorizes certification only of claims for injunctive or corresponding declaratory relief. In doing so, the majority rejected the standards previously articulated by other circuits for mandatory certification of monetary claims and announced its own newly formulated standard. Pet. App. 84a–88a. The court also remanded plaintiffs' punitive-damages claims for further consideration. Id. at 99a.

c. Judge Ikuta explained in the principal dissent: "Never before has such a low bar been set for certifying such a gargantuan class. The majority's ruling provides scant limits to the types of classes that can be certified. Put simply, the door is now open to Title VII lawsuits targeting national and international companies, regardless of size and diversity, based on nothing more than general and conclusory allegations, a handful of anecdotes, and statistical disparities that bear little relation to the alleged discriminatory decisions." Pet. App. 160a.

d. Chief Judge Kozinski added in a separate dissent that the class members "have little in common but their sex and this lawsuit." Pet. App. 161a.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Rule 23's requirements cannot be rewritten to facilitate class certification, nor can substantive rights be abrogated or modified to certify a class. Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 612-13 (1997). The courts below repeatedly transgressed these important limitations. The certification order cannot stand.

I. The certification order is not consistent with Rule 23(a).

A. The claims asserted on behalf of millions of individuals do not remotely satisfy Rule 23(a)'s commonality, typicality, or adequacy requirements.

1. The commonality requirement ensures that the named plaintiffs' claims are sufficiently like the other class members' that they may be resolved on a collective basis.

a. This Court has recognized the "wide gap" between individualized allegations of discrimination and a company-wide practice that may be challenged in a class action. Gen. Tel. Co. of the Sw. v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 157 (1982). To bridge this gap, class plaintiffs must submit "[s]ignificant proof that an employer operated under a general policy of discrimination." Id. at 159 n.15. But plaintiffs here did not attempt to make such a showing. They could not do so because Wal-Mart's general policies uniformly prohibit discrimination and promote diversity. Pet. App. 195a. Plaintiffs also "failed to identify a specific discriminatory policy at Wal-Mart." Id. at 55a.

Moreover, plaintiffs did not offer proof that Wal-Mart implemented its policies in a discriminatory fashion common to all female employees. They have never suggested that Wal-Mart established an "entirely subjective decisionmaking process[ ]." Falcon, 457 U.S. at 159 n.15 (emphasis added). The discretion exercised by Wal-Mart's local managers was governed not just by the company's anti-discrimination policy but also by a company-wide framework for pay and promotions. Plaintiffs have never offered significant proof that this framework was discriminatory. This precludes any inference that Wal-Mart was misusing discretionary decisionmaking—which is itself lawful (Watson v. Fort Worth Bank & Trust, 487 U.S. 977, 990 (1988))—to mask or implement a general policy of discrimination that pervaded all of the individual decisions.

The millions of discretionary decisions by tens of thousands of individual managers around the country defy common treatment under Rule 23(a).

b. Plaintiffs tried to bridge the "Falcon gap" by offering statistical, sociological, and anecdotal evidence, all of which serve only to confirm the lack of commonality.

i. Plaintiffs' liability theory turns on decisions made by individual store managers, but their aggregated statistical analysis, which purported to show disparities at the national or regional levels, cannot serve to establish commonality regarding the myriad decisions of local store managers or the impact of those decisions on individual class members. See Watson, 487 U.S. at 992 (plurality). The unrebutted evidence established that more than 90% of the stores had no pay rate differences between men and women that were statistically significant.

ii. Plaintiffs rested much of their case on a sociologist's opinion that Wal-Mart is "vulnerable" to gender bias and stereotypes, and that the centralized control exercised by the company over certain aspects of its retail operations (such as "the temperature and music in each store") could serve as a "conduit" for discrimination. Pet. App. 190a, 192a, 195a. The same sociologist conceded that he had no idea how often this phenomenon might occur. 222 F.R.D. at 192. His testimony thus defeats, rather than supports, a finding of commonality.

iii. The 63 class-member declarations submitted by plaintiffs also defeat commonality. While they purport to portray instances of unequal treatment, the unique facts and circumstances of even this small sample vary dramatically. Pet. App. 127a (Ikuta, J., dissenting).

2. The typicality requirement "limit[s] the class claims to those fairly encompassed by the named plaintiff's claims." Gen. Tel. Co. of the Nw. v. EEOC, 446 U.S. 318, 330 (1980). But the declarations of the three remaining class representatives show that their claims—and the defenses to those claims—are atypical of those that might be asserted by millions of absent women. Proving (or disproving) any such claim would not make it any more (or less) likely that others' claims are cognizable (or remediable).

3. The adequacy requirement serves to prevent conflicts of interest among the class members. Amchem, 521 U.S. at 618, 625. The class here, however, is replete with such conflicts. For example, the class includes both managers and hourly employees—plaintiffs thus accuse other class members of discriminating against them. A clearer conflict of interest is difficult to imagine, and there are many more.

B. Solely in an effort to satisfy Rule 23(a), the lower courts elected to alter the rules—relieving plaintiffs of the burden of proving elements of their case, and precluding Wal-Mart from presenting otherwise available defenses. The Rules Enabling Act, which mandates that procedural rules may not alter substantive rights, forbids this. 28 U.S.C. § 2072(b).

1. The courts below erred in relieving plaintiffs of their burden of proving key substantive elements of their claims, including (a) an unlawful employment practice, and (b) discriminatory intent.

a. Plaintiffs argue that individual store managers exercised subjective discretion in a manner that uniformly disadvantaged female employees. That is a necessary component of both their disparate-impact and disparate-treatment claims, but it would require store-by-store proof that defeats commonality and typicality.

b. Equally problematic for plaintiffs—yet entirely unaddressed by the lower courts—is the intent element of their disparate-treatment claim. Intent is not subject to classwide proof where, as here, the challenged employment decisions were massively decentralized.

2. Wal-Mart's statutory defenses also preclude commonality and typicality. Such defenses are normally resolved at the second stage of an aggregated employment discrimination proceeding, where the employer has the right to "demonstrate that the individual . . . was denied an employment opportunity for lawful reasons." Int'l Bhd. of Teamsters v. United States, 431 U.S. 324, 362 (1977). The district court, however, found that holding such individualized hearings would be "impractical," "not feasible," and "inconsistent with the fundamental character of the class action proceeding." Pet. App. 245a, 251a. Rather than refusing to certify the class, the court eliminated Wal-Mart's right to prove its defenses—once again elevating procedure over substance and depriving Wal-Mart of due process.

II. Nor is the certification order consistent with Rule 23(b)(2).

A. Rule 23(b)(2)'s text authorizes certification of claims for injunctive or corresponding declaratory relief, and is silent as to monetary relief. Monetary claims must proceed under Rule 23(b)(3), which provides additional protections for defendants, absent class members, and the judicial system.

Rule 23(b)'s mandatory provisions must conform to their historical antecedents. Ortiz v. Fibreboard Corp., 527 U.S. 815, 845 (1999). Intentional discrimination claims asserted on behalf of millions of disparate individuals seeking monetary relief could not be more different from the injunctive and declaratory relief challenges to de jure segregation on which Rule 23(b)(2) was based. And this difference is of constitutional dimension: Rule 23(b)(2) does not require notice to or permit opt-outs by absent class members, which due process requires where individual monetary relief is at stake. Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797, 811–12 (1985).

B. Some circuits have allowed certain monetary claims to proceed under Rule 23(b)(2), unless the relief sought "relates . . . predominantly to money damages." Advisory Committee Notes, 39 F.R.D. 69, 102 (1966). The substantial monetary awards sought by plaintiffs on behalf of millions of individuals here "predominate" over their claims for injunctive relief under the "incidental damages" standard applied in most circuits, and indeed any other standard.

ARGUMENT

The "class-action device . . . [is] an exception to the usual rule that litigation is conducted by and on behalf of the individual named parties only." Califano v. Yamasaki, 442 U.S. 682, 700-01 (1979). Because of the dangers inherent in classwide adjudication, Rule 23 imposes prerequisites to class certification designed to ensure that any ensuing trial and judgment will be consistent with the rights of all parties, including the absent class members. Taylor v. Sturgell, 553 U.S. 880, 900-01 (2008); Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 629 (1997).

This Court adopted Rule 23 pursuant to the Rules Enabling Act, which mandates that procedural rules may not "abridge, enlarge or modify any substantive right." 28 U.S.C. § 2072(b). This Court has emphasized that Rule 23 "must be interpreted with fidelity to the Rules Enabling Act and applied with the interests of absent class members in close view." Amchem, 521 U.S. at 629; see Ortiz v. Fibreboard Corp., 527 U.S. 815, 845 (1999). Moreover, class actions certified under Rule 23 must also comply with the Due Process Clause (Ticor Title Ins. Co. v. Brown, 511 U.S. 117, 121 (1994) (per curiam)), and any uncertainties in the Rule's application should be resolved to avoid constitutional concerns. Ortiz, 527 U.S. at 845.

The district court's certification order, as modified by the Ninth Circuit, is not consistent with Rule 23. The wildly divergent claims asserted by the three named plaintiffs on behalf of millions of women cannot satisfy Rule 23(a)'s requirements of commonality, typicality, or adequacy without modifying the substantive elements of plaintiffs' claims and Wal-Mart's defenses. Moreover, mandatory certification under Rule 23(b)(2) does not encompass plaintiffs' request for billions of dollars in backpay and (potentially) punitive damages.

I. THE CERTIFICATION ORDER IS NOT CONSISTENT WITH RULE 23(a)

A "Title VII class action, like any other class action, may only be certified if the trial court is satisfied, after a rigorous analysis, that the prerequisites of Rule 23(a) have been satisfied." Gen. Tel. Co. of the Sw. v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 161 (1982). These prerequisites include "questions of law or fact common to the class," "claims or defenses of the representative parties [that] are typical of the claims or defenses of the class," and "representative parties [who] fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a); Amchem, 521 U.S. at 613.

Plaintiffs here bring two types of Title VII claims: disparate impact and disparate treatment. A "plaintiff establishes a prima facie disparate-impact claim by showing that the employer uses a particular employment practice that causes a disparate impact on one of the prohibited bases." Lewis v. City of Chicago, 130 S. Ct. 2191, 2197 (2010) (internal quotation marks omitted) (emphasis altered); accord 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2; Watson v. Fort Worth Bank & Trust, 487 U.S. 977, 986 (1988) (a plaintiff's burden includes showing statistical disparities and a specific employment practice). To maintain a disparate-treatment claim, the plaintiff is also "required to prove that the defendant had a discriminatory intent or motive." Ibid. If the plaintiff succeeds on either type of claim, the court may award injunctive relief, backpay, "or any other equitable relief as the court deems appropriate." 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g)(1).

Where the plaintiff proves that she is the victim of intentional discrimination, and thus has made out a disparate-treatment claim, the plaintiff may also be entitled to compensatory damages (including emotional distress). Id. § 1981a(a)(1). Punitive damages may be awarded only in disparate-treatment cases, if the plaintiff proves that the employer acted "with malice or with reckless indifference to the federally protected rights of an aggrieved individual." Id. § 1981a(b)(1).

Title VII codifies certain defenses. If the employer proves that an adverse employment action concerning an individual was "for any reason other than discrimination," the court shall not order the "hiring, reinstatement, or promotion of an individual as an employee, or the payment to him of any back pay." 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g)(2)(A). Even if the employee proves that the adverse employment action was motivated in part by discriminatory intent (see id. § 2000e-2(m)), the court cannot award backpay or damages if the employer proves that it "would have taken the same action in the absence of the impermissible motivating factor." Id. § 2000e-5(g)(2)(B)(ii); Costa v. Desert Palace, Inc., 299 F.3d 838, 848 (9th Cir. 2002) (en banc), aff'd, 539 U.S. 90 (2003).

The propriety of class certification must be reviewed in light of the substantive elements of these claims and defenses, which would have to be litigated and decided in an eventual trial on the merits. Amchem, 521 U.S. at 621, 629. Doing so makes clear that the courts below committed multiple and manifest legal errors in allowing the case to proceed as a class action.[2]

A. The Named Plaintiffs' Interests Are Insufficiently Interrelated With The Absent Class Members' Interests

"The commonality and typicality requirements of Rule 23(a) tend to merge," and "[b]oth serve as guideposts for determining whether under the particular circumstances maintenance of a class action is economical and whether the named plaintiff's claim and the class claims are so interrelated that the interests of the class members will be fairly and adequately protected in their absence." Falcon, 457 U.S. at 157 n.13. In turn, the "adequacy inquiry," which "serves to uncover conflicts of interest" among the class members, "tends to merge" with the commonality and typicality requirements. Amchem, 521 U.S. at 625, 626 n.20 (internal quotation marks omitted). We address each of them in turn.

1. Commonality

A class may not be certified unless "there are questions of law or fact common to the class." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(2). This requirement ensures that the class representatives possess the same interests, and have suffered the same alleged injuries, as the absent class members and are thus qualified to bring claims on behalf of the entire group. E. Tex. Motor Freight Sys. Inc. v. Rodriguez, 431 U.S. 395, 403 (1977).

[2] A certification order is reviewed for abuse of discretion, but a district court abuses its discretion by misapplying the law. Koon v. United States, 518 U.S. 81, 100 (1996). Wal-Mart's arguments in this Court turn on the legal errors committed by the courts below, and therefore this Court's review is de novo. Moreover, the district court's refusal to resolve contested issues means that its "findings" are entitled to no deference. See In re IPO Sec. Litig., 471 F.3d 24, 40-41 (2d Cir. 2006).

The plaintiff in Falcon challenged "subjective" promotion practices (457 U.S. at 151 n.4), and this Court held that a named plaintiff's experience of discrimination does not permit the district court simply to infer that "discriminatory treatment is typical of [the employer's employment] practices." Id. at 158; see Rodriguez, 431 U.S. at 403-04. Indeed, "[i]f one allegation of specific discriminatory treatment were sufficient to support an across-the-board attack, every Title VII case would be a potential companywide class action." Falcon, 457 U.S. at 159.

Rather, in asserting a company-wide class action based on discrimination, the plaintiff must bridge the "wide gap" between (1) plaintiff's own claim of discrimination, and (2) the existence of a class of persons who have suffered the same injury as the plaintiff as a result of a company-wide discriminatory policy. Falcon, 457 U.S. at 157. Plaintiffs here failed to do so.

a. Plaintiffs' Theory Fails To Bridge The Falcon Gap

This Court has held that a plaintiff can potentially bridge the gap between individual and representative claims, and secure authorization to proceed on behalf of absent persons, by adducing "[s]ignificant proof that an employer operated under a general policy of discrimination" that was implemented through "entirely subjective decisionmaking processes" in a manner that affected all class members. Falcon, 457 U.S. at 159 n.15.

1. Plaintiffs here made no pretense of offering "significant proof" that Wal-Mart's "general policy" was discriminatory, as to either pay or promotion. To the contrary, it was undisputed that Wal-Mart operates under a general policy of anti-discrimination. The policies actually adopted and implemented by Wal-Mart forbid discrimination and affirmatively encourage diversity. Pet. App. 195a. "Title VII prohibits employment practices, not an abstract policy of discrimination." Falcon, 457 U.S. at 159 n.15; see also Watson, 487 U.S. at 994 (plurality). Yet plaintiffs could find no such practices. Indeed, the court below acknowledged "the absence of a specific discriminatory policy promulgated by Wal-Mart." Pet. App. 59a (emphasis added). That should have ended the inquiry.

2. Nor did plaintiffs offer proof that Wal-Mart implemented its lawful policies in a discriminatory fashion common to every single female employee.

They do not, and cannot, contend that Wal-Mart maintained an "entirely subjective decisionmaking process[ ]" (Falcon, 457 U.S. at 159 n.15 (emphasis added)), because the record is undisputed that in addition to its express anti-discrimination policy, Wal-Mart set salary ranges for its employees and established standards for its local managers to apply when making both pay and promotion decisions. J.A. 1468a-1469a, 1498a-1511a, 1609a, 1616a; D.C. Dkt. 270-508; Pet. App. 176a-177a.

Plaintiffs' expert explained that "[w]ritten guidelines for promotion are not absent in the Wal-Mart Personnel System," and that "[c]ompany guidelines specify minimum criteria based on discipline, tenure, and performance evaluations." J.A. 550a-551a; see also Pet. App. 203a ("the subjective decision-making in compensation and promotions takes place within parameters and guidelines that are highly uniform").

The district court found only that pay and promotion decisions are "largely subjective" (that is, discretionary), and that the "company maintains centralized corporate policies that provide some constraint on the degree of managerial discretion." Pet. App. 192a (emphasis added).

Plaintiffs have never offered significant proof that this framework was discriminatory. Courts have recognized that similar challenges do not satisfy the commonality requirement because the existence of non-subjective criteria cuts against the inference that there was "a common policy of discrimination that pervaded all of the . . . challenged . . . decisions." Hartman v. Duffey, 19 F.3d 1459, 1472 (D.C. Cir. 1994); see also, e.g., Denney v. City of Albany, 247 F.3d 1172, 1186 (11th Cir. 2001).

Moreover, the mere fact that an employer delegates discretion to local managers to make pay or promotion decisions is not unlawful. Watson, 487 U.S. at 990 ("an employer's policy of leaving promotion decisions to the unchecked discretion of lower level supervisors should itself raise no inference of discriminatory conduct"). This Court has recognized that "employment decisions are quite often subjective and individualized, resting on a wide array of factors that are difficult to articulate and quantify." Engquist v. Or. Dep't of Agric., 553 U.S. 591, 604 (2008); see also Pet. App. 77a ("Wal-Mart is correct that discretionary decision making by itself is insufficient to meet Plaintiffs' burden"); id. at 184a ("some level of subjectivity is inherent in, and in fact a useful part of, personnel decisions").

Millions of discretionary decisions by tens of thousands of individual managers constitute the antithesis of a common policy that affects everyone in the same manner. See, e.g., Cooper v. Southern Co., 390 F.3d 695, 715–16 (11th Cir. 2004); Stastny v. S. Bell Tel. & Tel. Co., 628 F.2d 267, 279 (4th Cir. 1980); Richard A. Epstein, Class Actions: Aggregation, Amplification, and Distortion, 2003 U. Chi. Legal F. 475, 508–09 (delegation of discretion to local managers is more logically viewed as a policy that permits many different practices at the local level).

Accordingly, plaintiffs failed to present "significant proof" that Wal-Mart operated under a "general policy" of discrimination, as Falcon requires. On the contrary, it is undisputed that Wal-Mart's pay and promotion system includes general policies that prohibit discrimination, as well as objective pay ranges and promotion criteria that impose constraints on the exercise of discretion by individual managers. This system will not support a finding of commonality, on a company-wide basis, for purposes of Rule 23(a).

3. In fact, to secure class certification, plaintiffs have advanced a theory of employment discrimination that simply is not actionable under Title VII.

They have hypothesized a "fundamentally new account of discrimination" that seeks to hold Wal-Mart liable for "broader labor market" characteristics. Richard A. Nagareda, Class Certification in the Age of Aggregate Proof, 84 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 97, 156–60 (2009). This novel concept, which commonly is known as "structural discrimination," challenges widely accepted corporate structures as creating a "conduit for gender bias to potentially seep into the system." Pet. App. 192a. This theory would remake Title VII to allow claims challenging and seeking to redesign corporate structures to address societal phenomena for which employers are not responsible (Nagareda, supra, at 153–60), an approach this Court has strongly rejected. See Furnco Constr. Corp. v. Waters, 438 U.S. 567, 578 (1978) ("Courts are generally less competent than employers to restructure business practices, and unless mandated to do so by Congress they should not attempt it"); see also Price Waterhouse v. Hopkins, 490 U.S. 228, 242 (1989) (plurality) (recognizing "Congress' unwillingness to require employers to change the very nature of their operations in response to the statute"). Courts and commentators agree that the "structural discrimination" theory does not "stand[ ] as current law." Nagareda, supra, at 157 & n.234 (citing sources). Plaintiffs' bid for affirmance of the class certification order thus rests on a fundamental—and quite radical—remaking of Title VII law.

b. Plaintiffs' Evidence Fails To Bridge The Falcon Gap

Just as plaintiffs' theory of discrimination does not suffice, the evidence they offered also fails to establish commonality. As shown below, the evidence, at most, indicates that Wal-Mart's pay and promotion system could possibly result in individual disparities—not that it was designed to do so, was intended to do so, or would inevitably do so with respect to every single female employee around the country. Isolated instances of discrimination are not sufficient to satisfy the commonality requirement in Title VII cases. Falcon, 457 U.S. at 158.

Plaintiffs point to three categories of evidence—statistics, sociology, and anecdotes—but never bridge the wide gap between their own individual assertions and the classwide claims. "Like the proverbial shell game, . . . plaintiffs' circular presentation cannot conceal the fact that they have failed to offer any significant proof of a company-wide policy of discrimination, no matter which shell is lifted." Pet. App. 138a (Ikuta, J., dissenting).

1. Statistics. Plaintiffs' statistical expert, Richard Drogin, aggregated the data at the national or regional level to conclude that women were underrepresented in management and paid less than men in comparable positions. J.A. 476a, 493a-516a. Plaintiffs' theory of liability, however, rests on decisions made by individual managers at the store level; as a matter of law, disparities at the regional and national level are not probative of store-level discrimination. This is a failure of proof at the most basic level: Plaintiffs challenge decisions by individual store managers, but failed to adduce any statistical evidence of discrimination (or even disparities) at the store level. This is critically important because courts have uniformly recognized in multi-facility employment cases that discrimination must be shown in each facility or other decisionmaking unit. Morgan v. UPS, 380 F.3d 459, 464 (8th Cir. 2004); see also Garcia v. Johanns, 444 F.3d 625, 632 (D.C. Cir. 2006); Cooper, 390 F.3d at 715.

In response to plaintiffs' hypothesis of discrimination by individual store managers, Wal-Mart's expert Joan Haworth presented a store-by-store statistical analysis, which established that in more than 90% of the stores there were no statistically significant pay disparities between men and women. See J.A. 1468a-1515a; Pet. App. 202a-203a n.25. This showing was not rebutted by plaintiffs, who offered no store-by-store analysis of their own, and confirms the lack of commonality.

The district court rejected Wal-Mart's objections that Drogin's statistics were untethered to plaintiffs' store-level theory of discrimination on the ground that it would "engage the Court in a merits evaluation of the expert opinions." Pet. App. 197a. In so doing, the court mistakenly concluded that Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, 417 U.S. 156 (1974), barred it from making determinations that overlapped with the "merits" at the certification stage, including the appropriate level of aggregation of statistical analyses. Pet. App. 166a, 208a. Even plaintiffs do not defend this approach, recognizing that "the class determination generally involves considerations that are enmeshed in the factual and legal issues comprising the plaintiff's cause of action." Coopers & Lybrand v. Livesay, 437 U.S. 463, 469 (1978) (internal quotation marks omitted); see also Falcon, 457 U.S. at 161.

The Ninth Circuit majority sidestepped this critical issue, erroneously opining that "[t]he disagreement" between Drogin and Haworth regarding the appropriate level of aggregation "is the common question." Pet. App. 71a. But, regardless of the strength of Wal-Mart's statistics, it is plaintiffs' burden to produce "significant proof" of a company-wide discriminatory policy; plaintiffs failed to meet that burden by failing to offer any proof of gender-based disparities at the store level.

In any event, as this Court held in Falcon, "actual, not presumed, conformance with Rule 23(a) remains . . . indispensable." 457 U.S. at 160. Indeed, plaintiffs concede that "district courts are required to conduct a 'rigorous analysis' of compliance with Rule 23, even when it overlaps with the merits." Pet. Opp. 24. And they take no issue with the "consensus among the circuits" (ibid.), holding that courts are not only authorized but obligated to resolve such disputes at the certification stage relating to Rule 23 factors. See, e.g., In re Hydrogen Peroxide Antitrust Litig., 552 F.3d 305, 323–24 (3d Cir. 2008); In re IPO Sec. Litig., 471 F.3d 24, 41 (2d Cir. 2006).

With respect to commonality, the appropriate level of aggregation is not an evidentiary issue, but a legal one. Wards Cove Packing Co. v. Atonio, 490 U.S. 642, 650–55 (1989), superseded on other grounds by statute, Civil Rights Act of 1991, Pub. L. No. 102-166, § 2, 105 Stat. 1071, 1071. The nationally or regionally aggregated statistics presented by plaintiffs do not show, one way or the other, whether their theory of discrimination—which turns on decisions made by individual store managers—can be proved on a classwide basis. Cf. Sprint/United Mgmt. Co. v. Mendelsohn, 552 U.S. 379, 388 (2008).

Plaintiffs never identified a corporate policy or practice to which the aggregated disparities Drogin identified could be attributed. Nothing in his analysis purports to link any alleged disparities in pay or promotion to subjective decisionmaking or any other aspect of Wal-Mart's pay and promotion system. Disparities in the abstract are not actionable under Title VII. Lewis, 130 S. Ct. at 2197. Plaintiffs thus failed to establish that a crucial element of their prima facie case could be proved on a classwide basis. See ibid.; Ledbetter v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 550 U.S. 618, 624 (2007), superseded on other grounds by statute, Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act of 2009, Pub. L. No. 111-2, § 3, 123 Stat. 5, 5–6.

As Justice O'Connor observed in Watson, "[i]t is completely unrealistic to assume that unlawful discrimination is the sole cause of people failing to gravitate to jobs and employers in accord with the laws of chance." 487 U.S. at 992 (plurality). "It would be equally unrealistic to suppose that employers can eliminate, or discover and explain, the myriad of innocent causes that may lead to statistical imbalances in the composition of their work forces." Ibid.; see also Pet. App. 193a (noting that plaintiffs' sociology expert agreed that "there are many reasons why men and women can have different career trajectories, some of which are not generally considered discriminatory, such as differing job-related skill requirements"); id. at 193a n.18.

Plaintiffs' suggestion that liability can be premised on aggregated disparities, if accepted, would require employers to treat people differently despite the absence of any previous departures from legal requirements. That is contrary to Congress's express instruction in Title VII (42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(j)), and this Court therefore already has rejected such an approach to Title VII. Ricci v. DeStefano, 129 S. Ct. 2658, 2674-75 (2009); see also Parents Involved in Cmty. Sch. v. Seattle Sch. Dist. No. 1, 551 U.S. 701, 729-33 (2007) (plurality); Watson, 487 U.S. at 992 (plurality).

2. Sociology. Plaintiffs rely heavily on the notion, propounded by their sociologist William Bielby, that Wal-Mart and other large organizations are "'vulnerable' to gender bias." Pet. App. 195a. Bielby's testimony, however, defeats rather than supports a finding of commonality.

a. Bielby opined that Wal-Mart has a "strong corporate culture." Pet. App. 54a. The district court elaborated, explaining that this is reflected by such things as the way "the Home Office controls the temperature and music in each store throughout the country." Id. at 190a. And "employees at Wal-Mart stores attend a daily meeting held at shift changes, where managers discuss the company culture and employees do the Wal-Mart cheer." Id. at 188a.

189a. Bielby observed that Wal-Mart "employees achieve a common understanding of the company's way of conducting business" (J.A. 535a), but he could not say that this "way" was discriminatory or explain how this "common understanding" actually causes discrimination. Pet. App. 55a; see Price Waterhouse, 490 U.S. at 294 & n.5 (Kennedy, J., dissenting) (explaining that "Title VII creates no independent cause of action for sex stereotyping" and questioning validity of sociologist expert testimony regarding such stereotyping).

As the Ninth Circuit acknowledged, Bielby merely "interpret[ed] and explain[ed] the facts that suggest that Wal-Mart has and promotes a strong corporate culture—a culture that may include gender stereotyping." Pet. App. 54a (emphasis added). Bielby did not opine, however, that Wal-Mart's culture does include stereotyping, and the district court recognized that Bielby did not purport to opine on how often gender stereotyping actually occurred, let alone claim that it was common to all class members. 222 F.R.D. at 192; see also Pet. App. 195a ("Defendant rightly points out that Dr. Bielby cannot definitively state how regularly stereotypes play a meaningful role in employment decisions at Wal-Mart").

The district court found that "Bielby's opinions have a built-in degree of conjecture." Pet. App. 195a. Bielby even "conceded that he could not calculate whether 0.5 percent or 95 percent of the employment decisions at Wal-Mart might be determined by stereotyped thinking." 222 F.R.D. at 192.

As the district court described it, Bielby's testimony suggests only that Wal-Mart's delegation of "a substantial range of discretion" to local managers "provides a wide enough conduit for gender bias to potentially seep into the system." Pet. App. 192a.

(emphasis added). The most that Bielby could do was critique Wal-Mart's equal employment policies and pay and promotion systems as potentially "vulnerable" to discrimination. J.A. 525a. But alleged "'[v]ulnerability' to sex discrimination is not sex discrimination." 509 F.3d at 1194 (Kleinfeld, J., dissenting); see also Price Waterhouse, 490 U.S. at 294 (Kennedy, J., dissenting) (While "[e]vidence of use by decision-makers of sex stereotypes is . . . relevant to the question of discriminatory intent," "[t]he ultimate question . . . is whether discrimination caused the plaintiff's harm"); Nagareda, supra, at 159-60.

Bielby's hypothesis that Wal-Mart may be "vulnerable" to gender stereotypes because it (like other organizations, including government agencies) has a "strong corporate culture" does not identify any discriminatory practices or procedures actionable under Title VII. By Bielby's lights, one would have to examine each individual pay or promotion decision—and there are millions of them—to determine whether it was actually infected with bias. As a result, Bielby's testimony affirmatively does not support, but affirmatively defeats, any finding of commonality in this case.

b. Because Bielby conceded that he could not conclude whether sex-based animus was responsible for all of the employment decisions at Wal-Mart or none of them, it is unclear what the probative value of his testimony, with respect to the Rule 23 prerequisites, could possibly be. As the authors of the seminal article on "social framework" analysis upon which Bielby purported to rely (J.A. 524a n.1) have explained, Bielby's "research into conditions and behavior at Wal-Mart did not meet the standards expected of social scientific research into stereotyping and discrimination." John Monahan et al., Essay, Contex- tual Evidence of Gender Discrimination: The Ascendance of "Social Frameworks," 94 Va. L. Rev. 1715, 1747 (2008). Moreover, "Dr. Bielby's social framework analysis fails because it lacks a reliable, scientific basis for linking general research to the corporate setting." Id. at 1745 n.83. Thus, his testimony "explicitly link[ing] general research findings on gender discrimination to specific factual conclusions about Wal-Mart in particular, exceeded the limitations on expert testimony established by the Federal Rules of Evidence and by . . . 'social framework' evidence." Id. at 1719.

The district court rejected Wal-Mart's motion to strike Bielby's opinion as unreliable and inadmissible. D.C. Dkt. 263 at 1-4; see Gen. Elec. Co. v. Joiner, 522 U.S. 136, 146 (1997) (where "opinion evidence . . . is connected to existing data only by the ipse dixit of the expert," a "court may conclude that there is simply too great an analytical gap between the data and the opinion proffered"). In affirming this ruling, the Ninth Circuit held that Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993), does not have "exactly the same application at the class certification stage as it does to expert testimony . . . at trial." Pet. App. 57a n.22.

But Federal Rule of Evidence 702, which governs the reliability of expert testimony and implements Daubert, ensures that expert testimony is relevant and reliable. Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael, 526 U.S. 137, 152 (1999). It is not limited to trial and is particularly important at the class certification stage, where the district court must "assess all of the relevant evidence admitted . . . and determine whether each Rule 23 requirement has been met, just as the judge would resolve a dispute about any other threshold prerequisite for continuing a lawsuit." IPO, 471 F.3d at 42. Expert evidence introduced to "establish a component of a Rule 23 requirement" therefore must be reliable. Ibid. Bielby's is not.

3. Anecdotes. Plaintiffs also submitted declarations from 63 remaining class members to support their theory that individual store managers wielded their discretion to make pay and promotion decisions in an intentionally discriminatory manner. These anecdotes included just 126 of Wal-Mart's more than 3,400 stores; plaintiffs thus presented no evidence of even a single act of discrimination in the vast majority of stores, including entire States, regions, and districts. Cf. Mooney v. Aramco Servs. Co., 54 F.3d 1207, 1221 (5th Cir. 1995) (holding that ten instances of discrimination were insufficient to support a class of just 154 employees, because "[t]estimony of anecdotal witnesses with different supervisors, working in different parts of the company was simply too attenuated").

In Teamsters, the government proved 40 specific instances of discrimination out of a class of about 400 employees—a ratio of 1:10. Int'l Bhd. of Teamsters v. United States 431 U.S. 324, 338-39 (1977). Even if all of the declarations submitted by class members in this case recited actionable claims of discrimination (which they do not), plaintiffs fell far short of that kind of showing.

Plaintiffs' relative handful of declarations is, at most, evidence of nothing more than "isolated or sporadic" instances of (alleged) misconduct. Cooper v. Fed. Reserve Bank of Richmond, 467 U.S. 867, 876 (1984). Here, the "affiants claim discrimination in different forms, at the hands of different people, in different stores, in different parts of the country, at different times, and under a constellation of facts unique to each individual," thereby undermining any claim of a common, company-wide policy. Pet. App. 127a (Ikuta, J., dissenting). Indeed, as explained in the next section, the declarations of both the named plaintiffs and the other class members demonstrate the varied and individualized nature of their claims.

Wal-Mart also submitted declarations from female employees that further refute the notion of any company-wide policy of discrimination. One such employee testified, "[w]hen I expressed interest in being promoted, various Store Managers and District Managers mentored me and assisted me in achieving my goals." J.A. 1609a. Another explained, "[i]n my career at Wal-Mart, I have never felt that I was denied an opportunity because I am a woman." Id. at 1635a. And there are many more. See id. at 1598a-1599a, 1615a-1616a, 1619a-1620a, 1625a-1628a, 1638a-1644a, 1650a, 1653a-1654a.

Far from establishing commonality, the declarations submitted by putative class members refute it.

2. Typicality

The named plaintiffs' claims and defenses are not "typical of the claims or defenses of the class." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(3). The typicality requirement "limit[s] the class claims to those fairly encompassed by the named plaintiff's claims." Gen. Tel. Co. of the Nw. v. EEOC, 446 U.S. 318, 330 (1980). But the widely divergent claims of each named plaintiff "are not even typical with respect to each other, let alone with respect to the class." 509 F.3d at 1195 (Kleinfeld, J., dissenting).

For example, Ms. Dukes has alleged both race and sex discrimination. J.A. 76a-77a; C.A. App. 29-32. Her claim turns almost entirely on her allegations of retaliation for invoking the company's internal grievance procedures. J.A. 745a–746a. An element of such a claim is the employer's knowledge of an underlying discrimination charge or other protected activity (42 U.S.C. § 2000e-3(a)), which is incapable of classwide proof. Indeed, the district court correctly excluded retaliation claims from this case. Pet. App. 166a–167a n.4. Ms. Dukes's experience is decidedly not "typical."

Similarly, if Ms. Kwapnoski could prove that her store manager was unequally abusive, and that his "yell[ing]" violated Title VII (J.A. 1000a–1001a), such proof would not establish that any other woman in any other store was the victim of intentional discrimination. The same is true with respect to Ms. Arana's contention that her store manager discouraged her from applying for management training. Id. at 614a–616a.

This stark atypicality is apparent from the other declarations submitted by plaintiffs. Many of them do not even arguably allege employment discrimination. See, e.g., J.A. 676a–678a, 729a–734a, 822a–826a, 1059a–1063a, 1081a–1087a; see also 509 F.3d at 1195–96 (Kleinfeld, J., dissenting). Indeed, it is simply inconceivable that every single female employee suffered intentional discrimination, which is what plaintiffs' theory posits. While some of the class members still work for Wal-Mart, many more do not. See, e.g., J.A. 620a–623a, 727a, 859a. Some claim retaliation, while others merely claim unequal treatment. See, e.g., id. at 676a–678a, 707a–715a, 822a–826a. "Some thrived while others did poorly." Pet. App. 161a (Kozinski, C.J., dissenting); see also J.A. 640a–644a, 947a–951a, 1030a–1034a, 1131a–1135a, 1315a–1321a.

Even if the named plaintiffs could prove their individual allegations of discrimination, such proof would not establish liability for any absent class member. "[A] class plaintiff's attempt to prove the existence of a companywide policy, or even a consistent practice within a given department, may fail even though discrimination against one or two individuals has been proved." Cooper, 467 U.S. at 879.

In addition, Wal-Mart's defenses to plaintiffs' claims are not identical as to all female employees. Ms. Dukes, for example, would be subject to unique defenses based on her long and uncontroverted history of disciplinary violations. Wal-Mart cannot be held liable for employment actions taken "for any reason other than discrimination," and in all events cannot be liable for backpay if it would have taken the same action regardless of motivation. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g)(2). Yet Ms. Dukes's repeated disciplinary issues are hardly "typical" of other employees. And proving (or failing to prove) an employee-specific defense may not make it any more or less likely that the next employee is subject to the same defense. See Cooper, 390 F.3d at 719.

3. Adequacy

Plaintiffs have also failed to demonstrate that the named plaintiffs "will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(4). "The adequacy inquiry under Rule 23(a)(4) serves to uncover conflicts of interest between named parties and the class they seek to represent" and "tends to merge" with the commonality and typicality requirements. Amchem, 521 U.S. at 625, 626 n.20 (internal quotation marks omitted); see Gen. Tel. Co. of the Nw., 446 U.S. at 331 ("the adequate-representation requirement is typically construed to foreclose the class action where there is a conflict of interest between the named plaintiff and the members of the putative class"). The class here is rife with such conflicts.

For example, the named plaintiffs waived any claim for compensatory damages, forfeiting the rights of individual class members to recover damages authorized by Congress solely in order to facilitate class treatment. It therefore is not true that, as plaintiffs have suggested, "[t]he members of the class are united in seeking the maximum possible recovery." Amchem, 521 U.S. at 610 (internal quotation marks omitted).

Moreover, the class includes both the alleged victims of discrimination (hourly employees) and the alleged perpetrators of that same discrimination (salaried managers). Plaintiffs accuse other class members of intentionally discriminating against them. Female manager class members will be called to testify against other class members regarding their decisions as managers, and thus will be cross-examined by class counsel. A clearer conflict is difficult to imagine, since the interests of each group in establishing liability (and maximizing recovery) are diametrically opposed. Cf. Gen. Tel. Co. of the Nw., 446 U.S. at 331; Hansberry v. Lee, 311 U.S. 32, 44–46 (1940).

And the list goes on. The class here includes both former and present employees. Those who still work at Wal-Mart may have an interest in an injunction, but injunctive or corresponding declaratory relief cannot benefit those women who no longer work at the company and who therefore are interested only in individual monetary relief. 509 F.3d at 1196 (Kleinfeld, J., dissenting); see also infra Part II.B.1. Some class members (including the named plaintiffs) have poor performance records and are subject to unique defenses to liability. See 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g)(2)(B)(ii). These individuals may have an interest in settlement, in part to avoid public recitation of their faults, while those who have strong performance records could have an interest in taking the case to trial. See 509 F.3d at 1196 (Kleinfeld, J., dissenting).

Another intractable conflict arises from the undisputed fact that "nonvictims might also benefit from the relief." Pet. App. 110a n.57 (internal quotation marks omitted). The district court acknowledged that allowing the class claims to proceed would "generat[e] a windfall for some employees . . . and undercompensat[e]" others. Id. at 254a (internal quotation marks omitted). But Title VII relief is limited to the "actual victims" of illegal discrimination. Firefighters Local Union No. 1784 v. Stotts, 467 U.S. 561, 579 (1984). Allowing nonvictims to share in any recovery creates an impermissible conflict with those who may have valid claims. Far from constituting "rough justice" (Pet. App. 254a), the decisions below would work an injustice. See Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797, 812 (1985) (the "Due Process Clause . . . requires that the named plaintiff at all times adequately represent the interests of the absent class members").

Where subsets of plaintiffs have different interests in the litigation, "the interests of those within the single class are not aligned." Amchem, 521 U.S. at 626 (adequacy not satisfied when conflicts exist regarding nature and timing of relief); see also Rodriguez, 431 U.S. at 405. Inadequate representation violates the Due Process Clause as well as Rule 23. Hansberry, 311 U.S. at 44–45. This Court therefore has warned district courts to exercise "caution when individual stakes are high and disparities among class members great." Amchem, 521 U.S. at 625. Here, the stakes could not be higher, yet the "certification in this case does not follow the counsel of caution." Ibid.

In short, if plaintiffs were adequate representatives, they would not be forced to forfeit the rights of absent class members to persuade the courts to allow them to represent the class, and their desire to be class representatives would not conflict with their duty to act in the best interests of the absent class members. See Amchem, 521 U.S. at 618; Broussard v. Meineke Disc. Muffler Shops, Inc., 155 F.3d 331, 337–39 (4th Cir. 1998). These conflicts are heightened because certification under Rule 23(b)(2) does not permit absent class members to opt out of the litigation. Absent class members are powerless to extricate themselves from the class even though their interests squarely conflict with those of the named plaintiffs purporting to represent them.

Plaintiffs sought to lump together in one lawsuit every female Wal-Mart employee without regard to the staggering number of differences—in jobs, performance, experience, advancement, location, and a host of other factors—that exist within that divergent group of individuals. See Pet. App. 161a (Kozinski, C.J., dissenting). This Court has condemned the practice of certifying "across-the-board" employment class actions. Falcon, 457 U.S. at 157. The decision below cannot be reconciled with that directive or with the Court's admonition against "judicial inventiveness" in class-action procedure. Amchem, 521 U.S. at 620.

As this case well illustrates, "the rulemakers' prescriptions for class actions may be endangered by those who embrace Rule 23 too enthusiastically just as they are by those who approach the Rule with distaste." Amchem, 521 U.S. at 629 (internal quotation marks and alterations omitted).[3]

B. Procedural Defects Cannot Be Remedied By Altering The Substantive Law

A court cannot certify a class without finding that the class claims and defenses, as certified, can be tried to judgment in a manner that protects the rights of all parties and the judicial system. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(2); see Amchem, 521 U.S. at 621, 629. The Rule 23(a) factors are designed to ensure that only those cases that are sufficiently cohesive to permit such a trial will be certified. Id. at 623 (it is "class cohesion that legitimatizes representative action in the first place"). A case that does not meet one or more of the Rule 23(a) prerequisites, in contrast, likely could not be tried consistently with due process and therefore may not be certified as a class action. Cf. Taylor, 553 U.S. at 901.

But because this case, properly analyzed, does not meet the prerequisites imposed by Rule 23(a), a trial on the merits would be completely unmanageable and unfair. The courts below recognized as much; but rather than denying certification, they elected to relieve plaintiffs of the burden of proving elements of their case and to preclude Wal-Mart from proving elements of its defenses. This Court has repeatedly instructed the lower courts that the Rules Enabling Act prohibits elevating procedural rules over substantive rights in the class-action context. Ortiz, 527 U.S. at 845 ("no reading of [Rule 23] can ignore the Act's mandate"); Amchem, 521 U.S. at 612-13. The decisions below, however, omit any substantive discussion of this crucial statute.

[3] This is not to suggest that Title VII cases cannot proceed as class actions. Rather, where (as here) an employment discrimination claim is premised on discretionary decisionmaking, the class at minimum must bear some relation to the decisionmaking unit (store, department, etc.). See Morgan, 380 F.3d at 464; 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(f)(3).

1. Plaintiffs' Burden

Plaintiffs' disparate-impact claim requires them to prove "a particular employment practice that causes a disparate impact" on a prohibited basis. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(k)(1)(A)(i); Lewis, 130 S. Ct. at 2197. Their disparate-treatment claim "comprises two elements: [a] an employment practice, and [b] discriminatory intent." Ledbetter, 550 U.S. at 631. Plaintiffs have failed to demonstrate how they could establish either, much less both, on a classwide basis.

a. No Unlawful Employment Practice. As previously discussed, the Ninth Circuit acknowledged "the absence of a specific discriminatory practice promulgated by Wal-Mart." Pet. App. 59a (emphases added). In the absence of such a practice, plaintiffs are forced to argue that individual store managers unilaterally exercised discretion in a common manner that disadvantaged female employees.

Because store-by-store proof would indisputably destroy commonality, the district court simply relieved plaintiffs of the burden of proving their own theory: "Because the focal point will be the practice of utilizing excess subjectivity, rather than the facts concerning each individual decision, the . . . subjective nature of [Wal-Mart's] personnel practices does not defeat commonality in this case." Pet. App. 187a (emphasis added). By relieving plaintiffs of proving a statutory element of their case, the district court committed clear legal error. Hohider v. UPS, 574 F.3d 169, 184 (3d Cir. 2009); McLaughlin v. Am. Tobacco Co., 522 F.3d 215, 223-25 (2d Cir. 2008).

If this case were to proceed to trial, and judgment, without requiring plaintiffs to prove that individual employment decisions were unlawful, then Wal-Mart could be held liable for backpay under Title VII to persons who did not suffer any actionable discrimination. The class device cannot be used to subvert the substantive law in this manner. See Philip Morris USA Inc. v. Scott, 131 S. Ct. 1, 3-4 (2010) (Scalia, Circuit Justice).

b. No Discriminatory Animus. Moreover, the Ninth Circuit and the district court failed even to address the intent element, let alone grapple with the fact that determining whether "excess subjectivity" was exercised in an intentionally discriminatory fashion requires individualized proof. See, e.g., Garcia, 444 F.3d at 632.

Where, as here, a multi-facility discrimination class action requires proof of intentional decisionmaking by managers in separate facilities, it cannot be certified. See Cooper, 390 F.3d at 715. Indeed, under Title VII, plaintiffs would have to prove that the motive for every single discretionary pay and promotion decision affecting every single class member was discriminatory. See 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g)(2). But just as it "does not follow . . . that the particular supervisors to whom this discretion is delegated always act without discriminatory intent" (Watson, 487 U.S. at 990), it also does not follow that each of them acted with discriminatory intent regarding millions of distinct pay and promotion decisions made within the context of Wal-Mart's express anti-discrimination policies.

The intent element cannot be eliminated simply to achieve class certification. If holding plaintiffs to their burden of proving each element of their claim would foreclose one or more of the Rule 23(a) prerequisites, then the consequence is that the class may not be certified, not that the substantive element of the liability claim can be ignored. See Hohider, 574 F.3d at 184; see also Shady Grove Orthopedic Assocs., P.A. v. Allstate Ins. Co., 130 S. Ct. 1431, 1443 (2010) (plurality) (a "class action . . . leaves the parties' legal rights and duties intact").

2. Wal-Mart's Defenses

Wal-Mart has a right to present statutory defenses that would by their very nature destroy commonality and typicality (and, for that matter, adequacy). The lower courts, recognizing that allowing Wal-Mart to present the defenses ordinarily available to employers in Title VII cases would undo the cohesiveness necessary for aggregated adjudication of plaintiffs' claims, elected to deny Wal-Mart the right to defend itself. This too was error.

Aggregated disparate-treatment claims normally proceed in two stages. Cooper, 467 U.S. at 876 n.9; Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 336, 361-62. First, the plaintiffs must prove that "discrimination was the company's standard operating procedure." Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 336. If they carry this burden, a rebuttable presumption arises that each class member is entitled to appropriate relief. Id. at 361. At the second stage, "a district court must usually conduct additional proceedings . . . to determine the scope of individual relief" and afford the employer the opportunity "to demonstrate that the individual . . . was denied an employment opportunity for lawful reasons." Id. at 361-62; see also 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g)(2)(A).

Like the right to a jury trial, the second stage of a Teamsters-bifurcated proceeding may be dispensed with only on the consent of both parties. Moreover, at that second stage, the court's task will "not be a simple one" because it has to "make a substantial number of individual determinations" to determine which class members "were actual victims." Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 371; see also Price Waterhouse, 490 U.S. at 266 (O'Connor, J., concurring in judgment). It would be totally infeasible to make such determinations in this case, as plaintiffs "implicitly concede[d]" below. Pet. App. 251a.

While the district court acknowledged that holding such individual hearings "is impractical on its face," and "not feasible here" (Pet. App. 251a), it certified the class anyway. The court's solution was simply to extinguish Wal-Mart's right to individualized hearings altogether on the theory that such hearings are "inconsistent with the fundamental character of the class action proceeding." Id. at 245a. By elevating procedure over substance, yet again, the district court transgressed the most critical dictate of the Rules Enabling Act—that the desire to certify a class action must not override substantive rights.

Under Title VII, Wal-Mart is entitled to prove that an individual employment action was taken for non-discriminatory reasons, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g)(2)(A), or that it "would have taken the same action in the absence of the impermissible motivating factor." Id. § 2000e-5(g)(2)(B). Thus, even if plaintiffs could prove actionable discrimination, Wal-Mart would be entitled to rebut the claims of each individual class member. See Reeb v. Ohio Dep't of Rehab.

& Corr., 435 F.3d 639, 651 (6th Cir. 2006). Moreover, only injured individuals are entitled to recover backpay under Title VII. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g)(2); Price Waterhouse, 490 U.S. at 245 n.10 (plurality) ("Title VII does not authorize affirmative relief for individuals as to whom, the employer shows, the existence of systemic discrimination had no effect").

The Ninth Circuit expressly recognized that, as to some class members, "unequal pay or non-promotion was due to something other than gender discrimination," but nonetheless endorsed procedures that would let them recover anyway while barring Wal-Mart from presenting its otherwise available defenses to those claims. Pet. App. 110a n.56. The district court was equally explicit: "[Wal-Mart] is not . . . entitled to circumvent or defeat the class nature of the proceeding by litigating whether every individual store discriminated against individual class members." Id. at 247a. There could not be a clearer violation of the Rules Enabling Act.

The Ninth Circuit's decision also violates Wal-Mart's "right to litigate the issues raised . . . guaranteed . . . by the Due Process Clause" (United States v. Armour & Co., 402 U.S. 673, 682 (1971)), which includes the right "to present every available defense." Lindsey v. Normet, 405 U.S. 56, 66 (1972) (internal quotation marks omitted). Corporations, even large ones, do not forfeit their constitutional rights when they are sued. See BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 585 (1996).

In short, in the face of this Court's admonitions that the Rules Enabling Act counsels against "adventurous application" of Rule 23 (Ortiz, 527 U.S. at 845), the courts below refashioned Title VII in service of the procedural class-action device. Had they adhered to the requirements of both governing substantive law and Rule 23(a), they would have reached the inescapable conclusion that this class cannot be certified.

II. THE CERTIFICATION ORDER IS NOT CONSISTENT WITH RULE 23(b)(2)

Rule 23(b)(2) authorizes certification only where "final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief is appropriate respecting the class as a whole." In addition to injunctive and declaratory relief, plaintiffs seek backpay and punitive damages — monetary relief that, in the aggregate, would amount to billions of dollars. Rule 23(b)(2), however, does not authorize certification of any monetary claims, and certainly not individual monetary claims that predominate over the injunctive and declaratory claims, as the monetary claims here clearly do.

In the 1966 amendments to Rule 23, an older set of class-action categories — "true," "hybrid," and "spurious" — was replaced, and the modern class action was born. Amchem, 521 U.S. at 613. Subdivision (b)(1) captures a defined subset of cases — such as those involving riparian landowners, security holders, or claimants to a limited fund — that inherently required classwide resolution. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(1); Ortiz, 527 U.S. at 833; Advisory Committee Notes, 39 F.R.D. 69, 100-01 (1966). Subdivision (b)(2) is premised on "the absence of a claim for monetary relief and the nature of the claim asserted." Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393, 398 n.4 (1975); accord Amchem, 521 U.S. at 614. And subdivision (b)(3) added a more flexible category of action to address "situations in which class action treatment is not as clearly called for as it is in Rule 23(b)(1) and (b)(2)," yet is nevertheless "convenient and desirable." Id. at 615 (internal quotation marks omitted).

Subdivision (b)(3) was an "'adventuresome' innovation" (Amchem, 521 U.S. at 614) designed to accommodate the "Rule's growing edge." Ortiz, 527 U.S. at 862. To prevent abuse, this subdivision was supplemented by "further protective devices" and procedural requirements not applicable to the other categories of class actions. Statement on Behalf of the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules 9 (June 10, 1965), available at http://www.uscourts.gov/uscourts/RulesAndPolicies/rules/Reports/CV06-1965.pdf. Specifically, safeguards in the form of mandatory notice and opt-out procedures were designed for subdivision (b)(3) alone. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(2). And (b)(3) certification was deemed appropriate only where "questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members" and "a class action is superior to other available methods" of adjudication. Plaintiffs here cannot meet this "predominance" requirement, which is a "vital prescription" governing monetary claims that is "far more demanding" than Rule 23(a)'s commonality requirement. Amchem, 521 U.S. at 622-24.

In contrast, Rule 23(b)(2) does not require notice to absent class members, nor does it permit class members to opt out of the lawsuit. For that reason, courts considering certification under Rule 23(b)(2), like those contemplating certification under Rule 23(b)(1) (the other "mandatory" provision), must take the "prudent course" of staying "close to the historical model" and the Advisory Committee's "traditional paradigm." Ortiz, 527 U.S. at 842, 864; see also Amchem, 521 U.S. at 614, 625; Califano, 442 U.S. at 700-01.

Here, the Ninth Circuit sanctioned a mandatory class of potentially millions of women asserting highly individualized claims for billions of dollars in backpay (and possibly punitive damages). That class finds no support in Rule 23(b)(2)'s plain language or in the provision's historical antecedents.

A. Rule 23(b)(2) Does Not Encompass Claims For Monetary Relief

Rule 23(b)(2) does not on its face authorize certification of any class claims seeking monetary relief. Sosna, 419 U.S. at 397 n.4. This Court has long recognized that the starting point for determining a Federal Rule's meaning and scope is its text. Schmuck v. United States, 489 U.S. 705, 716 (1989) (interpretation "is grounded in the language and history of the Rule"); cf. Krupski v. Costa Crociere S.p.A., 130 S. Ct. 2485, 2493 (2010); Libretti v. United States, 516 U.S. 29, 38 (1995).

Rule 23(b)(2)'s text—noticeably absent from the Ninth Circuit's analysis—is plain: Certification is appropriate if the requirements of Rule 23(a) and Rule 23(c) are met, and when "the party opposing the class has acted . . . on grounds that apply generally to the class, so that final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief is appropriate respecting the class as a whole." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2) (emphasis added). The Rule is silent as to monetary relief, or indeed any kind of equitable relief other than injunctive or corresponding declaratory relief. See Leatherman v. Tarrant Cnty. Narcotics Intelligence & Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 168 (1993) (expressio unius est exclusio alterius).

This Court therefore has noted the substantial probability that monetary claims cannot be certified under Rule 23(b)(2). Ticor, 511 U.S. at 121. Due process requires an opportunity for absent class members to opt out of claims for monetary relief. Shutts, 472 U.S. at 811–12; see also S. Cent. Bell Tel. Co. v. Alabama, 526 U.S. 160, 167–68 (1999); Richards v. Jefferson Cnty., 517 U.S. 793, 799–802 (1996). Rule 23(b)(2)'s prohibition of opt-outs therefore admits of only two conclusions: Either this subdivision is unconstitutional, or it does not apply to monetary claims. The doctrine of constitutional avoidance requires choosing the second option, and limiting Rule 23(b)(2) to the injunctive or corresponding declaratory relief it expressly encompasses. Ortiz, 527 U.S. at 845.

Although some courts, including the district court here (Pet. App. 243a), have purported to confer opt-out rights on (b)(2) class members, Rule 23 does not authorize this procedure, and this Court has repeatedly warned the lower courts against re-writing the Rule. Amchem, 521 U.S. at 620; see also Leatherman, 507 U.S. at 168; Harris v. Nelson, 394 U.S. 286, 298 (1969). Such unauthorized judicial modifications "undo the careful interplay between Rules 23(b)(2) and (b)(3)" by permitting plaintiffs to pursue substantial monetary claims without "requiring [them] to meet the rigorous Rule 23(b)(3) requirements" of predominance and superiority. McManus v. Fleetwood Enters., Inc., 320 F.3d 545, 554 (5th Cir. 2003); see also Bolin v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 231 F.3d 970, 976 (5th Cir. 2000); Jefferson v. Ingersoll Int'l Inc., 195 F.3d 894, 897–99 (7th Cir. 1999). If a court must amend the Rule to satisfy due process, then the Rule simply does not apply. Ortiz, 527 U.S. at 848.

The natural reading of Rule 23(b)(2)'s text and structure is also consistent with the historical model for Rule 23(b)(2). Ortiz held that pre-1966 cases on which the Advisory Committee drew when amending Rule 23 provided both sufficient and presumptively necessary preconditions to certification. 527 U.S. at 842; Pet. App. 148a (Ikuta, J., dissenting). Only those limited categories of cases could proceed as mandatory class actions without the additional requirements and procedural safeguards required under Rule 23(b)(3).

Rule 23(b)(2) was written to encompass "actions in the civil-rights field where a party is charged with discriminating unlawfully against a class, usually one whose members are incapable of specific enumeration." Advisory Committee Notes, 39 F.R.D. at 102; see also Amchem, 521 U.S. at 614. That does not mean, of course, that all "civil rights" cases, including any variety of discrimination claims under Title VII, are covered by (b)(2), as plaintiffs have suggested. Pet. Opp. 15. That position would entirely ignore the "illustrative" civil rights actions that the Advisory Committee took care to include. Advisory Committee Notes, 39 F.R.D. at 102.

Every single one of the cases on which the mandatory Rule 23(b)(2) was based involved a challenge to racial segregation. See Pet. App. 149a n.22 (Ikuta, J., dissenting) (citing cases); see also, e.g., Bailey v. Patterson, 369 U.S. 31, 32 (1962) (per curiam); Evers v. Dwyer, 358 U.S. 202, 202 (1958) (per curiam). Litigated before the Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1991, these cases sought neither backpay, nor compensatory or punitive damages; they were not tried before juries; and no individual relief was sought. Bailey, 369 U.S. at 32; Evers, 358 U.S. at 203.

None of the historical antecedents allowed class resolution of monetary claims or addressed individual injury. See, e.g., Potts v. Flax, 313 F.2d 284, 289-90 (5th Cir. 1963) (noting in school desegregation case "considerable doubt" that relief could be confined to certain children). Instead, the drafters permitted only adjudication of injunctive and declaratory claims—a distinction between remedies well-known at the time of both the 1938 and 1966 versions of Rule 23.

All of the historical antecedents involved conduct (a facially discriminatory policy) that affected every class member alike and a naturally cohesive request for injunctive relief to the exclusion of individualized monetary relief. Such challenges to open segregation are a far cry from the novel claims alleged here, which are essentially tort claims for unliquidated damages (see Price Waterhouse, 490 U.S. at 264 (O'Connor, J., concurring in judgment)), based on individualized pay and promotion decisions, made through the exercise of discretion within a system of identified criteria governed by express anti-discrimination and diversity policies meant to foster equal treatment. To say the least, these claims are at the "growing edge" of class-action law contemplated by Rule 23(b)(3), not the well-known desegregation cases captured in Rule 23(b)(2)'s historical antecedents. Ortiz, 527 U.S. at 862; cf. Castano v. Am. Tobacco Co., 84 F.3d 734, 746-47 (5th Cir. 1996).

Fidelity to the text, structure, and historical antecedents does not prevent class-based litigation of employment cases. Rather, it simply instructs that the appropriate class certification analysis for claims for monetary relief, or for novel theories of decentralized, intentional discrimination not contemplated by the antecedents, is that described in Rule 23(b)(3). See, e.g., Reeb, 435 F.3d at 651. That category, with its due process protections for absent class members and defendants (including finality and security from later collateral attack), is the appropriate vehicle for such cases. See Falcon, 457 U.S. at 161 (critiquing the "tacit assumption" that "all will be well for surely the plaintiff will win and manna will fall on all members of the class") (internal quotation marks omitted).

B. Plaintiffs' Monetary Claims "Predominate"

Several circuits have ruled that some monetary claims may proceed under Rule 23(b)(2). These decisions rest entirely on an inference drawn from the Advisory Committee's statement that a class cannot be certified under Rule 23(b)(2) where the relief sought "relates . . . predominantly to money damages." Advisory Committee Notes, 39 F.R.D. at 102; see also Krupski, 130 S. Ct. at 2498–99 (Scalia, J., concurring) (explaining that Advisory Committee Notes cannot supersede the plain text of a Rule).

The circuits have developed three approaches for determining when monetary claims "predominate": the "incidental damages" approach articulated by the Fifth Circuit and adopted by most others, the "ad hoc" approach applied only in the Second Circuit, and the "superior-in-strength" approach announced for the first time in the decision below. Pet. 10–12. Under any of these three approaches, the billions of dollars of monetary relief sought here predominate and may not, therefore, be certified under Rule 23(b)(2).

If the Court elects to depart from Rule 23(b)(2)'s text, structure, and history, and allow some claims for monetary relief to be certified under that subdivision, it should adopt a variant of the "incidental damages" standard. That approach, followed by the majority of the circuits, provides that Rule 23(b)(2) certification is prohibited where plaintiffs seek monetary relief unless the relief sought will "flow directly from liability to the class as a whole on the claims forming the basis of the injunctive or declaratory relief." Allison v. Citgo Petroleum Corp., 151 F.3d 402, 415 (5th Cir. 1998); see also Reeb, 435 F.3d at 649–50; Thorn v. Jefferson-Pilot Life Ins. Co., 445 F.3d 311, 330 n.25 (4th Cir. 2006); Cooper, 390 F.3d at 720; Lemon v. Int'l Union of Operating Eng'rs, 216 F.3d 577, 580–81 (7th Cir. 2000).

Unlike the alternatives articulated by the Second and Ninth Circuits, the incidental damages standard comes closest to capturing the two key elements of an appropriate Rule 23(b)(2) class. First, the relief provided extends, as the Rule itself requires, to the class "as a whole." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2). Second, when properly applied, the standard permits only those forms of monetary relief that occur automatically or naturally flow from the injunctive relief, without the necessity of further individualized hearings. The prototypical examples are attorneys' fees and costs. See, e.g., 42 U.S.C. § 1988. Such relief does not necessarily undermine Rule 23(b)(2) cohesion because it benefits the class as a whole and does not require individualized entitlement determinations—and it furthers civil rights enforcement consistent with Rule 23(b)(2)'s historical antecedents.

1. The Majority Of The Class Has Standing To Seek Only Monetary Relief

Rule 23(b)(2) authorizes certification where "final injunctive or corresponding declaratory relief is appropriate respecting the class as a whole." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2) (emphasis added). That is not the case here.

A majority of the members of this purported class are former employees who lack standing to secure injunctive or declaratory relief. City of Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95, 103 (1983); Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Haworth, 300 U.S. 227, 241 (1937). More than half of the declarations submitted by plaintiffs are from former employees, and plaintiffs themselves have pointed to a 55.6% annual turnover rate in the retail industry. C.A. Dkt. 150 at 4 n.1 (No. 04-16688).

The Ninth Circuit purported to "solve" this problem by limiting the class to those persons who were employed on or after the date the complaint was filed. Pet. App. 100a–102a. But that arbitrary line-drawing ignores fundamental principles of constitutional law. A plaintiff who left the company the day after the complaint was filed no more has standing to obtain injunctive or declaratory relief than a person who quit the day before; each plaintiff must have standing to secure the requested relief throughout the lawsuit. See, e.g., Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 561 (1992); Deakins v. Monaghan, 484 U.S. 193, 199–200 (1988); see also Ortiz, 527 U.S. at 831 (Rule 23 "must be interpreted in keeping with Article III constraints") (internal quotation marks omitted); O'Shea v. Littleton, 414 U.S. 488, 494 (1974).

Because more class members are seeking only individual monetary relief than may seek the relief authorized by Rule 23(b)(2), the injunctive and declaratory relief requests cannot possibly predominate over the monetary relief requests under any standard. Cooper, 390 F.3d at 721.

2. Plaintiffs' Backpay Claims "Predominate"

The fact that plaintiffs are seeking monetary relief in the form of backpay, as opposed to compensatory damages, does not alter the conclusion that the request for monetary relief predominates.

While some lower courts have certified Rule 23(b)(2) classes seeking backpay on the basis that such claims are "equitable," none of those courts has attempted to reconcile a backpay request with the fact that Rule 23(b)(2) is expressly limited to declaratory and injunctive relief. See, e.g., Domingo v. New England Fish Co., 727 F.2d 1429, 1445 (9th Cir. 1984) (per curiam) (citing cases); Pettway v. Am. Cast Iron Pipe Co., 494 F.2d 211, 259-60 (5th Cir. 1974). If the "Rule's drafters had intended the Rule to extend to all forms of equitable relief"—rather than just to injunctive or corresponding declaratory relief—"the text of the Rule would say so." Thorn, 445 F.3d at 331. Instead, Rule 23(b)(2)'s text says "nothing whatsoever about equitable relief." Ibid.

While backpay is a form of monetary relief that is sometimes characterized as equitable, it is ultimately nothing more than monetary compensation for past harm. "Congress treated backpay as equitable in Title VII only in the narrow sense that [Title VII] allowed backpay to be awarded together with equitable relief." Great-West Life & Annuity Ins. Co. v. Knudson, 534 U.S. 204, 218 n.4 (2002) (internal quotation marks, alteration, and citation omitted).

Moreover, the features that make backpay "an integral part of an equitable remedy, a form of restitution" (Curtis v. Loether, 415 U.S. 189, 197 (1974)), are those that render it particularly ill-suited to Rule 23(b)(2) certification. That is because even after a determination of liability, backpay awards are discretionary, not automatic, and therefore require an individual analysis with respect to each plaintiff to determine whether the court should exercise its discretion. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g)(2); see also Ford Motor Co. v. EEOC, 458 U.S. 219, 226 (1982) (confirming that "backpay is not an automatic or mandatory remedy") (internal quotation marks omitted); Albemarle Paper Co. v. Moody, 422 U.S. 405, 424 (1975) (Title VII backpay awards are discretionary in reaching "a just result in light of the circumstances peculiar to the case") (internal quotation marks omitted); cf. eBay Inc. v. MercExchange, L.L.C., 547 U.S. 388, 391–93 (2006) ("injunctive relief is an act of equitable discretion" that does not follow "automatically" from liability determination).

And as this Court has repeatedly made clear, Title VII bars "affirmative relief" where the employer shows that an individual suffered no injury. Compare Price Waterhouse, 490 U.S. at 245 n.10 (plurality), and Stotts, 467 U.S. at 579, with Pettway, 494 F.3d at 257 (assuming relief need not relate to who was injured or the extent of the injury).

Although in most cases, including this one, the highly individualized nature of a backpay claim should preclude (b)(2) certification because the claim is not based on grounds generally applicable to the class, some courts have suggested that such certification might be appropriate where injunctive and declaratory relief predominate despite the presence of a request for backpay. See Hohider, 574 F.3d at 202 ("it [is] necessary . . . to determine whether plaintiffs' back-pay request actually conforms with the requirements of Rule 23, including Rule 23(b)(2)'s monetary-predominance standard"); Thorn, 445 F.3d at 331; Heffner v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Ala., Inc., 443 F.3d 1330, 1340 (11th Cir. 2006); Eubanks v. Billington, 110 F.3d 87, 95 (D.C. Cir. 1997).

But those courts would not permit certification in this case. The backpay sought here is not a "uniform group remed[y]" unrelated to the "merits of each class member's individual case." Allison, 151 F.3d at 414; see Lemon, 216 F.3d at 581. Given that it would take a trier of fact years (if not decades) to conduct additional proceedings—which nearly every court to consider the issue has required as part of the (b)(2) certification—the backpay request is anything but "incidental." See Shipes v. Trinity Indus., 987 F.2d 311, 315 (5th Cir. 1993) (explaining that it took from 1985 to 1992 to process the backpay claims of a class of 400 employees). And awarding backpay without individualized hearings to determine each class member's entitlement to such recovery, through a "formula" or otherwise, would violate the Rules Enabling Act and due process. McLaughlin, 522 F.3d at 231–32; In re Hotel Tel. Charges, 500 F.2d 86, 90 (9th Cir. 1974). Under any and all standards, therefore, the billions of dollars of backpay claims predominate—indeed, they engulf every other issue in the case.

3. Punitive Damages Will Always Predominate

No court of appeals has ever before suggested that punitive damages could be certified under Rule 23(b)(2). In seeking such certification, plaintiffs pursued a novel and aggressive litigation strategy; in not foreclosing that strategy, the Ninth Circuit broke ranks with every other circuit.

This Court has "admonished that 'punitive damages pose an acute danger of arbitrary deprivation of property.'" State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Camp- bell, 538 U.S. 408, 417 (2003) (quoting Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415, 432 (1994)). These due process concerns are magnified in class actions. See Allison, 151 F.3d at 418; Cooper, 390 F.3d at 721.

The Ninth Circuit wrongly noted in passing that "this case does not require individualized punitive damages determinations." Pet. App. 98a. In fact, every case litigated under Title VII requires individualized determinations before punitive damages can be awarded, because only an "aggrieved individual" can collect punitive damages. 42 U.S.C. § 1981a(b)(1). And Title VII unequivocally precludes any monetary award to nonvictims. See id. § 2000e-5(g)(2); Price Waterhouse, 490 U.S. at 245 n.10 (plurality); Costa, 299 F.3d at 857.

Moreover, due process forbids courts from "punish[ing] and deter[ing] conduct that bore no relation to the [plaintiffs'] harm." State Farm, 538 U.S. at 422. In Philip Morris USA v. Williams, 549 U.S. 346 (2007), this Court squarely held that "the Due Process Clause prohibits a State from punishing an individual without first providing that individual with an opportunity to present every available defense." Id. at 353 (emphasis added) (internal quotation marks omitted). And the Seventh Amendment, which guarantees the right to a jury trial, also preserves Wal-Mart's right to have those defenses resolved by the same jury that decided liability. See Feltner v. Columbia Pictures Television, Inc., 523 U.S. 340, 355 (1998); Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412, 422-23 (1987).

Thus, to recover punitive damages, in addition to proving intentional discrimination, class members here must "make an additional 'demonstrat[ion]' of their eligibility for punitive damages." Kolstad v.

Am. Dental Ass'n, 527 U.S. 526, 534 (1999) (emphasis added; alteration in original) (citing 42 U.S.C. § 1981a(b)(1)). As with plaintiffs' backpay claims, that highly individualized proof fatally undermines the cohesion necessary under Rule 23(b)(2). Barnes v. Am. Tobacco Co., 161 F.3d 127, 143 (3d Cir. 1998).

* * *

Class actions serve a valuable role in our civil justice system. But while some aggregation may increase efficiency without sacrificing fairness, aggregation for its own sake, especially on the excessive scale and unlimited scope presented here, is neither efficient nor fair to anyone. Courts must ensure that the substantive rights of the parties—including defendants and absent class members—are not sacrificed on the altar of procedure. Amchem, 521 U.S. at 629. The courts below failed to do so.

CONCLUSION

The judgment should be reversed and the case remanded with instructions to decertify the class.

Respectfully submitted.

APPENDIX

---

28 U.S.C. § 2072 provides:

§ 2072. Rules of procedure and evidence; power to prescribe

(a) The Supreme Court shall have the power to prescribe general rules of practice and procedure and rules of evidence for cases in the United States district courts (including proceedings before magistrates thereof) and courts of appeals.

(b) Such rules shall not abridge, enlarge or modify any substantive right. All laws in conflict with such rules shall be of no further force or effect after such rules have taken effect.

(c) Such rules may define when a ruling of a district court is final for the purposes of appeal under section 1291 of this title.

42 U.S.C. § 1981 provides:

§ 1981. Equal rights under the law

(a) Statement of equal rights

All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses, and exactions of every kind, and to no other.

(b) "Make and enforce contracts" defined

For purposes of this section, the term "make and enforce contracts" includes the making, performance, modification, and termination of contracts, and the enjoyment of all benefits, privileges, terms, and conditions of the contractual relationship.

(c) Protection against impairment

The rights protected by this section are protected against impairment by nongovernmental discrimination and impairment under color of State law.

42 U.S.C. § 1981a provides:

§ 1981a. Damages in cases of intentional discrimination in employment

(a) Right of recovery

(1) Civil rights

In an action brought by a complaining party under section 706 or 717 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 [42 U.S.C. 2000e-5, 2000e-16] against a respondent who engaged in unlawful intentional discrimination (not an employment practice that is unlawful because of its disparate impact) prohibited under section 703, 704, or 717 of the Act [42 U.S.C. 2000e-2, 2000e-3, 2000e-16], and provided that the complaining party cannot recover under section 1981 of this title, the complaining party may recover compensatory and punitive damages as allowed in subsection (b) of this section, in addition to any relief authorized by section 706(g) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, from the respondent.

(2) Disability

In an action brought by a complaining party under the powers, remedies, and procedures set forth in section 706 or 717 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 [42 U.S.C. 2000e-5, 2000e-16] (as provided in section 107(a) of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 (42 U.S.C. 12117(a)), and section 794a(a)(1) of title 29, respectively) against a respondent who engaged in unlawful intentional discrimination (not an employment practice that is unlawful because of its disparate impact) under section 791 of title 29 and the regulations implementing section 791 of title 29, or who violated the requirements of section 791 of title 29 or the regulations implementing section 791 of title 29 concerning the provision of a reasonable accommodation, or section 102 of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 (42 U.S.C. 12112), or committed a violation of section 102(b)(5) of the Act, against an individual, the complaining party may recover compensatory and punitive damages as allowed in subsection (b) of this section, in addition to any relief authorized by section 706(g) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, from the respondent.

(3) Reasonable accommodation and good faith effort

In cases where a discriminatory practice involves the provision of a reasonable accommodation pursuant to section 102(b)(5) of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 [42 U.S.C. 12112(b)(5)] or regulations implementing section 791 of title 29, damages may not be awarded under this section where the covered entity demonstrates good faith efforts, in consultation with the person with the disability who has informed the covered entity that accommodation is needed, to identify and make a reasonable accommodation that would provide such individual with an equally effective opportunity and would not cause an undue hardship on the operation of the business.

(b) Compensatory and punitive damages

(1) Determination of punitive damages

A complaining party may recover punitive damages under this section against a respondent (other than a government, government agency or political subdivision) if the complaining party demonstrates that the respondent engaged in a discriminatory practice or discriminatory practices with malice or with reckless indifference to the federally protected rights of an aggrieved individual.

(2) Exclusions from compensatory damages

Compensatory damages awarded under this section shall not include backpay, interest on backpay, or any other type of relief authorized under section 706(g) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 [42 U.S.C. 2000e-5(g)].

(3) Limitations

The sum of the amount of compensatory damages awarded under this section for future pecuniary losses, emotional pain, suffering, inconvenience, mental anguish, loss of enjoyment of life, and other nonpecuniary losses, and the amount of punitive damages awarded under this section, shall not exceed, for each complaining party—

(A) in the case of a respondent who has more than 14 and fewer than 101 employees in each of 20 or more calendar weeks in the current or preceding calendar year, $50,000;

(B) in the case of a respondent who has more than 100 and fewer than 201 employees in each of 20 or more calendar weeks in the current or preceding calendar year, $100,000; and

(C) in the case of a respondent who has more than 200 and fewer than 501 employees in each of 20 or more calendar weeks in the current or preceding calendar year, $200,000; and

(D) in the case of a respondent who has more than 500 employees in each of 20 or more calendar weeks in the current or preceding calendar year, $300,000.

(4) Construction

Nothing in this section shall be construed to limit the scope of, or the relief available under, section 1981 of this title.

(c) Jury trial

If a complaining party seeks compensatory or punitive damages under this section—

(1) any party may demand a trial by jury; and

(2) the court shall not inform the jury of the limitations described in subsection (b)(3) of this section.

(d) Definitions

As used in this section:

(1) Complaining party

The term "complaining party" means—

(A) in the case of a person seeking to bring an action under subsection (a)(1) of this section, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the Attorney General, or a person who may bring an action or proceeding under title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. 2000e et seq.); or

(B) in the case of a person seeking to bring an action under subsection (a)(2) of this section, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the Attorney General, a person who may bring an action or proceeding under section 794a(a)(1) of title 29, or a person who may bring an action or proceeding under title I of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 [42 U.S.C. 12111 et seq.].

(2) Discriminatory practice

The term "discriminatory practice" means the discrimination described in paragraph (1), or the discrimination or the violation described in paragraph (2), of subsection (a) of this section.

42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2 provides in relevant part:

§ 2000e-2. Unlawful employment practices

(a) Employer practices

It shall be an unlawful employment practice for an employer—

(1) to fail or refuse to hire or to discharge any individual, or otherwise to discriminate against any individual with respect to his compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment, because of such individual's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin; or

(2) to limit, segregate, or classify his employees or applicants for employment in any way which would deprive or tend to deprive any individual of employment opportunities or otherwise adversely affect his status as an employee, because of such individual's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin.

(j) Preferential treatment not to be granted on account of existing number or percentage imbalance

Nothing contained in this subchapter shall be interpreted to require any employer, employment agency, labor organization, or joint labor-management committee subject to this subchapter to grant preferential treatment to any individual or to any group because of the race, color, religion, sex, or national origin of such individual or group on account of an imbalance which may exist with respect to the total number or percentage of persons of any race, color, religion, sex, or national origin employed by any employer, referred or classified for employment by any employment agency or labor organization, admitted to membership or classified by any labor organization, or admitted to, or employed in, any apprenticeship or other training program, in comparison with the total number or percentage of persons of such race, color, religion, sex, or national origin in any community, State, section, or other area, or in the available work force in any community, State, section, or other area.

(k) Burden of proof in disparate impact cases

(1)(A) An unlawful employment practice based on disparate impact is established under this subchapter only if—

(i) a complaining party demonstrates that a respondent uses a particular employment practice that causes a disparate impact on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin and the respondent fails to demonstrate that the challenged practice is job related for the position in question and consistent with business necessity; or

(ii) the complaining party makes the demonstration described in subparagraph (C) with respect to an alternative employment practice and the respondent refuses to adopt such alternative employment practice.

(B)(i) With respect to demonstrating that a particular employment practice causes a disparate impact as described in subparagraph (A)(i), the complaining party shall demonstrate that each particular challenged employment practice causes a disparate impact, except that if the complaining party can demonstrate to the court that the elements of a respondent's decisionmaking process are not capable of separation for analysis, the decisionmaking process may be analyzed as one employment practice.

(ii) If the respondent demonstrates that a specific employment practice does not cause the disparate impact, the respondent shall not be required to demonstrate that such practice is required by business necessity.

(C) The demonstration referred to by subparagraph (A)(ii) shall be in accordance with the law as it existed on June 4, 1989, with respect to the concept of "alternative employment practice".

(2) A demonstration that an employment practice is required by business necessity may not be used as a defense against a claim of intentional discrimination under this subchapter.

(3) Notwithstanding any other provision of this subchapter, a rule barring the employment of an individual who currently and knowingly uses or possesses a controlled substance, as defined in schedules I and II of section 102(6) of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 802(6)), other than the use or possession of a drug taken under the supervision of a licensed health care professional, or any other use or possession authorized by the Controlled Substances Act [21 U.S.C. 801 et seq.] or any other provision of Federal law, shall be considered an unlawful employment practice under this subchapter only if such rule is adopted or applied with an intent to discriminate because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin.

(m) Impermissible consideration of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin in employment practices

Except as otherwise provided in this subchapter, an unlawful employment practice is established when the complaining party demonstrates that race, color, religion, sex, or national origin was a motivating factor for any employment practice, even though other factors also motivated the practice.

* * *

42 U.S.C. § 2000e-3 provides in relevant part:

§ 2000e-3. Other unlawful employment practices

(a) Discrimination for making charges, testifying, assisting, or participating in enforcement proceedings

It shall be an unlawful employment practice for an employer to discriminate against any of his employees or applicants for employment, for an employment agency, or joint labor-management committee controlling apprenticeship or other training or retraining, including on-the-job training programs, to discriminate against any individual, or for a labor organization to discriminate against any member thereof or applicant for membership, because he has opposed any practice made an unlawful employment practice by this subchapter, or because he has made a charge, testified, assisted, or participated in any manner in an investigation, proceeding, or hearing under this subchapter.

* * *

42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5 provides in relevant part:

§ 2000e-5. Enforcement provisions

* * *

(f) Civil action by Commission, Attorney General, or person aggrieved; preconditions; procedure; appointment of attorney; payment of fees, costs, or security; intervention; stay of Federal proceedings; action for appropriate temporary or preliminary relief pending final disposition of charge; jurisdiction and venue of United States courts; designation of judge to hear and determine case; assignment of case for hearing; expedition of case; appointment of master

* * *

(3) Each United States district court and each United States court of a place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States shall have jurisdiction of actions brought under this subchapter. Such an action may be brought in any judicial district in the State in which the unlawful employment practice is alleged to have been committed, in the judicial district in which the employment records relevant to such practice are maintained and administered, or in the judicial district in which the aggrieved person would have worked but for the alleged unlawful employment practice, but if the respondent is not found within any such district, such an action may be brought within the judicial district in which the respondent has his principal office. For purposes of sections 1404 and 1406 of Title 28, the judicial district in which the respondent has his principal office shall in all cases be considered a district in which the action might have been brought.

(g) Injunctions; appropriate affirmative action; equitable relief; accrual of back pay; reduction of back pay; limitations on judicial orders

(1) If the court finds that the respondent has intentionally engaged in or is intentionally engaging in an unlawful employment practice charged in the complaint, the court may enjoin the respondent from engaging in such unlawful employment practice, and order such affirmative action as may be appropriate, which may include, but is not limited to, reinstatement or hiring of employees, with or without back pay (payable by the employer, employment agency, or labor organization, as the case may be, responsible for the unlawful employment practice), or any other equitable relief as the court deems appropriate. Back pay liability shall not accrue from a date more than two years prior to the filing of a charge with the Commission. Interim earnings or amounts earnable with reasonable diligence by the person or persons discriminated against shall operate to reduce the back pay otherwise allowable.

(2)(A) No order of the court shall require the admission or reinstatement of an individual as a member of a union, or the hiring, reinstatement, or promotion of an individual as an employee, or the payment to him of any back pay, if such individual was refused admission, suspended, or expelled, or was refused employment or advancement or was suspended or discharged for any reason other than discrimination on account of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin or in violation of section 2000e-3(a) of this title.

(B) On a claim in which an individual proves a violation under section 2000e-2(m) of this title and a respondent demonstrates that the respondent would have taken the same action in the absence of the impermissible motivating factor, the court—

(i) may grant declaratory relief, injunctive relief (except as provided in clause (ii)), and attorney's fees and costs demonstrated to be directly attributable only to the pursuit of a claim under section 2000e-2(m) of this title; and

(ii) shall not award damages or issue an order requiring any admission, reinstatement, hiring, promotion, or payment, described in subparagraph (A).

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23 provides:

Rule 23. Class Actions

(a) Prerequisites. One or more members of a class may sue or be sued as representative parties on behalf of all members only if:

(1) the class is so numerous that joinder of all members is impracticable;

(2) there are questions of law or fact common to the class;

(3) the claims or defenses of the representative parties are typical of the claims or defenses of the class; and

(4) the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class.

(b) Types of Class Actions. A class action may be maintained if Rule 23(a) is satisfied and if:

(1) prosecuting separate actions by or against individual class members would create a risk of:

(A) inconsistent or varying adjudications with respect to individual class members that would establish incompatible standards of conduct for the party opposing the class; or

(B) adjudications with respect to individual class members that, as a practical matter, would be dispositive of the interests of the other members not parties to the individual adjudications or would substantially impair or impede their ability to protect their interests;

(2) the party opposing the class has acted or refused to act on grounds that apply generally to the class, so that final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief is appropriate respecting the class as a whole; or

(3) the court finds that the questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and that a class action is superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently adjudicating the controversy. The matters pertinent to these findings include:

(A) the class members' interests in individually controlling the prosecution or defense of separate actions;

(B) the extent and nature of any litigation concerning the controversy already begun by or against class members;

(C) the desirability or undesirability of concentrating the litigation of the claims in the particular forum; and

(D) the likely difficulties in managing a class action.

(c) Certification Order; Notice to Class Members; Judgment; Issues Classes; Subclasses.

(1) Certification Order.

(A) Time to Issue. At an early practicable time after a person sues or is sued as a class representative, the court must determine by order whether to certify the action as a class action.

(B) Defining the Class; Appointing Class Counsel. An order that certifies a class action must define the class and the class claims, issues, or defenses, and must appoint class counsel under Rule 23(g).

(C) Altering or Amending the Order. An order that grants or denies class certification may be altered or amended before final judgment.

(2) Notice.

(A) For (b)(1) or (b)(2) Classes. For any class certified under Rule 23(b)(1) or (b)(2), the court may direct appropriate notice to the class.

(B) For (b)(3) Classes. For any class certified under Rule 23(b)(3), the court must direct to class members the best notice that is practicable under the circumstances, including individual notice to all members who can be identified through reasonable effort. The notice must clearly and concisely state in plain, easily understood language:

(i) the nature of the action;

(ii) the definition of the class certified;

(iii) the class claims, issues, or defenses;

(iv) that a class member may enter an appearance through an attorney if the member so desires;

(v) that the court will exclude from the class any member who requests exclusion;

(vi) the time and manner for requesting exclusion; and

(vii) the binding effect of a class judgment on members under Rule 23(c)(3).

(3) Judgment. Whether or not favorable to the class, the judgment in a class action must:

(A) for any class certified under Rule 23(b)(1) or (b)(2), include and describe those whom the court finds to be class members; and

(B) for any class certified under Rule 23(b)(3), include and specify or describe those to whom the Rule 23(c)(2) notice was directed, who have not requested exclusion, and whom the court finds to be class members.

(4) Particular Issues. When appropriate, an action may be brought or maintained as a class action with respect to particular issues.

(5) Subclasses. When appropriate, a class may be divided into subclasses that are each treated as a class under this rule.

(d) Conducting the Action.

(1) In General. In conducting an action under this rule, the court may issue orders that:

(A) determine the course of proceedings or prescribe measures to prevent undue repetition or complication in presenting evidence or argument;

(B) require–to protect class members and fairly conduct the action–giving appropriate notice to some or all class members of:

(i) any step in the action;

(ii) the proposed extent of the judgment; or

(iii) the members' opportunity to signify whether they consider the representation fair and adequate, to intervene and present claims or defenses, or to otherwise come into the action;

(C) impose conditions on the representative parties or on intervenors;

(D) require that the pleadings be amended to eliminate allegations about representation of absent persons and that the action proceed accordingly; or

(E) deal with similar procedural matters.

(2) Combining and Amending Orders. An order under Rule 23(d)(1) may be altered or amended from time to time and may be combined with an order under Rule 16.

(e) Settlement, Voluntary Dismissal, or Compromise. The claims, issues, or defenses of a certified class may be settled, voluntarily dismissed, or compromised only with the court's approval. The following procedures apply to a proposed settlement, voluntary dismissal, or compromise:

(1) The court must direct notice in a reasonable manner to all class members who would be bound by the proposal.

(2) If the proposal would bind class members, the court may approve it only after a hearing and on finding that it is fair, reasonable, and adequate.

(3) The parties seeking approval must file a statement identifying any agreement made in connection with the proposal.

(4) If the class action was previously certified under Rule 23(b)(3), the court may refuse to approve a settlement unless it affords a new opportunity to request exclusion to individual class members who had an earlier opportunity to request exclusion but did not do so.

(5) Any class member may object to the proposal if it requires court approval under this subdivision (e); the objection may be withdrawn only with the court's approval.

(f) Appeals. A court of appeals may permit an appeal from an order granting or denying class-action certification under this rule if a petition for permission to appeal is filed with the circuit clerk within 14 days after the order is entered. An appeal does not stay proceedings in the district court unless the district judge or the court of appeals so orders.

(g) Class Counsel.

(1) Appointing Class Counsel. Unless a statute provides otherwise, a court that certifies a class must appoint class counsel. In appointing class counsel, the court:

(A) must consider:

(i) the work counsel has done in identifying or investigating potential claims in the action;

(ii) counsel's experience in handling class actions, other complex litigation, and the types of claims asserted in the action;

(iii) counsel's knowledge of the applicable law; and

(iv) the resources that counsel will commit to representing the class;

(B) may consider any other matter pertinent to counsel's ability to fairly and adequately represent the interests of the class;

(C) may order potential class counsel to provide information on any subject pertinent to the appointment and to propose terms for attorney's fees and nontaxable costs;

(D) may include in the appointing order provisions about the award of attorney's fees or nontaxable costs under Rule 23(h); and

(E) may make further orders in connection with the appointment.

(2) Standard for Appointing Class Counsel. When one applicant seeks appointment as class counsel, the court may appoint that applicant only if the applicant is adequate under Rule 23(g)(1) and (4). If more than one adequate applicant seeks appointment, the court must appoint the applicant best able to represent the interests of the class.

(3) Interim Counsel. The court may designate interim counsel to act on behalf of a putative class before determining whether to certify the action as a class action.

(4) Duty of Class Counsel. Class counsel must fairly and adequately represent the interests of the class.

(h) Attorney's Fees and Nontaxable Costs. In a certified class action, the court may award reasonable attorney's fees and nontaxable costs that are authorized by law or by the parties' agreement. The following procedures apply:

(1) A claim for an award must be made by motion under Rule 54(d)(2), subject to the provisions of this subdivision (h), at a time the court sets. Notice of the motion must be served on all parties and, for motions by class counsel, directed to class members in a reasonable manner.

(2) A class member, or a party from whom payment is sought, may object to the motion.

(3) The court may hold a hearing and must find the facts and state its legal conclusions under Rule 52(a).

(4) The court may refer issues related to the amount of the award to a special master or a magistrate judge, as provided in Rule 54(d)(2)(D).

STATEMENT

This case challenges Wal-Mart's uniform pay and promotion policies for its retail store employees. Those policies fail to provide any application or posting process for promotions to store management or job-related criteria for setting pay or making promotion decisions – standard practices in the American workplace. Instead, Wal-Mart has chosen to adopt and maintain highly subjective policies, which are implemented, monitored and enforced on a daily basis by its Home Office to ensure consistency in results.

These subjective personnel decisions are exercised within a corporate culture that is rife with gender stereotypes demeaning to female employees: Wal-Mart executives refer to women employees as "Janie Qs," approve holding business meetings at Hooters restaurants, and attribute the absence of women in top positions to men being more aggressive in seeking advancement. The record supporting class certification was replete with evidence of the same kind of gender bias attributable to managers at all levels of the company. Thus, for example, named plaintiff Christine Kwapnoski was told that her male co-worker received a large raise "because [he] had a family to support." Wal-Mart's subjective personnel policies have operated as a vehicle for perpetrating gender bias in its pay and promotion decisions.

As Wal-Mart has long recognized, its female workforce has borne the brunt of these subjective policies. Even though its own data shows that its female employees are, on average, better performers and more experienced than their male counterparts, women's pay lags far behind that of male employees in every major job in each of the company's 41 regions. Women at Wal-Mart also face a classic glass ceiling – while women comprise over 80% of hourly supervisors, they hold only one-third of store management jobs and their ranks steadily diminish at each successive step in the management hierarchy.

Relying on long-standing statutory and Supreme Court authority, plaintiffs allege that Wal-Mart's policies discriminate against women in violation of Title VII. The class is limited to female retail store workers, the majority of whom hold one of only five hourly jobs. Regardless of their job titles or store location, these women are subject to the same uniform personnel policies. After a searching review of the substantial evidentiary record, the district court concluded that plaintiffs had satisfied Rule 23.

With this appeal, Wal-Mart attempts to dismantle several fundamental pillars of this Court's employment discrimination class action jurisprudence.

- It disputes that a policy of subjective decision-making is an employment practice that may be challenged under Title VII and would impose heightened Rule 23(a) standards for such cases.

- It would eliminate the use of pattern or practice methods of proof established by this Court in International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. United States, 431 U.S. 324, 336 (1977). It would instead require that each woman's claim be litigated individually, even though the company failed to retain records that would allow the district court to conduct reliable individual remedies hearings.
- It would limit certification under Rule 23(b)(2) to cases seeking exclusively injunctive or declaratory relief.

These radical and far-reaching proposals to change the law find no support in Rule 23 or Title VII. Instead, they would subvert the goal of allowing workers to vindicate their rights as a class, precluding certification of all but the smallest employment discrimination cases, and would require this Court to overrule 45 years of civil rights and class action precedent. Wal-Mart's arguments also largely ignore – and are inapplicable to – plaintiffs' disparate impact claims where proof of intent is unnecessary.

In place of a single class action in which all common questions would be resolved – one way or the other – Wal-Mart would burden the federal courts with potentially thousands of store-level cases. This outcome would not only waste judicial resources, it would deprive plaintiffs of the ability to challenge and seek relief from Wal-Mart's systemic, company-wide practices. A multiplicity of cases could mask the otherwise unmistakable pattern of discrimination against women throughout the company and obscure the role of senior management in maintaining this discriminatory system. Finally, many of these claims, which amount to an average annual wage loss of $1,100, would be too small to pursue.

1. The district court conducted a searching and rigorous analysis of the substantial evidentiary record and correctly applied Rule 23. App. 48a. Wal-Mart ignores the extensive findings of fact below and urges this Court to reweigh a daunting array of factual questions. The district court's decision to certify the class is subject to review for abuse of discretion; its findings are entitled to deference, unless clearly erroneous.

2. With respect to Rule 23(a), plaintiffs have identified an "employment practice" – subjective decision-making adversely affecting women – that may be challenged under either disparate treatment or disparate impact analysis. Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. United States, 433 U.S. 299, 301, 302 (1977); Watson v. Fort Worth Bank & Trust, 487 U.S. 977, 989-91 (1988). Contrary to Wal-Mart's claim that the case is nothing more than a challenge to millions of local decisions, the district court found that Wal-Mart operates through common subjective policies implemented by managers at all levels, and that plaintiffs demonstrated a sufficient nexus between the challenged practices and the adverse outcomes for women to satisfy Rule 23(a). App. 77a-78a, 186a. Cases involving local decisions have long been addressed under the pattern or practice method of proof. Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 338, 342 n.24; Hazelwood, 433 U.S. at 301, 302.

3. The district court's commonality findings rested on extensive evidence of excessive subjectivity in personnel decisions, guided by a strong corporate culture infused with sexual stereotyping; centralized oversight of decision-making; robust statistical evidence of gender disparities caused by discrimination; and anecdotal evidence of gender bias. App. 226a. The court evaluated the record as a whole and made findings that turned significantly on company documents and testimony, in addition to "statistics, anecdotes and social science."

4. Wal-Mart seeks to impose a host of "heightened" certification requirements, applicable only to Title VII cases challenging a pattern or practice of discrimination facilitated by a policy of excessively subjective decision-making. To satisfy Rule 23, civil rights plaintiffs would bear the burden of proving the merits of their claims to a degree that exceeds the standard required to demonstrate liability under Title VII. Wal-Mart's argument is at odds with the language of Rule 23 and Title VII and this Court's decision in Falcon. See Gen. Tel. Co. of Sw. v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 161 (1982).

5. Wal-Mart seeks to impose per se rules on the kinds of evidence upon which a district court may rely in finding commonality satisfied under Rule 23(a)(2).

a. Statistics – Wal-Mart argues that, as a matter of law, only statistical proof disaggregated to the smallest possible unit may support commonality. This view contradicts the pattern or practice theory and ignores the court's finding that managers above the store level make all promotion and management pay decisions and must approve all hourly pay decisions in excess of a minimal range.

Wal-Mart wrongly asserts that its statistical regressions were "unrebutted" and showed no statistically significant pay rate differences in most stores. Pet. Br. 7, 11, 24. In fact, its regressions were subdivided below "store level," premised on a factual predicate so unreliable that the court struck it from the record, and thoroughly rebutted.

The district court credited plaintiffs' statistical analyses and found that they raised "an inference of company-wide discrimination in both pay and promotions." App. 281a. It analyzed the parties' competing claims concerning statistical aggregation and concluded that plaintiffs' regional analysis raised common issues appropriate for class adjudication. App. 73a.

b. Anecdotal Evidence of Bias – The district court properly relied on 120 class member declarations to further support its commonality finding. They vividly confirmed the uniformity of pay and promotion policies, and the pervasiveness of sexual stereotypes within the company culture. They need not demonstrate claims of individual discrimination or a pattern or practice of discrimination to support commonality.

c. Social Science – The district court properly relied on the conclusions of plaintiffs' social science expert – that Wal-Mart's strong centralized common culture sustained uniformity of decision-making, that its highly subjective system was vulnerable to sexual stereotyping, and that its diversity policies failed to mitigate the effect of stereotyping – as additional evidence supporting its commonality finding. The court fully considered Wal-Mart's motion under Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993), and made findings sufficient to satisfy Daubert's admissibility threshold.

6. The district court made extensive findings to support its conclusion that the class satisfied the typicality and adequacy of representation requirements. Wal-Mart presents no legal argument, but instead asks the Court to revisit factual determinations made below.

7. Wal-Mart would eliminate the "pattern or practice" method of proof, requiring instead that systemic discrimination cases be litigated for both liability and remedies, individual-by-individual and store-by-store. Plaintiffs would be required to prove that "the motive for every single discretionary pay and promotion decision affecting every single class member was discriminatory." Pet Br. 40. Wal-Mart claims a right to mount an individual defense to each class member's claim using Title VII's "mixed motive" provision, even though plaintiffs here do not rely on the mixed motive theory of discrimination. Despite unanimous circuit authority, Wal-Mart argues that back pay determinations could never be performed on a statistical basis, even where, as here, defendant's conduct and record-keeping would make individual determinations unreliable.

8. Wal-Mart would restrict the application of Rule 23(b)(2) to cases seeking solely injunctive and corresponding declaratory relief. Its interpretation is inconsistent with the text of the Rule, the Advisory Committee Notes, and the decisions of every circuit court to address the question. The Advisory Committee drafted Rule 23(b)(2) with the intention of permitting certification unless final relief "relates exclusively or predominantly to money damages." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 Advisory Committee's Note (1966).

a. Back pay, when accompanying claims for injunctive relief, is consistent with (b)(2) certification, as every circuit court addressing the issue has concluded. Such claims are integral to Title VII's equitable remedies, can be objectively determined, and arise out of the same conduct generally applicable to the class that supports injunctive relief. Similarly, total back pay will result from the same factor that makes injunctive relief substantial – the size of the affected class.

b. Wal-Mart's contention that monetary claims must predominate because the former employee class members lack standing to seek injunctive relief confuses standing with the test for eligibility for relief under Rule 23(b)(2). Wal-Mart's one-sided calculus discounts the benefits of injunctive relief to current, future, and returning employees. Wal-Mart's rule would require a continual re-examination of the certification decision with normal employee turnover.

c. This Court need not resolve whether punitive damages may be certified under Rule 23(b)(2) because the Ninth Circuit vacated and remanded that claim. There is no support in Rule 23 for Wal-Mart's claim that punitive damages, which focus on defendant's conduct rather than individual harm, may never be so certified.

ARGUMENT

Plaintiffs contend that Wal-Mart engaged in a pattern or practice of discrimination in violation of Title VII's prohibition on disparate treatment. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(a); Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 336-38. Wal-Mart's top management implemented and maintained its pay and promotion policies, even though they knew the system disadvantaged qualified female employees and perpetuated a corporate culture rife with gender stereotyping. As this Court has recognized, evidence of a policy pursued with knowledge of its adverse effect on a protected group supports a finding of intentional discrimination. "[W]hen the adverse consequences of a law upon an identifiable group are as inevitable as the gender-based consequences [here], a strong inference that the adverse effects were desired can reasonably be drawn." Pers. Adm'r of Mass. v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 279 n.25 (1979); see also Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 335 n.15.

Plaintiffs also challenge these subjective practices under the disparate impact theory of discrimination. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(k); Watson, 487 U.S. at 989-91. They allege that the subjective pay and promotions policies, while neutral on their face, have disproportionately affected female employees and cannot be justified by business necessity. Wal-Mart's practices – far below the industry norms for corporate personnel practices – have resulted in statistically significant disparities in both pay and promotion for women.

Plaintiffs seek injunctive relief as well as back pay and punitive damages. They do not seek compensatory damages or retroactive promotions. App. 5a. Class Cert. Hearing Tr. at 68-70, 92, Dkt. 618 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 24, 2003).

I. THE DISTRICT COURT PROPERLY EXERCISED ITS DISCRETION WHEN IT DETERMINED THAT RULE 23(a) REQUIREMENTS HAD BEEN SATISFIED

After extensive discovery, including over 200 depositions, production of more than a million pages of documents, and electronic personnel data, plaintiffs assembled a massive record to support class certification. The district court issued a detailed 84-page class certification opinion as well as a lengthy opinion addressing challenges to the parties' expert evidence. App. 162a-283a; Pet. Opp. Add. 4-15. In reaching its conclusion, the district court weighed the evidence, as necessary, to determine whether the elements of Rule 23 had been satisfied, even when Rule 23 elements overlapped with the merits. App. 52a n.20, 65a; In re Initial Pub. Offerings Sec. Litig., 471 F.3d 24, 41 (2d Cir. 2006); see, e.g., App. 191a (rejecting claim that managers operate stores independently); App. 226a (finding evidence "raises an inference that Wal-Mart engages in discriminatory practices"). The district court's interlocutory decision to certify the class is subject to review for abuse of discretion and its findings are entitled to deference, unless "clearly erroneous." Cooter & Gell v. Hartmarx, 496 U.S. 384, 400-01 (1990); In re Initial Pub. Offerings, 471 F.3d at 40-41. It properly exercised its discretion in finding Rule 23(a) satisfied.

Wal-Mart asks this Court to start from scratch. It audaciously claims that the district court's extensive factual "'findings' are entitled to no deference." Pet. Br. 18 n.2. It raises a host of objections to the district court's findings, based upon a selective description of the evidence, and invites the Court to decide anew whether each of the Rule 23(a) elements has been satisfied. That is not the proper role for this Court.

Cooter & Gell, 496 U.S. at 400-01; Califano v. Yamasaki, 442 U.S. 682, 703 (1979).

A. The District Court Properly Held that Plaintiffs Demonstrated Common Questions of Law or Fact

Rule 23(a)(2) requires that plaintiffs demonstrate there are "questions of law or fact common to the class." "The threshold of 'commonality' is not high." Jenkins v. Raymark Indus., 782 F.2d 468, 472 (5th Cir. 1986) (citation omitted); 1 Alba Conte & Herbert B. Newberg, Newberg on Class Actions § 3:10 n.9 (4th ed. 2002) (commonality "is easily met in most cases"), and contrasts with the "far more demanding" predominance showing required by Rule 23(b)(3). Amchem Products v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 623-24 (1997).

At the certification stage, "the question is not whether the plaintiff or plaintiffs have stated a cause of action or will prevail on the merits, but rather whether the requirements of Rule 23 are met." Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, 417 U.S. 156, 178 (1974) (quoting Miller v. Mackey Int'l, 452 F.2d 424, 427 (5th Cir. 1971)). As the Ninth Circuit observed below, Rule 23(a)(2), by its terms, requires plaintiffs to demonstrate questions of law or fact, not to answer them. App. 36a, 40a; see Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 Advisory Committee's Note (2003) ("an evaluation of the probable outcome on the merits is not properly part of the certification decision"); cf. Schleicher v. Wendt, 618 F.3d 679, 686 (7th Cir. 2010) ("We do not think it appropriate for the judiciary to make its own . . . adjustments by reinterpreting Rule 23 to make likely success on the merits essential to class certification . . .") (Easterbrook, J.).

1. A System of Subjective Decision-Making Can Constitute a Common Employment Practice

Wal-Mart's principal objection is that company-wide certification was improper because it contends all pay and promotion decisions are made at the store level where managers have wide-ranging discretion and, as such, plaintiffs failed to identify a common policy or practice sufficient for either Title VII or Rule 23(a).

Wal-Mart is wrong. This Court established the standards of proof for pattern or practice cases in Teamsters, in which managers at 51 different terminals made hiring and promotion decisions purportedly by choosing the "best qualified." Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 336, 338, 342 n.24. This Court has held that a policy of subjective decision-making processes that leaves unguided discretion to managers is an employment practice subject to challenge under Title VII where, as here, it has resulted in a pattern of discrimination against women. Hazelwood, 433 U.S. at 301-302; Falcon, 457 U.S. at 159 n.15; Watson, 487 U.S. at 989-91. This Court recognized that subjective criteria, while not themselves unlawful, can be a conduit for biased decision-making. Watson, 487 U.S. at 989-91.

Cognizant of this potential threat to equal employment opportunity, federal courts have for more than three decades certified challenges to subjective employment practices under both disparate treatment and disparate impact theories. See App. 79a (citing cases); Brown v. Nucor Corp., 576 F.3d 149, 150, 153, 157 (4th Cir. 2009); McClain v. Lufkin Indus., Inc., 519 F.3d 264, 272 (5th Cir. 2008).

Wal-Mart repeatedly asserts that the Ninth Circuit observed that plaintiffs were unable to identify "a specific discriminatory policy promulgated by Wal-Mart." Pet. Br. 6, 20, 39. Wal-Mart quotes this language from the opinion entirely out of context. The quotation, in its entirety, reads:

> While a jury may ultimately agree with Wal-Mart that, in the absence of a specific discriminatory policy promulgated by Wal-Mart, it is not more likely than not, based solely on Dr. Bielby's analysis, that Wal-Mart engaged in actual gender discrimination, that question must be left to the merits stage of the litigation (and presumably will not have to be decided as there will be other evidence).

App. 59a.

2. The Evidence Supports the Finding that Wal-Mart's Practices Raised Common Questions

After weighing all the evidence, the district court concluded that plaintiffs had "exceeded" their burden of establishing commonality and had demonstrated that Wal-Mart's company-wide policy of subjective decision-making, within a consistent compensation and promotion structure, raised questions of fact and law common to the class. App. 226a. Those common questions include, for example: 1) does Wal-Mart have a largely subjective compensation and promotion system? App. 173a-174a; 2) does that system result in lower pay and fewer promotions for women? App. 199a, 225a; 3) does Wal-Mart's strong corporate culture contribute to discrimination against women in pay and promotion? App. 186a; 4) which statistical analysis most accurately measures the disparities between male and female employees? App. 211a-212a; 5) was Wal-Mart's senior management aware that its subjective personnel system was resulting in adverse outcomes for women? and, 6) can Wal-Mart's subjective personnel system be justified as a "business necessity" and, if so, were there "less discriminatory alternatives"?

The district court's findings were based on an enormous record, including testimony from senior management and internal company documents – vastly more than Wal-Mart's rhetorical reduction ("sociology, statistics and anecdotes"). Pet. Br. 23. Those findings are summarized below.

Uniform Structure and Central Control – The district court found Wal-Mart stores are operated "with a high degree of store-to-store uniformity" and centralized control. App. 190a. "[T]he personnel structure within each store operates in a basically similar fashion. . . ." App. 174a-175a. "[E]ach individual store is subject to oversight from the company's Home Office" that includes "a very advanced information technology system which allows managers in the Home Office to monitor the operations in each of its retail stores on a close and constant basis." App. 190a, 192a; J.A. 529a. Wal-Mart has a far higher concentration of its regional and senior management based in its Home Office than its competitors do, further confirming its unusually centralized nature. App. 191a n.17.

The district court found that Wal-Mart's unique culture "promotes and sustains uniformity of operational and personnel practices," and "guide[s] managers in the exercise of their discretion." App. 188a, 192a. It found "no genuine dispute that Wal-Mart has carefully constructed and actively fosters a strong and distinctive, centrally controlled, corporate culture." App. 188a. The court noted that culture is an integral part of all management training programs. App. 188a-189a. Wal-Mart's practice of "promoting from within" means that "the culture lessons learned by junior-level employees contribute to building a foundation of common understanding and practice among the management team." App. 189a. Further, the company regularly moves store-level managers across stores and districts, and thereby "ensure[s] that a uniform Wal-Mart Way culture operates consistently throughout all stores." App. 189a-190a. Plaintiffs offered evidence that Wal-Mart "cultivates and maintains a strong corporate culture which includes gender stereotyping." App. 173a.

The district court expressly rejected Wal-Mart's factual assertions that "each of its stores is a virtual 'main street' of stores within a store, all run by independent managers" and that "each division of stores has its own unique hierarchical structure." App. 191a.

Uniform Departments and Jobs – The court found that stores had similar jobs categories and descriptions. App. 175a. While there are several dozen departments within each store, most hourly workers fall within five job positions: Support Manager, Department Manager, Cashiers, Sales Associates and Stockers. App. 174a-176a; J.A. 482a. Employees are assigned and moved among departments frequently and pay policies make no distinction by department. R.A. 23-24;[1] J.A. 1402a. There are no minimum or preferred education or experience requirements for any hourly job. J.A. 373a.

Uniformity of Promotion Policies and Practices – Regional and district managers, who are mostly male, make all promotion decisions for all store management positions. App. 180a-182a; J.A. 481a; J.A. 1370a-1373a. The district court found that "[t]he subjectivity in promotion decisions occurs in two fundamental ways: (a) a largely subjective selection practice hindered by only minimal objective criteria, combined with (b) a failure to post a large proportion of promotional opportunities." App. 180a. As a result, "class members had no ability to apply for, or otherwise formally express their interest in, openings as they arose" and "[m]anagers did not have to consider all interested and qualified candidates, thus further intensifying the subjective nature of the promotion process." App. 182a-183a. More than a year after this case was filed, a Senior Vice President admitted that there was nothing at Wal-Mart that would explain to "an hourly associate how to get promoted." R.A. 41.

[1] Five documents are attached and designated as Respondent's Appendix ("R.A.").

Uniformity of Compensation Policies and Practices – "All hourly employees at every Wal-Mart store are compensated pursuant to the same general pay structure." App. 176a. The Home Office establishes minimum starting rates for each hourly job in the retail stores. Id. While store managers are granted substantial discretion in making hourly pay decisions, any pay increase above a certain percentage is automatically reported to higher management and requires special approval. App. 177a.

The Home Office sets broad pay ranges for each in-store salaried position, but pay rates are set within these ranges "primarily by District Managers (the first level in the management hierarchy above Store Managers) and their superiors, the [Home Office-based] Regional Managers." App. 178a. For both hourly and salaried compensation policies and practices, the district court found that there "is significant uniformity across stores, and that Defendant's policies all contain a common feature of subjectivity." App. 180a.

Gender Stereotyping – Relying on a broad range of evidence, the district court found "significant evidence" of "gender stereotyping." App. 226a. That evidence included testimony from plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Bielby, App. 196a, and abundant examples of stereotypes adverse to women, starting at the highest levels of management.

As far back as 1992, founder Sam Walton conceded that Wal-Mart's "old way" of requiring its managers to move frequently "put good, smart women at a disadvantage," and was unnecessary, J.A. 368a-369a, a view echoed by female managers. J.A. 414a, 417a. This policy nonetheless remained in effect after this action was filed. J.A. 220a-221a, 419a.

At Home Office executive meetings, senior officers for Sam's Club often referred to female store employees as "Janie Qs" and "girls." J.A. 303a-306a. The most senior human resource official saw nothing wrong with district managers holding their management meetings at Hooters restaurants. J.A. 232a. Numerous Wal-Mart managers admitted that they regularly go to strip clubs when they attend company management meetings. See, e.g., Riggs Dep. at 196:1, Ex. 40, Dkt. 100 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 28, 2003); J. Brown Dep. at 185:8-12, Ex. 41, Dkt. 100; Seaman Dep. at 321:1-3, Ex. 42, Dkt. 100; Sherman Dep. at 259:10-23, Ex. 43, Dkt. 100. Female store managers were required to attend these meetings at Hooters and strip clubs as part of the job. J.A. 924a-933a.

The company communicated stereotyped views of women to store managers who attended mandatory training at the Walton Institute in Bentonville. Participants were told that the reason so few women have reached senior management at Wal-Mart was because "men have been more aggressive in achieving those levels of responsibility . . . ." R.A. 44.

A Women in Leadership Group identified a number of problems afflicting women employees, including that "[s]tereotypes limit opportunities for women," "[c]areer decisions are made for associates based on gender," and "[m]en's informal network overlooks women." R.A. 48. In 1998, a consultant retained by Wal-Mart advised the company that a "glass ceiling is perceived by many women" at Wal-Mart and "some [district managers] . . . do not seem personally comfortable with women in leadership roles." R.A. 63-64.

One former Wal-Mart Vice President described the company's diversity efforts as "lip service," J.A. 302a, a conclusion confirmed by a comprehensive analysis of Wal-Mart's diversity programs. App. 194a-195a.

The district court cited class member testimony about the common stereotypes prevalent throughout Wal-Mart. App. 225a-226a; see also J.A. 754a (female assistant manager told repeatedly by store manager that retail is "tough" and not "appropriate" for women); J.A. 1188a-1189a (male store manager said "[m]en are here to make a career and women aren't. Retail is for housewives who just need to earn extra money"); J.A. 931a (district manager told female store manager that she should not be running a Wal-Mart store and "needed to be home raising [her] daughter"); J.A. 1001a (store manager said male associate received larger raise because he had "a family to support").

Unequal Promotional Opportunities – The district court found that "roughly 65 percent of hourly employees are women, while roughly 33 percent of management employees are women." App. 176a. Women hold only 14% of Store Manager positions yet disproportionately occupy 80 to 90% of the hourly supervisory positions. J.A. 479a (chart). When Wal-Mart's proportion of women in management was compared to that of its 20 largest competitors, 80% of its stores had significantly fewer female managers. App. 223a-225a. The district court credited plaintiffs' proof that, after controlling for relevant factors, "a statistically significant shortfall of women [were] being promoted into each of the in-store management classifications over the entire class period." This shortfall was "consistent in nearly every geographic region at Wal-Mart." App. 212a. Women also consistently took longer than men to advance to management positions. App. 198a, 214a; J.A. 484a-485a (average 4.4 years for women versus 2.9 years for men to Assistant Manager). These differences existed even though female employees at Wal-Mart generally have more seniority and better performance ratings than male employees. J.A. 483a-485a.

The record shows that Wal-Mart executives were long aware of these promotion shortfalls and failed to remedy them. Executive Vice President Coleman Peterson made regular presentations to top management about the company's workforce. Shortly before this case was filed, Peterson informed management that, based upon the company's own internal benchmarking, "Wal-Mart's women in management percent . . . is significantly behind several of the other retailers reporting . . . [Wal-Mart] trails both the retail industry . . . and workforce averages." J.A. 408a. This report, like others that Peterson made to management and the Board, highlighted the troubling lack of women in the company's management jobs. J.A. 397a-404a, 410a, 413a. As Peterson candidly expressed in another memo about the treatment of women and minorities, "[w]e're behind the rest of the world." J.A. 405a. Until December 2000, Wal-Mart's Executive Committee was entirely male. J.A. 205a-208a.

Unequal Pay – Plaintiffs' statistical regressions for hourly and salaried employees showed that in every one of Wal-Mart's 41 regions women were paid significantly less than men, and this pay gap increased each year. J.A. 518a-519a. This pattern was consistent for all store classifications even when seniority, turnover, store, job performance, job position, part-time or full-time status, and other relevant factors were taken into account. App. 200a, 209a.

After careful consideration of the parties' competing analyses, the district court concluded that plaintiffs' statistical analysis raises "an inference of company-wide discrimination in both pay and promotions." App. 281a.

3. Neither Rule 23 nor Title VII Imposes a Heightened Commonality Standard for Challenges to Subjective Criteria

To satisfy commonality, plaintiffs must demonstrate that "there are questions of law or fact common to the class." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(2).

Wal-Mart proposes a long list of additional requirements to these simple terms. These "add-ons" are not found in either the text of Rule 23 or Title VII. Indeed, they would make satisfying Rule 23(a)(2) far more exacting than even proving liability for a pattern or practice claim. According to Wal-Mart, Title VII plaintiffs must demonstrate:

- that there is "significant proof" of discrimination; Pet. Br. 19-20;
- "a policy that is entirely subjective;" Pet. Br. 20-21; and,
- the policy is a "general policy of discrimination" that is itself unlawful; Pet. Br. 20;
- the policy was implemented "in a discriminatory fashion common to every single female employee." Pet. Br. 20

> (emphasis added), and "the motive for every single discretionary pay and promotion decision affecting every single class member was discriminatory." Pet. Br. 40.

This Court has rejected the notion that Rule 23 includes special, unwritten rules for certain cases. "Rule 23 provides a one-size-fits-all formula for deciding the class-action question." Shady Grove Orthopedic Assocs., P.A. v. Allstate Ins. Co., ___ U.S. ___, 130 S. Ct. 1431, 1437 (2010). Nothing in Rule 23 or Title VII imposes such heightened certification standards for employment discrimination cases challenging a policy providing for subjective personnel decisions. Wal-Mart mistakenly relies on a footnote from Falcon, 457 U.S. at 159 n.15, for these enhanced burdens.

In Falcon, this Court addressed the application of Rule 23(a) requirements to a proposed Title VII "across the board" class action that sought to include job applicants denied hire and incumbent employees denied promotions. In support of class certification, the sole named plaintiff offered nothing more than his own personal claim of promotion discrimination and failed to make "any specific presentation identifying the questions of law or fact that were common" to himself and the proposed class. Id. at 158. The Court held that district courts may not presume compliance with Rule 23 from a single allegation of discrimination. Instead, they must conduct a "rigorous analysis" to ensure that each Rule 23 requirement is satisfied.

Id. at 161. The Court concluded that plaintiff's claim was insufficient to "bridge the gap" between an individual claim of promotion discrimination and a class claim challenging a pattern of discrimination. Id. at 157-58. Here, plaintiffs went far beyond presenting individual claims to address all elements of Rule 23. See, e.g., App. 51a-53a, 188a, 192a, 226a, 231a n.43, 232a-234a. Nothing in Falcon supports Wal-Mart's claim that pattern or practice cases are subject to unique requirements under Rule 23.

Significant Proof – Wal-Mart asserts that plaintiffs did not satisfy Rule 23(a)(2) because they failed to adduce "[s]ignificant proof that [the] employer operated under a general policy of discrimination" implemented through "entirely subjective decision-making processes." Pet. Br. 19. It derives this standard from an incomplete quotation of one sentence in a footnote from Falcon:

> Significant proof that an employer operated under a general policy of discrimination conceivably could justify a class of both applicants and employees if the discrimination manifested itself in hiring and promotion practices in the same general fashion, such as through entirely subjective decision-making processes.

Falcon, 457 U.S. at 159 n.15 (emphasis added).

The Falcon footnote, read in context, presents a hypothetical scenario under which applicants and employees could be included within the same certified class. In other words, in circumstances where plaintiffs challenge "two distinct processes" – hiring and promotion – they must show significant proof of "a common policy alleged to be discriminatory" to unite applicants and employees in a single class. App. 42a-43a; Staton v. Boeing Co., 327 F.3d 938, 955 (9th Cir. 2003); Griffin v. Dugger, 823 F.2d 1476, 1486-87 (11th Cir. 1987). The language was not intended to create a new requirement that plaintiffs prove intentional discrimination at the certification stage. App. 43a. Moreover, this case is not, like Falcon, an "across the board" class where one class representative who has experienced only one form of discriminatory practice seeks to challenge a broad range of employment practices. Falcon, 457 U.S. at 153. Here, the named plaintiffs, current and former employees, challenge only discrimination in pay and promotion, which each has suffered.

The heightened standard Wal-Mart would impose on challenges to subjective decision making finds no support in the text of Rule 23(a)(2). It also runs afoul of the central holding of Falcon that there are no special class certification rules for particular kinds of cases. Falcon, 457 U.S. at 161 ("a Title VII class action, like any other class action, may only be certified if . . . the prerequisites of Rule 23(a) have been satisfied.") (emphasis added). Nor does Title VII suggest a heightened standard for challenges to subjective decision-making practices. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(a) & (k). Where the statutory language of Title VII does not indicate a clear intent by Congress to impose a heightened evidentiary standard, this Court has declined to do so. Desert Palace, Inc. v. Costa, 539 U.S. 90, 98-101 (2003).

To require that plaintiffs adduce "significant proof" of discrimination where subjective practices are challenged also conflates the merits with the Rule 23(a) certification inquiry. App. 44a. The court's role at certification is limited to determination of whether common questions exist, not to answer them.

But, even if a heightened standard were to be applied, Wal-Mart's proposed "significant proof" standard was met here. The district court expressly found, in more than 24 pages of findings, that plaintiffs had offered "significant evidence" that raised an inference of classwide discrimination in the pay and promotion practices. App. 226a. These findings amply meet any new heightened showing of "significant proof" of discrimination. App. 46a-47a.

Entirely Subjective – Wal-Mart, again citing the Falcon footnote, argues that plaintiffs may only challenge a practice of subjective decision-making if they can establish that the system is "entirely subjective," an argument not raised below. Pet. Br. 20-21; App. 174a (parties agree that decisions are "largely subjective"). This argument is also at odds with the text of Rule 23(a)(2) and with Title VII. Wal-Mart would create a nonsensical rule that addition of one objective criterion (e.g., being of legal age) to an otherwise subjective process would insulate employers from liability. In Watson, this Court rejected just such an assertion: "However one might distinguish 'subjective' from 'objective' criteria . . . selection systems that combine both types would generally have to be considered subjective in nature." Watson, 487 U.S. at 989-91; see also Griffin, 823 F.2d at 1486-87. The 1991 amendments to Title VII, which codified the adverse impact standard, make no distinction between an "employment practice" that is objective or subjective. See 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(k). Here, the district court found that subjectivity was a common feature of all challenged pay and promotion policies, satisfying commonality under Rule 23(a). App. 180a-183a.

General Policy of Discrimination – In its final misapprehension of the Falcon footnote, Wal-Mart claims that plaintiffs can only satisfy commonality by challenging a "general policy of discrimination" that must itself be unlawful. Pet. Br. 22. Title VII does not require that plaintiffs identify a facially discriminatory policy. Disparate impact claims, by definition, challenge "employment practices" that are "fair in form, but discriminatory in operation." Lewis v. City of Chicago, ___ U.S. ___, 130 S. Ct. 2191, 2197 (2010) (quoting Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424, 431 (1971)); 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(k). Disparate treatment claims may challenge employment policies or practices, including a "policy of leaving promotion decisions to the unchecked discretion of lower level supervisors." Watson, 487 U.S. at 990. The existence and nature of the challenged practice may be proven through direct or circumstantial evidence. Desert

Palace, 539 U.S. at 100; United States Postal Serv. Bd. of Governors v. Aikens, 460 U.S. 711, 714 n.3 (1983).

As a corollary, Wal-Mart asserts that plaintiffs cannot demonstrate a "general policy of discrimination" since Wal-Mart has a written anti-discrimination policy. Pet. Br. 19-20. But an employer cannot insulate itself from liability for discrimination simply by promulgating a written anti-discrimination policy. See, e.g., EEOC v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 187 F.3d 1241, 1248 (10th Cir. 1999).

Proof that Every Class Member Was Injured – Finally, Wal-Mart asserts, without authority, that plaintiffs must demonstrate that its policies operated "in a discriminatory fashion common to every single female employee." Pet. Br. 20 (emphasis added). Rule 23(a)(2) imposes no such requirement. Forbush v. J.C. Penney Co., 994 F.2d 1101, 1105 (5th Cir. 1993); DG ex rel. Stricklin v. Devaughn, 594 F.3d 1188, 1198 (10th Cir. 2010); cf. Kohen v. Pacific Inv. Mgmt. Co., LLC, 571 F.3d 672, 676 (7th Cir. 2009) (Posner, J.).

A requirement that plaintiffs prove a policy has discriminated against every single class member to obtain certification would be far more demanding than the standard for proving liability, which requires a showing that discrimination was Wal-Mart's "regular rather than . . . unusual practice." Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 336-37. Were absolute uniformity required, an employer could defeat certification in every case by sparing just one class member or department from an otherwise uniform and discriminatory policy. Cf. Walters v. Reno, 145 F.3d 1032, 1047 (9th Cir. 1998). The language of Rule 23(a)(2) requires evidence of "common" questions, not that the challenged practices raise "identical" or "universal" questions. See also Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2) Advisory Committee's Note (1966) ("[a]ction or inaction is directed to a class within the meaning of this subdivision even if it has taken effect or is threatened only as to one or a few members of the class, provided it is based on grounds which have general application to the class.") (emphasis added).

4. Rule 23(a)(2) Does Not Restrict the Evidence that May Be Proferred to Support the Presence of Common Questions

Wal-Mart takes a similar approach to the evidence that plaintiffs may use to demonstrate the presence of common questions of law or fact, ignoring entire categories of evidence and seeking to impose restrictions not found in the Federal Rules of Evidence, Rule 23 or Title VII.

Statistics – Wal-Mart argues that the only statistical proof that can support commonality is analysis disaggregated to the store-by-store level. Wal-Mart's assertion hinges on its contention – unsupported by the record – that relevant decisions are made there. It entirely ignores the central role its senior management plays in making promotion and management pay decisions and reviewing hourly pay decisions. Its basic premise is flawed because, in a pattern or practice case, the relevant question is whether there is a pattern of discriminatory decision-making, not whether the decisions of individual managers are discriminatory. Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 336. Subdividing a company into ever smaller units "to the point where it [is] difficult to demonstrate statistical significance" can mask a pattern of discrimination, while aggregated data may more likely reveal one. Capaci v. Katz & Besthoff, 711 F.2d 647, 654 (5th Cir. 1983); Segar v. Smith, 738 F.2d 1249, 1286 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (disapproving statistical analysis that "repeatedly disaggregate[ed] until groups were too small to generate any statistically significant evidence of discrimination").

Plaintiffs' statistician prepared hourly pay regressions at the regional level, because of the scope of Wal-Mart's policies and decision-making. He relied upon corporate policies under which the subjective decisions were made, the oversight of pay decisions by district and regional managers, company-wide training and culture, and the frequent movement of store managers among districts and regions. App. 202a-204a; R.A. 18-26, 36-38. To account for any differences at the store level, these regressions included a variable for "store" to capture any difference in pay rates and staffing. App. 209a. The district court found this approach to be a "reasonable means of conducting a statistical analysis." App. 208a.

In contrast, Wal-Mart's expert offered a highly atomized analysis, which sub-divided the workforce even within stores into small sub-units that obscured any pattern of discriminatory decision-making and was far below the level of any relevant decision-maker in this case. Rather than a store-level analysis, each store was broken into at least three separate sub-parts for analysis – grocery, non-grocery and specialty departments – resulting in over 7,600 regressions. These artificial divisions were further segmented by 21 variables in the regressions, including department, which reduced the statistical unit of analysis. R.A. 19-20. This wholly artificial model, which tracks neither Wal-Mart pay policy nor decision-making, offered two advantages to Wal-Mart. It resulted in regressions with too few employees to yield statistically significant results, R.A. 19-20, and obscured Wal-Mart's broader discriminatory pay pattern. R.A. 24.

Nor is Wal-Mart correct in asserting that its expert's conclusion – that "90% of the stores" had no statistically significant gender pay differences – was "unrebutted." Pet. Br. 7, 11. Plaintiffs' expert comprehensively rebutted Wal-Mart's expert's methodology and conclusions. R.A. 19-39. Even more significantly, the district court struck the central justification for analyzing pay by store – a survey conducted by defense counsel – after Wal-Mart's expert admitted she could not vouch for its reliability. App. 203a-204a; Pet. Opp. Add. 17-23. Yet even these analyses, flawed as they were, showed an overall adverse impact. J.A. 1663a-1665a.

Wal-Mart faults the district court for failing to resolve conclusively which statistical model was more persuasive. Pet. Br. 25. In fact, the district court devoted 18 pages of analysis to the competing models and "weighed evidence and made findings" in its Rule 23 determinations. App. 49a. It "did not shy away" from issues overlapping with the merits "to the extent necessary to satisfy itself . . . that Plaintiffs raised common questions." App. 65a. For example, the court rigorously analyzed why plaintiffs' "statistical method best reflected the alleged discrimination" in crediting plaintiffs' regional analysis over defendant's challenges. App. 66a-67a, 71a, 204a. In evaluating each side's promotion analysis, the court determined that plaintiffs have "shown" reasons to accept their statistics and concluded that defendant's "assertion that its approach is necessarily superior does not withstand scrutiny." App. 73a, 222a.

The circuits agree that the district court must analyze the underlying factual and legal issues relevant to Rule 23, even if they overlap with the merits. App. 15a-22a. As the Ninth Circuit noted, "this does not mean a district court should put the actual resolution of the merits cart before the motion to dismiss, summary judgment, and trial horses." Id. In a Title VII case where statistical proof will form the basis of both the certification showing and the merits, a determination of whether plaintiffs' statistics prove discrimination goes beyond Rule 23, which requires only a finding of common questions. App. 36a.

Wal-Mart seeks to convert this fact-laden statistical dispute into a single legal issue. It argues that the appropriate level of statistical aggregation is a legal issue that must be resolved as part of the Rule 23 inquiry. Pet. Br. 26. It cites only this Court's decision in Wards Cove, which addressed neither statistical aggregation nor Rule 23 criteria. Wards Cove Packing Co., v. Antonio, 490 U.S. 642, 650-55 (1989), abrogated on other grounds by Civil Rights Act of 1991, Pub. L. No. 102-166, S. 1745, 105 Stat. 1071 (1991). The question in Wards Cove was the proper definition of the qualified labor pool for evaluation of plaintiffs' claim of disparate impact in hiring. Id. at 650. That case provides no support for an inflexible standard on the proper level of statistical aggregation, divorced from the facts in the case, which would impermissibly straitjacket the Rule 23 inquiry in employment discrimination cases.

Anecdotal Evidence – This Court has observed that, in a Title VII pattern or practice case, anecdotal evidence "[brings] the cold numbers convincingly to light." Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 339. At the Rule 23 stage, anecdotal declarations may be relevant to demonstrating the presence of common questions of law or fact. Brown, 576 F.3d at 153, 156-57.

Here, among the many types of evidence upon which the district court relied were "over a hundred declarations by designated class members showing common subjective practices." App. 186a. These remarkably similar accounts, from hourly and management level women in 30 different states, attest to the uniform and centralized control of operations, unequal pay for the same work, ever-shifting subjective criteria for promotion, and gender stereotyping. App. 186a; J.A. 420a (map of declarant locations); J.A. 586a, 607a-608a, 643a, 697a-698a, 707a-709a, 752a, 845a, 887a, 899a-900a, 1001a, 1019a, 1020a, 1079a, 1188a. They illustrate how a single corporate culture influences the way in which subjective pay and promotion decisions are made.

Wal-Mart suggests that courts may only credit such evidence if each declaration recounts "actionable claims of discrimination" and, together, they prove the existence of a "pattern or practice" of discrimination. Pet. Br. 31-32. Nothing in Rule 23 or Title VII provides any support for such a per se rule. Nor is there any basis for excluding declarations from former employees, as Wal-Mart implies by arbitrarily reducing of the number of declarations offered from 114 to 63. Pet. Br. 31. Probative evidence may come from a wide variety of percipient witnesses. Fed. R. Evid. 601; cf. Nat'l R.R. Passenger Corp. v. Morgan, 536 U.S. 101, 113 (2002). It was well within the discretion of the trial court to rely on this evidence in finding Rule 23(a)(2) was satisfied.

Social Science – Plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Bielby, offered an opinion concerning the uniform and centralized nature of Wal-Mart's operations ("[c]entralized coordination, reinforced by a strong organizational culture, creates and sustains uniformity in personnel policy and practice"), and a separate opinion about the risks associated with its subjective personnel practices ("[s]ubjective and discretionary features of the company's personnel policy and practice make decisions about compensation and promotion vulnerable to gender bias."). J.A. 525a. Dr. Bielby's conclusion that Wal-Mart's system increased the risk of gender stereotyping tended to show why, in the circumstances of this case, there was a common question as to whether subjectivity was a "ready mechanism for discrimination." J.A. 545a-546a.

Wal-Mart conflates these two opinions and mischaracterizes Bielby's hypothesis as stating "Wal-Mart may be 'vulnerable' to gender stereotyping because it . . . has a 'strong corporate culture.'" Pet. Br. 29 (emphasis added). That is not what he said. Instead, Dr. Bielby concluded that the company's strong corporate culture, about which the district court itself made separate findings, "sustains uniformity in personnel policy and practice." J.A. 525a.

Wal-Mart complains that Dr. Bielby failed to quantify how many employment decisions were the product of stereotyped thinking. Pet. Br. 28. In Price Waterhouse v. Hopkins, 490 U.S. 228, 235-36, 255-56 (1989), abrogated on other grounds by Civil Rights Act of 1991, Pub. L. No. 102-166, § 1745, 105 Stat. 1071 (1991), this Court endorsed the use of expert testimony regarding gender stereotyping in discrimination cases and did so even though that expert (like any credible expert) could not specify which particular decisions were the product of stereotyping. Expert testimony need not provide quantifiable knowledge to be admissible. Fed. R. Evid. 702 (the "scientific . . . knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue.").

Wal-Mart moved to strike Dr. Bielby's opinions. The district court conducted a thorough assessment of Wal-Mart's arguments, "guided by Daubert," and concluded that the opinions were "based on valid principles" and "sufficiently probative to assist the Court in evaluating the class certification requirements." Pet. Opp. Add. 5-6. The Ninth Circuit found no abuse of discretion. App. 57a-58a & n.22. The Ninth Circuit opted not to reach the unresolved legal question whether a Daubert inquiry is required at the class certification stage as the district court had conducted an equivalent analysis. This Court need not reach the question either.

B. The District Court Properly Held that Plaintiffs Demonstrated Typicality

Rule 23(a)(3) requires that "the claims or defenses of the representative parties are typical of the claims or defenses of the class." Typicality ensures that the class representatives share the issues common to other class members and tends to merge with commonality. Falcon, 457 U.S. at 158 n.13. The interests and claims of the named plaintiffs and class members "need not be identical to satisfy typicality." Stricklin, 594 F.3d at 1198.

Here, the six named plaintiffs are all current or former employees, who allege they were injured by the same challenged pay and promotion practices. App. 80a. Plaintiff Christine Kwapnoski repeatedly sought management promotions that went to less qualified men. Although she was assigned to supervise the receiving dock, her General Manager encouraged her "to doll up, to wear some makeup, and to dress a little better." J.A. 1001a-1003a (internal quotations omitted). When she complained about a male co-worker receiving a larger raise, the same manager told her the male employee "had a family to support." Id. Plaintiff Betty Dukes, who has worked for Wal-Mart since 1994, has been paid significantly less than men with less seniority performing similar work, and was passed over for several Support Manager promotions. J.A. 743a-749a; see J.A. 606a-624a (Arana); J.A. 827a-838a (Gunter); J.A. 1242a-1247a (Surgeson); and J.A. 1298a-1301a (Williamson).

Wal-Mart raises a number of factual issues about the claims and defenses relevant to the named plaintiffs. Pet. Br. 32-34. It selects snippets from their declarations and argues that those individual facts render them atypical. Pet. Br. 32-33. The district court thoroughly evaluated these same arguments and found that the named plaintiffs' claims were "reasonably co-extensive" with those of the class. App. 228a-231a. While it is plainly dissatisfied with these findings, Wal-Mart presents no legal issue for this Court.

C. The District Court Properly Concluded that the Named Plaintiffs Were Adequate Representatives

Rule 23(a)(4) requires that the named plaintiffs "will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23. To satisfy adequacy, a "class representative must be part of the class and 'possess the same interest and suffer the same injury' as the class members." Amchem, 521 U.S. at 625-26 (citation omitted). In such circumstances, class representatives are adequate because they are likely to "vigorously prosecute the interests of the class." Beattie v. CenturyTel, Inc., 511 F.3d 554, 563 (6th Cir. 2007).

Wal-Mart contends that the mere possibility of disagreements among the class renders the named plaintiffs inadequate. But, to defeat adequacy, a "conflict must be fundamental" and "must go to the heart of the litigation." Gunnells v. Healthplan Servs. Inc., 348 F.3d 417, 430-31 (4th Cir. 2003) (citation omitted); Denney v. Deutsche Bank AG, 443 F.3d 253, 268 (2d Cir. 2006). A conflict is not fundamental where the named plaintiffs share common objectives and factual and legal positions with the class. Ward v. Dixie Nat'l Life Ins. Co., 595 F.3d 164, 180 (4th Cir. 2010). Moreover, a conflict will not defeat adequacy where it is "merely speculative or hypothetical." Id. at 180 (citation omitted).

No inherent conflict exists just because a class includes supervisory and non-supervisory employees; rather, adequacy depends upon the specific facts and claims presented. Staton, 327 F.3d at 958-59; Rossini v. Ogilvy & Mather, Inc., 798 F.2d 590, 595-96 (2d Cir. 1986). After a detailed factual inquiry, the district court concluded that no substantive conflict existed because: 1) the named plaintiffs held supervisory as well as non-supervisory positions; 2) the requested injunctive and monetary relief would be available throughout the class; and 3) Wal-Mart's alleged discriminatory policies affect supervisory and non-supervisory employees alike. App. 232a-234a, 280a-81a.

In contesting this finding, Wal-Mart offers only speculation that the interests of supervisory and nonsupervisory employees are "diametrically opposed" without identifying any evidence of a substantive conflict. Pet. Br. 35; cf. Hansberry v. Lee, 311 U.S. 32, 43-44 (1940) (homeowner opposing racial covenant inadequately represented by named plaintiffs with diametrically opposed interest in enforcing it). Wal-Mart offers no evidence that class members endorsed the challenged gender bias or practices. "To deny class certification now, because of a potential conflict of interest that may not become actual, would be premature." Kohen, 571 F.3d at 680.

Nor is there any merit to Wal-Mart's assertion, first raised on appeal, that the named plaintiffs are inadequate because they have not pursued class compensatory damages. Pet. Br. 35-36. Courts recognize that plaintiffs are permitted to press those claims that afford them the best chance of certification and success for the class. See, e.g., Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Visa USA Inc., 396 F.3d 96, 113 (2d Cir. 2005) ("due process does not require that all class claims be pursued"); In re Universal Serv. Fund Tel. Billing Practices Litig., 219 F.R.D. 661, 668-70 (D. Kan. 2004). Likewise, Wal-Mart's assertion that non-victims might benefit from the case simply ignores the findings of the district court. See App. 166a n.4, 275a (actual victims can be identified and compensated).

D. Certification Has Not Altered Substantive Law

Wal-Mart argues that the certification order violates the Rules Enabling Act by relieving plaintiffs of the burden of proving their claims individually and depriving it of the ability to present its defenses. Pet. Br. 38-44. The argument boils down to one false premise: that an employment discrimination class action may only be litigated decision-by-decision and class member-by-class member. This radical claim, never accepted by any court, is at odds with the plain language of Title VII and decades of employment discrimination class action jurisprudence.

1. Discriminatory Intent May Be Proven Classwide

Wal-Mart asserts that Title VII requires plaintiffs to "prove that the motive for every single discretionary pay and promotion decision affecting every single class member was discriminatory." Pet. Br. 40. It faults the district court for allegedly failing to "grapple" with the question of whether the element of intent requires individualized proof of intent for each manager at each facility.

Plaintiffs' disparate impact claim requires no proof of intent. Lewis, 130 S. Ct. at 2199; Watson, 487 U.S. at 990-91. As for plaintiffs' disparate treatment claim, Wal-Mart ignores the "crucial difference between an individual's claim of discrimination and a class action alleging a general pattern or practice of discrimination. . . ." Cooper v. Fed. Reserve Bank, 467 U.S. 867, 876 (1984). The focus in a pattern or practice case is not on individual employment decisions, "but on a pattern of discriminatory decision-making." Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 360 n.46. Plaintiffs must demonstrate that the discrimination was the employer's "standard operating procedure the regular rather than the unusual practice." Id. at 336; Cooper, 467 U.S. at 875-76, n.9 (Teamsters standards apply to private class actions). A finding of an unlawful pattern or practice, "without any further evidence" supports the issuance of prospective relief and creates a presumption that every member of the class is entitled to relief. Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 360-62. And the pattern or practice method of proof, in which intent can be inferred from, among other evidence, significant statistical disparities, is consistent with this Court's consideration of proof of intent under the most demanding standards. Feeney, 442 U.S. at 279 n.25; Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 335 n.15, 339 & n.20.

The application of "pattern or practice" theory applies equally to single and multi-facility cases. See, e.g., Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 328, 329 n.2 (challenging "nationwide operations" at 51 terminals in 26 states); Bazemore v. Friday, 478 U.S. 385, 389, 405-06 & n.17 (1986); Caridad v. Metro-North Commuter R.R., 191 F.3d 283, 291-92 (2d Cir. 1999) (certifying class of all African Americans employed throughout commuter railroad), disagreed with on other grounds by In re Initial Pub. Offerings, 471 F.3d at 39-42; Staton, 327 F.3d at 956; see also Califano, 442 U.S. at 702.

Wal-Mart relies on Hohider v. UPS, Inc., 574 F.3d 169, 184 (3d Cir. 2009), which expressly distinguished requirements for proof of liability in an ADA case, at issue there, from pattern-or-practice cases under Title VII. Id. at 184-85.

2. Mixed Motive Defense Does Not Apply to Plaintiffs' Claims

Wal-Mart argues that 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g)(2)(A), added to Title VII by the Civil Rights Act of 1991 to address "mixed motive" claims, guarantees it the right to present a "mixed motive" defense to each class member's claim. Wal-Mart makes this claim even though plaintiffs in this case have never alleged a mixed motive claim, and Wal-Mart never pled an affirmative defense to one. J.A. 47a-80a, 100a-103a.

Title VII provides distinct methods of proving discrimination: plaintiffs may establish intentional discrimination either by proof of disparate treatment or by the "mixed motive" provisions of Title VII. Compare 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(a) with § 2000e-2(m). Plaintiffs may also avail themselves of the disparate impact theory to prove a violation of Title VII. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(k).

The text of the mixed motive provisions make clear that it is an alternative theory of liability. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(m) ("Except as otherwise provided in this subchapter, an unlawful employment practice is established. . . . "). See Desert Palace, 539 U.S. at 94 ("The first [provision] establishes an alternative for proving that an 'unlawful employment practice' has occurred") (citation omitted). Its companion provision, section 2000e-5(g)(2)(B), permits an employer to limit remedies if it proves that it would have taken the same action in the absence of the impermissible factor, but only "[o]n a claim in which an individual proves a violation under section 2000e-2(m) of this title. . . ."

A mixed motive defense may not be used to rebut a single motive disparate treatment claim. Fogg v. Gonzales, 492 F.3d 447, 453-54 (D.C. Cir. 2007). As this Court observed last Term, Title VII's methods of proof are not "coextensive." Lewis, 130 S. Ct. at 2199 (defense to disparate treatment claim inapplicable to disparate impact claim). Thus, where plaintiffs have not elected to use the "mixed motive" method of proof, Wal-Mart may not defend on this basis. Finally, Wal-Mart's mixed motive argument has no application to plaintiffs' disparate impact claim, which requires no proof of intent.

3. Individual Stage II Trials Are Not Required

Wal-Mart claims the right to individual class member trials, citing language from Teamsters, in which this Court articulated the standards for bifurcated litigation of Title VII pattern-or-practice cases. Pet. Br. 41-42. Teamsters noted that, after a liability determination, "additional proceedings" will "usually" be conducted. Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 361. No court has read this language to require individualized hearings in every case. Instead, Teamsters vested trial courts with broad discretion to "fashion such relief as the particular circumstances of a case may require to effect restitution." Id. at 364 (quoting Franks v. Bowman Transp. Co., 424 U.S. 747, 764 (1976)).

Where the defendant's practices make it impossible to recreate the employment decisions that would have been made absent discrimination, individual Stage II remedies hearings may be inappropriate, as the circuits have unanimously held. See McClain, 519 F.3d at 280-81; Pitre v. W. Elec. Co., 843 F.2d 1262, 1274-75 (10th Cir. 1988); Segar, 738 F.2d at 1289-91;

Domingo v. New England Fish Co., 727 F.2d 1429, 1444-45 (9th Cir. 1984); Pettway v. Am. Cast Iron Pipe Co., 681 F.2d 1259, 1266 (11th Cir. 1982); Hameed v. Int'l Ass'n of Bridge, Structural & Ornamental Iron Workers Local Union No. 396, 637 F.2d 506, 520-21 (8th Cir. 1980); Stewart v. GM Corp., 542 F.2d 445, 452-53 (7th Cir. 1976). Teamsters does not require individual class member hearings if they would lead to a "quagmire of hypothetical judgments." Pettway v. Am. Cast Iron Pipe, Co., 494 F.2d 211, 260 (5th Cir. 1974). Where, as here, the employer's system has been infected with subjective decision-making and lacks records to document the employment decisions at issue, courts have concluded that allocating relief based upon economic models that replicate the decisions at issue "has more basis in reality . . . than an individual-by-individual approach." Id. at 263.

Here, the district court made findings to support the need for a classwide approach. App. 256a, 270a-276a. "Wal-Mart's database contains the critical information necessary to perform such an analysis for each employee individually, including job history, seniority, job review ratings, weeks worked, full-time versus part-time status, regular-time versus overtime, and store location." App. 271a-272a. While it determined that there was "no need to assess individual interest levels with respect to equal pay," the district court limited promotion back pay claims because of the absence of data demonstrating individual class member interest in promotion. App. 269a, 271a.

Moreover, Wal-Mart's claim that individual hearings would somehow produce a more reliable result does not withstand scrutiny. Wal-Mart has maintained no contemporaneous records of the reasons for the tens of thousands of pay or promotion decisions at issue here. Many of the decisions were made more than ten years ago by managers who, at any one time, had hundreds or thousands of employees under their supervision. If individual hearings mean that Wal-Mart will offer little more than post hoc rationales for decisions it chose not to document, the district court was within its discretion not to require them. 3 Alba Conte & Herbert B. Newberg, Newberg on Class Actions § 10:2 (4th ed. 2002). ("[A]ggregate evidence of the defendant's liability is more accurate and precise than would be so with individual proofs of loss.").

4. There Is No Due Process Right to Defend Claims Individually

Finally, Wal-Mart invokes the Due Process Clause to assert a constitutional right to "present every available defense," which the company interprets here as the "right" to defend any class action individual-by-individual. Pet. Br. 43. The cases from which it derives this sweeping (and heretofore unrecognized) constitutional right – one which would foreclose the use of class actions entirely – do not support the claim. Lindsey v. Normet, 405 U.S. 56, 64 (1972) (state statute requiring trial within six days in landlord-tenant actions does not violate Due Process Clause); United States v. Armour & Co., 402 U.S. 673, 681-82 (1971) ("the scope of a consent decree must be discerned within its four corners").

This Court has never recognized a constitutional right to present one's defense using particular forms and methods of proof. Such case management decisions lie within the discretion of the trial courts, subject to appellate review after final judgment. See, e.g., Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(c)(2); Manual for Complex Litigation § 11.64 (4th ed. 2009). Likewise, Rule 23 explicitly empowers trial courts to "determine the course of proceedings or prescribe measures to prevent undue repetition or complication in presenting evidence or argument." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(d)(1).

II. CLAIMS FOR MONETARY RELIEF MAY BE CERTIFIED UNDER RULE 23(b)(2)

A. Rule 23(b)(2) Does Not Limit Certification to Cases Seeking Exclusively Injunctive or Corresponding Declaratory Relief

Wal-Mart argues that a case may be certified under Rule 23(b)(2) only if it seeks exclusively injunctive and declaratory relief. This novel reading of Rule 23 is unsupported by the language of the Rule, the Advisory Committee Notes and more than 45 years of case law interpreting the Rule and Title VII.

The text of Rule 23 provides in relevant part:

> A class action may be maintained if Rule 23(a) is satisfied and if . . . (2) the party opposing the class has acted or refused to act on grounds that apply generally to the class, so that final injunctive or corresponding declaratory relief is appropriate respecting the class as a whole.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23.

By its terms, whether a class may be certified under Rule 23(b)(2) depends on the nature of the defendant's conduct and whether that conduct may be addressed through injunctive or declaratory relief for the class.

The text does not limit Rule 23(b)(2) actions to cases which seek only injunctive or declaratory relief. Indeed, nothing in the text of the Rule places any limit on relief available in a (b)(2) class action. Rather, "the language describes the type of conduct by the party opposing the class which is subject to equitable relief by class action under (b)(2)." Wetzel v. Liberty Mutual Ins. Co., 508 F.2d 239, 251 (3d Cir. 1975). The term "making appropriate final injunctive relief" is thus a description of the conduct that justifies a 23(b)(2) class, not the relief that is available:

> This is not to be read as saying "thereby making appropriate only final injunctive relief. . . ." All that need be determined is that conduct of the party opposing the class is > such as makes such equitable relief appropriate.

Pettway, 494 F.2d at 256-57 (emphasis added); accord Allison v. Citgo Petroleum Corp., 151 F.3d 402, 415 (5th Cir. 1998) ("Rule 23(b)(2), by its own terms, does not preclude all claims for monetary relief.").

Nor may such limitation be read into the Rule. Rule 23 "creates a categorical rule entitling a plaintiff whose suit meets the specified criteria to pursue his claim as a class action." Shady Grove, 130 S. Ct. at 1437. "[T]he rule as now composed sets the requirements [courts] are bound to enforce. . . . Courts are not free to amend a rule outside the process Congress ordered. . . ." Amchem, 521 U.S. at 620.

The Advisory Committee Notes, to which this Court often refers in interpreting the Rules, Amchem, 521 U.S. at 615-17; Eisen, 417 U.S. at 173-74, confirm this interpretation of Rule 23. The Notes provide that Rule 23(b)(2) "does not extend to cases in which the appropriate final relief relates exclusively or predominantly to money damages." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2) Advisory Committee's Note (1966) (emphasis added). The Committee plainly anticipated final relief in a Rule 23(b)(2) action could include money damages, in addition to injunctive or declaratory relief. This language quite consciously reflects the distinction that the modern Rule drew between Rule 23(b)(2) cases, where money damages will not predominate, and Rule 23(b)(3) where damages may predominate. For the latter, the Rule imposes additional safeguards to ensure the interests of the class are adequately protected.

Notwithstanding the unmistakably clear meaning of the Advisory Committee Notes, Wal-Mart would infer a contrary – and unspoken – intention to reserve Rule 23(b)(2) for exclusively injunctive relief claims from a list of pre-1966 cases cited in the Notes in which only non-monetary relief was sought. The Notes explain, however, that the list is intended to be "illustrative" of actions "in the civil rights field where a party is charged with discriminating unlawfully against a class" – in other words, where defendant "has acted or refused to act on grounds that apply generally to the class." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2) Advisory Committee's Note (1966).

That the Advisory Committee list of cases did not include Title VII or other types of civil rights actions that authorized monetary relief is explained, not by an intention to exclude such claims, but by the timing of the Rules amendment process. The draft of the Committee Notes for the modern Rule 23 was completed and published in March 1964. Preliminary Draft of Proposed Amendments to Rules of Civil Procedure for the United States District Court, 34 F.R.D. 325 (March 1964). It was not until July 2, 1964, that Congress passed the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which provided comprehensive civil rights protections in employment, public accommodations, housing and education. Pub. L. No. 88-352, 78 Stat. 241 (1964). The Notes, thus, cannot be read to implicitly limit the types of civil rights cases nor the types of relief that may be sought under Rule 23(b)(2).

Wal-Mart also relies on Ortiz v. Fibreboard, 527 U.S. 815, 842 (1999), to argue that Rule 23(b)(2) must be limited to its "historical antecedents." Ortiz did not address – nor even mention – the proper scope of Rule 23(b)(2).

The Advisory Committee plainly did not intend to limit the new provision to its "historical antecedents." It sought to facilitate civil rights cases. Amchem, 521 U.S. at 614 (Rule 23(b)(2) "build[s] on experience mainly, but not exclusively, in the civil rights field") (quoting Benjamin Kaplan, Continuing Work of the Civil Rules Committee, 81 Harv. L. Rev. 356, 389 (1967)); In re Monumental Life Insurance Co., 365 F.3d 408, 417 n.16 (5th Cir. 2004) (quoting 7A Charles A. Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 1775 (2d ed. 1986)). As Professor Kaplan explained, the new (b)(2) provision was intended to avoid the inefficiency of individual suits where the conduct was directed at a group: "individual lawsuits . . . would nevertheless be inadequate and inefficient [because] . . . the party opposing a class had acted on grounds apparently applying to the whole group." 81 Harv. L. Rev. at 389.

Wal-Mart argues in the alternative that, if any form of monetary relief is permitted under Rule 23(b)(2), the Court must find Rule 23(b)(2) unconstitutional. Pet. Br. 47. It rests this claim on two assertions: that the Due Process Clause requires notice and opt-out rights for any class action in which any amount or form of monetary relief is sought, and that Rule 23(b)(2) prohibits notice and opt-out to class members. Neither Rule 23 nor this Court's Due Process jurisprudence supports these sweeping conclusions.

This Court has never held that the Due Process Clause mandates opt-out rights whenever any kind of monetary relief is sought in a class action. "It has been said so often by this Court and others as not to require citation of authority that due process is flexible and calls for such procedural protections as the particular situation demands." Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 481 (1972); see Wilkinson v. Austin, 545 U.S. 209, 224 (2005) ("we generally have declined to establish rigid rules"). The requirements of Rule 23(a) and (b)(2) afford class members important due process protections. The Rule 23(b)(2) requirement that the district court determine whether injunctive relief predominates over monetary relief, which tests the cohesiveness of the class interests, "serves essentially the same functions as the procedural safeguards . . . mandated in (b)(3) class actions." Allison, 151 F.3d at 414-15. In addition, class members' rights are protected by the determination that both the named plaintiffs and their counsel will adequately represent the interests of the class. Kincade v. Gen. Tire & Rubber Co., 635 F.2d 501, 507 (5th Cir. 1981) (no due process right to opt out of a 23(b)(2) class settlement); Wetzel, 508 F.2d at 257 (declining "to hold that due process ineluctably requires notice in all (b)(2) class actions").

This Court's decision dismissing certiorari as improvidently granted in Ticor Title Insurance Co. v. Brown, 511 U.S. 117 (1994), did not address – much less decide – whether due process may be satisfied through other safeguards built into Rule 23(b)(2) where claims for back pay accompany proper claims for injunctive relief. App. 96a n.44. Shutts did not address these questions either. Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797 (1985). The Court limited its holding in Shutts to "claims wholly or predominately for money judgments" and mandated protections for state court class actions equivalent to those provided by Rule 23(b)(3) for damages cases. Id. at 812 n.3. It expressed "no view concerning other types of class actions, such as those seeking equitable relief." Id. No court has ever held that notice and opt out rights are always required when any monetary relief is sought.

In any event, Rule 23 empowers a district court to take steps to protect a class in (b)(2) or other class cases. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(d)(1) confers broad discretion on the district court to issue orders "to protect class members and fairly conduct the action," which include notice of "members' opportunity to signify whether they consider the representation fair and adequate, to intervene and present claims and defenses, or to otherwise come into the action." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(d)(1)(B). This subsection is, thus, part of the protections "designed to fulfill requirements of due process to which the class action procedure is of course subject." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(d)(2) Advisory Committee's Notes (1966).

The 2003 amendments to Rule 23(c)(2) confirmed a court's authority to order notice in Rule 23(b)(1) and (b)(2) actions. The Notes explain that the amendment did not confer new authority but instead "call[s] attention to the court's authority – already established in part by Rule 23(d)(2) – to direct notice of certification to a Rule 23(b)(1) or (b)(2) class." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 Advisory Committee's Note (2003). Several circuits, and the district court below, have found that the language of Rule 23 permits, but does not require, notice and opt-out rights in (b)(2) actions. See, e.g., Eubanks v. Billington, 110 F.3d 87, 94-95 (D.C. Cir. 1997) ("we join those circuits holding that the language of Rule 23 is sufficiently flexible to afford district courts discretion to grant opt-out rights in (b)(1) and (b)(2) class actions."); In re Monumental Life, 365 F.3d at 417; Robinson v. Metro-North Commuter R.R. Co., 267 F.3d 147, 165-66 (2d Cir. 2001).

B. The Back Pay Remedy in Title VII Class Actions Is Consistent with Certification Under Rule 23(b)(2)

Although Wal-Mart did not dispute in the district court that "claims for . . . lost pay readily fall within the ambit of a (b)(2) class action," App. 236a, it now challenges the inclusion of back pay claims in any Rule 23(b)(2) class. Pet. Br. 53-55. Both the district court and the Ninth Circuit concluded that plaintiffs' back pay claims were properly certified under Rule 23(b)(2). App. 90a-94a, 269a, 276a.

The circuits unanimously concur that back pay relief may be sought in a Rule 23(b)(2) action. See Reeb v. Ohio Dep't of Rehab. & Corr., 435 F.3d 639, 650 (6th Cir. 2006); Cooper v. S. Co., 390 F.3d 695, 720 (11th Cir. 2004), overrruled on other grounds by Ash v. Tyson Foods Inc., 546 U.S. 454, 457 (2006) (per curiam); Robinson, 267 F.3d at 169-170; Jefferson v. Ingersoll Int'l Inc., 195 F.3d 894, 896 (7th Cir. 1999); Allison, 151 F.3d at 415-16; Kirby v. Colony Furniture Co., 613 F.2d 696, 699-700 (8th Cir. 1980); Rich v. Martin Marietta Corp., 522 F.2d 333, 342 (10th Cir. 1975); Pettway, 494 F.2d at 257-258; Robinson v. Lorillard Corp., 444 F.2d 791, 802 (4th Cir. 1971). This is true even for courts that have adopted the so-called "incidental damages" test for (b)(2) certification. See, e.g., Allison, 151 F.3d at 415-16.

The equitable nature of the Title VII back pay remedy and its close relationship with injunctive relief means that such a remedy is generally available in (b)(2) actions. The purpose of Title VII is to "achieve equality of employment opportunities and remove barriers that have operated in the past to favor an identifiable group." Albemarle Paper Co. v. Moody, 422 U.S. 405, 417 (1975) (quoting Griggs, 401 U.S. at 429-30). As this Court has noted, back pay "has an obvious connection" to that purpose:

> If employers faced only the prospect of an injunctive order, they would have little > incentive to shun practices of dubious legality. It is the reasonably certain prospect of a backpay award that "provide(s) the spur or catalyst which causes employers . . . to endeavor to eliminate [discriminatory practices]."

Albemarle, 422 U.S. at 417-18 (citation omitted). Back pay is an integral component of Title VII's "make whole" remedial scheme. Id. at 419-21.

Title VII back pay awards are not "money damages," which the Advisory Committee Notes address. Wetzel, 508 F.2d 239, 250-51 n.21. Back pay is an equitable remedy under Title VII, rather than a form of compensatory damages, and is awarded by the court. 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g); Albemarle, 422 U.S. at 416-17, 421; Allison, 151 F.3d at 423 n.19. When Congress amended Title VII in 1991 to add compensatory and punitive damage remedies, it left intact the equitable nature of back pay, explicitly excluding back pay from the definition of compensatory damages. See 42 U.S.C. § 1981a(b)(2) ("Compensatory damages awarded under this section shall not include backpay, interest on backpay, or any other type of relief authorized under [42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g)]."); Kolstad v. Am. Dental Ass'n, 527 U.S. 526, 527 (1999) (citing "the 1991 Act's distinction between equitable and compensatory relief"); see also United States v. Burke, 504 U.S. 229, 238-39 (1992), superseded by statute on other grounds, Pub. L. No. 104-188, § 1605 (1996), 26 U.S.C. § 104 (concluding that a Title VII back pay award was not excludable from income for tax purposes since it did not compensate for personal injuries).

The discretion to deny back pay is extremely limited and justified only, in the rare instance, where an award would "frustrate the central statutory purposes" of Title VII. Albemarle, 422 U.S. at 405. Wal-Mart claims back pay is "nothing more than monetary compensation for past harm." Pet. Br. 53; see Great-West Life & Annuity Ins. Co v. Knudson, 534 U.S. 204, 218 (2002). While the ERISA claim in Great Western may be so described, this Court distinguished Title VII back pay as "an integral part of an equitable remedy." Id. at 218 n.4 (citation omitted).

Moreover, like injunctive relief claims, back pay claims are "rooted in grounds applicable to . . . the class." Allison, 151 F.3d at 415-16 (quoting Pettway, 494 F.2d at 257). Both injunctive relief and class entitlement to back pay derive from defendant's conduct that applies "generally to the class." Such conduct forms the basis for a liability determination that settles "the legality of the behavior with respect to the class as a whole." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2) Advisory Committee's Note (1966). This liability determination is the predicate both for class injunctive relief and an award of back pay to the class, establishing for each class member a presumptive right to back pay. Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 361-62.

Finally, unlike damage claims, back pay proceedings under Title VII are tried to the court, not a jury, and do not turn on highly individualized factors such as causation or the subjectivity inherent in claims for emotional harm. Allison, 151 F.3d at 416-17. Back pay awards typically involve "less complicated factual determinations," Reeb, 435 F.3d at 650, and may be calculated for the class based upon objective information found in the employer's payroll records. This is particularly true for the equal pay claims here, where there is no need to assess individual interest levels, and where objective computerized data "is readily available." App. 271a.

Wal-Mart contends that back pay is highly individualized and may be awarded only through individual hearings. Pet. Br. 55. As noted above, individual hearings are not required in all pattern or practice cases. Moreover, even where Stage II hearings are required, Rule 23(b)(2) certification remains appropriate because of the equitable nature of back pay, and the common interest of class members in obtaining back pay that follows a pattern or practice liability finding. To hold otherwise would undermine this Court's determination that the Teamsters' pattern or practice method of proof is fully compatible with a Rule 23 class action. Cooper, 467 U.S. at 876 n.9 ("it is plain that the elements of a prima facie pattern-or-practice case are the same in a private class action.").

Wal-Mart projects potentially "billions of dollars of back pay claims" which it argues, makes this case categorically ineligible for back pay relief. Pet. Br. 55. Wal-Mart's simplistic calculus of the total potential back pay ignores the value of the corresponding injunctive claims in this case. Here, a potentially large back pay award for the class as a whole simply reflects the size of the class and thus results from the same facts that convinced the district court that injunctive relief claims had a broad scope. App. 89a, 238a-239a. Wal-Mart's approach would simply insulate defendants from (b)(2) classes whenever the class is large, no matter how significant the corresponding injunctive relief, a position that finds no support in either Rule 23 or Title VII. Wal-Mart would foreclose the use of 23(b)(2) in precisely the circumstances that the class action can provide the greatest efficiencies for redressing the effects of pervasive workplace discrimination. Cf. Carnegie v. Household Fin., 376 F.3d 656, 660-61 (7th Cir. 2004) (Posner, J.).

Significantly, individual class claims for back pay in this case are likely to be relatively small, amounting to an average of $1,100 per year for hourly workers. J.A. 475a. Prosecution of such claims individually would be largely impracticable, and thus would not implicate the preference for individual litigation that may arise where damages predominate. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) Advisory Committee's Note (1966); App. 89a. In contrast, the injunctive claims are substantial and would lead to "very significant long-term relief" for the class. App. 239a.

C. Former Employees Are Properly Included in a Rule 23(b)(2) Class

Wal-Mart asserts that back pay must predominate over injunctive relief because class members who leave Wal-Mart at any time prior to judgment lack standing to seek injunctive relief. Pet. Br. 52. Wal-Mart thus reduces the Rule 23(b)(2) "predominance" determination to tallies of class members with an interest in injunctive relief, and those allegedly without, a calculation that would have to be performed continuously throughout the litigation, as current workers leave and new workers are hired.

Wal-Mart confuses two very different issues – standing of individual class members and the criteria for (b)(2) certification.[2] Under this Court's precedents, plaintiffs and the class they represent have standing to seek injunctive relief. Two named plaintiffs are still Wal-Mart employees as are a substantial number of class members, and thus they unquestionably have standing to seek injunctive relief on behalf of themselves and the class. See United States Parole Comm'n v. Geraghty, 445 U.S. 388, 403 (1980); Franks v. Bowman Transp. Co., 424 U.S. 747, 755-56 (1976).

Rule 23(b)(2) focuses on a defendant's conduct that gives cohesion to the class. This cohesion is not lost if injunctive relief subsequently becomes unavailable for some or even all class members. "The conduct of the employer is still answerable 'on grounds generally applicable to the class.'" Wetzel, 508 F.2d at 251.

[2] The Ninth Circuit's more limited holding, excluding employees who left employment prior to the filing of the action, also conflated class member standing with the Rule 23(b)(2) inquiry. App. 100a-102a.

Where a group of victims challenge the same discriminatory employment practice, Rule 23 provides an efficient and economical means of adjudicating these claims. See Crown, Cork & Seal Co., Inc. v. Parker, 462 U.S. 345, 349 (1983) (recognizing "the principal purposes of the class action procedure" are the "promotion of efficiency and economy of litigation"). Treating current and former employees as members of the same class serves this goal because a pattern or practice liability finding establishes the common predicate for injunctive and monetary relief. Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 361-62.

Wal-Mart's formulation once again relies on an incomplete calculus for assessing whether monetary claims predominate. First, it assumes that back pay claims of former employees undermine 23(b)(2) status, a view at odds with the role of back pay in Title VII. See supra at 55-60. Moreover, predominance cannot be determined solely by a head count of former and current employees, because injunctive relief will benefit not only class members who are current employees, but also "all future female employees as well." App. 239a. Former employees could also benefit from an injunction, since they may seek employment with Wal-Mart in the future once discriminatory conditions are eliminated. Wetzel, 508 F.2d at 253 (former employees "may desire to renew their employment . . . if the discriminatory practices are terminated."); see Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244, 262 (2003) (applicant denied admission to university who expressed a desire to reapply may challenge admission practices).

It is inevitable that the class of victims affected by an allegedly discriminatory workplace practice will include both current and former employees. This is, of course, because employee turnover is common, especially in the retail industry. Pet. Br. 52. One would expect turnover to be even higher in a workplace where discrimination is prevalent. Wal-Mart's approach would encourage employers to prolong the EEOC process and subsequent litigation, so that normal turnover may do its work to undermine any potential 23(b)(2) class. Even ordinary non-class litigation is lengthy:

> Delays in litigation unfortunately are now commonplace. . . . In a better world, perhaps, lawsuits brought under Title VII would speed to judgment so quickly that the effects of legal rules on the behavior of the parties during the pendency of the litigation would not be as important a consideration. We do not now live in such a world. . . .

Ford Motor Co. v. EEOC, 458 U.S. 219, 228 (1982). The delays in this case, filed nearly 10 years ago, are by no means unique. See, e.g., Lewis, 130 S. Ct. at 2196 (complaint filed in 1998).

Wal-Mart's misconception also creates a "perverse incentive" for employers to fire employees who might initiate – or simply be a member of – a Title VII class action. See Robinson v. Shell Oil Co., 519 U.S. 337, 346 (1997) (concluding that similar concerns support protection of former as well as current employees under Title VII's anti-retaliation provision); Wetzel, 508 F.2d at 247 (if former employee could not be a class representative for current employees, "employers would be encouraged to discharge those employees suspected as most likely to initiate a Title VII suit").

D. Punitive Damages May Be Certified Under Rule 23(b)(2) in Some Cases

This case does not now present the question whether class punitive damages may be certified under Rule 23(b)(2). The Ninth Circuit vacated and remanded the district court's certification of the claim of punitive damages, directing the court to consider a variety of factors in order to determine whether punitive damages may be awarded to a class certified under Rule 23(b)(2) or (b)(3). Respondents briefly address Wal-Mart's contentions although the Court need not address this issue.

Wal-Mart argues that punitive damages will always predominate. Pet. Br. 55 (citing Allison, 151 F.3d at 418). Its categorical approach finds no support in the text of Rule 23(b)(2) and cannot be reconciled with the Advisory Committee's explanation that (b)(2) certification is appropriate unless relief sought is "exclusively or predominantly" monetary damages. See id. at 426 (Dennis, J., dissenting); App. 87a.

Wal-Mart asserts that punitive damages must be assessed on an individual basis, even in a class case. Pet. Br. 56. The availability of punitive damages in a class case that challenges company-wide policies and practices turns on facts that are common to the class. Here, class members have a cohesive interest in ensuring that a punitive damage award will punish and deter defendant's conduct consistent with Rule 23(b)(2). See Allison, 151 F.3d at 417 (punitive damages might be certified under (b)(2) under some circumstances). Punitive damages in a Title VII case are not compensatory, but focus on the defendant's state of mind. Kolstad, 527 U.S. at 538; see Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc., 532 U.S. 424, 432 (2001). The defense to a punitive damage claim in a corporate setting does not turn on the acts of lower level subordinates, but on the employer's "good-faith efforts to comply with Title VII." Kolstad, 527 U.S. at 545-46.

Wal-Mart relies on the use of the term "aggrieved individual" in Title VII's punitive damage provision. 42 U.S.C. § 1981a(B)(1). Nothing in that provision or its legislative history suggests that punitive damages must be assessed on an individual basis. This Court has held that use of the term "individual" in a statute does not preclude class treatment of claims. Califano, 442 U.S. at 698-701.

Wal-Mart's reliance on State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408, 422 (2003), and Phillip Morris USA v. Williams, 549 U.S. 346, 353 (2007), is similarly misplaced. These cases both involved punitive damage awards in individual state personal injury cases, where the jury's award took into account similar harm inflicted on non-parties to the litigation. In contrast, in a class action like this, the injured parties are all before the court and the court can ensure that any award of punitive damages is based "solely on . . . conduct that was directed toward the class." App. 241a.

Wal-Mart assumes that Rule 23 certification is an all-or-nothing proposition: either the case must be certified under Rule 23(b)(2) in its entirety or, as it advocates, not at all. Rule 23 is not so inflexible. The text of Rule 23 and the Advisory Committee Notes set forth the appropriate framework for Rule 23; the application of the Rule is left to the "broad discretion" of the district court. Falcon, 457 U.S. at 160. Courts have certified for trial as to specific common issues, In re Nassau Strip Search Cases, 461 F.3d 219, 226 (2d Cir. 2006); Allen v. Int'l Truck & Engine Corp., 358 F.3d 469, 471-72 (7th Cir. 2004), or adopted a "hybrid" approach, certifying liability under Rule 23(b)(2) and damage claims under 23(b)(3). Jefferson, 195 F.3d at 898; see Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 Advisory Committee's Note (2003) (endorsing hybrid certification).

The district court is in the best position to evaluate the "pragmatic ramifications of adjudication in each situation," particularly in making a Rule 23 (b)(2) determination. Pettway, 494 F.2d at 256-57 (quoting 3B Moore's Federal Practice ¶ 23.45 at 703 (2d ed. 1969)). Here, the district court understood and fulfilled this pragmatic role. While recognizing "the importance of the courts in addressing the denial of equal treatment under the law wherever and by whomever it occurs," App. 166a, the district court conducted a thorough and rigorous Rule 23 inquiry, evaluating the evidence and arguments presented by each side. It determined to certify the class but limited the promotion claims and approved a right to opt out. App. 243a, 267a. The district court's order was a proper exercise of discretion.

CONCLUSION

This Court should affirm the certification of the class.

Attorneys for Plaintiffs

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BETTY DUKES, PATRICIA SURGESON, CLEO PAGE, CHRISTINE KWAPNOSKI, DEBORAH GUNTER, KAREN WILLIAMSON AND EDITH ARANA, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiff, vs. WAL-MART STORES, INC., Defendant	Case No. C-01-2252 MJJ DECLARATION OF DR. RICHARD DROGIN IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFFS' REPLY BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF CLASS CERTIFICATION (Filed Jul. 3, 2003) Date: July 25, 2003 Time: 10:00 a.m. Courtroom: 11

I, Dr. Richard Drogin declare:

I make this declaration of my own personal knowledge and could testify thereto if called as a witness.

A. INTRODUCTION

1. I have been retained by Plaintiffs' counsel to analyze statistical questions raised in the Dukes v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. litigation. The purpose of my study was to obtain descriptive summaries of computer data, and prepare various statistical analyses relevant to the issues in the case. I have previously submitted a report in this litigation, dated February 3, 2003. Subsequently, defendant's expert Dr. Joan Haworth submitted a report dated April 1, 2003 giving her opinion and results regarding her review of my February 3 report. On April 18, 2003 she provided an amended report and revised analyses. Then, on April 21, 2003, at her deposition, she provided additional backup materials for her revised analyses. I attended that deposition. Subsequently, she filed a declaration in Opposition to Class Certification. The declaration below gives my rebuttal to Dr. Haworth's report and deposition testimony. Except for the addition of citations to Dr. Haworth's declaration in Opposition to Class Certification, the attachment of cited documents, and the correction of typos, this declaration is identical to the rebuttal report I wrote dated May 6, 2003.

2. Dr. Haworth's report covers several issues regarding plaintiff's expert reports. My rebuttal will address those areas where she has presented her opinions regarding issues covered in my February 3 report. In this declaration I will explain the flaws in her conclusions regarding the promotion process and compensation system at Wal-Mart. Unless otherwise noted, all references given below to her report will refer to the original report dated April 1, 2003 and corresponding references in her Declaration. She has testified at her deposition that there are no substantive differences between her April 1, 2003 report and the revised report of April 18, 2003. Her declaration adds additional analyses and material, which I have not analyzed. Some of the tables in her Declaration also cover a shorter time frame than those utilized in her report, and thus the numbers do not always correspond to those in her report. My rebuttal report, and this declaration, do not address these changed numbers.

B. SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

3. Dr. Haworth's analysis and conclusions are defective because she:

a. Relies on incomplete and "nearly useless" job posting data in her analysis of promotions to hourly jobs;

b. Fails to note that job posting selections contribute to gender segregation by department;

c. Fails to note that the average percentage of women in the appropriate pool of most qualified applicants determined from the MIT program is nearly identical to the average percentage of women in the availability pool I used in my promotion analysis presented in my February 2003 report, thus corroborating my earlier analysis of promotions into MIT;

d. Relies on Management Career Selection data that is incomplete and biased, thereby ignoring all promotions to salaried jobs except Store Manager;

e. Inappropriately disaggregates hourly employees into 7500 separate subunits to perform her regression analysis of hourly pay rates because she:

- Ignores documented company policy for setting pay rates in her decision to analyze stores separately;
- Incorrectly applies statistical methodology in deciding to analyze stores separately;
- Arbitrarily subdivided stores further into smaller grocery/non-grocery and specialty subunits, which is unsupported by any written company policy;

f. Relies on a Store Manager Survey to justify her regression model, despite admitting that the survey methodology violates accepted scientific standards, and was conducted by defense counsel contrary to her recommendations;

g. Erroneously excludes from her hourly pay rate analyses persons who were Department Heads;

h. Arbitrarily and inexplicably excludes from her hourly pay rate regressions persons who were ever demoted and persons who ever had been salaried;

i. Includes tainted variables in her compensation regression analyses despite her testimony in other litigations stating that this should not be done;

j. Includes variables in her compensation regressions without justification or explanation;

k. Fails to report statistically significant aggregated results of her subunit regressions even though she has testified in other litigations that such aggregation is appropriate to determine if there is an overall disparity;

l. Fails to report compensation regressions for salaried employees other than Store Manager even though these are included in her backup materials.

C. PROMOTIONS

4. Dr. Haworth criticized my promotion analyses, and presented various analyses of her own derived from the Job Posting System, Management Training Posting, and Management Career Selection System. Each of these is addressed below.

Job Posting Data - Nearly Useless

5. Dr. Haworth presents a lengthy discussion of the job posting system at Wal-Mart and does several analyses concluding that "[w]hen all of the job postings for all the stores in all districts and all regions are all aggregated there are 3,266 more female job offers than expected in a gender-neutral process when controlling for department and job code."[1] Dr. Haworth's analysis and conclusion are misleading, and not probative, because the job posting data upon which she relies is incomplete and is not utilized systematically.

6. For example, for promotions into Support Manager, a job where it is possible to determine the completeness of the job posting data relative to actual promotions recorded in the PeopleSoft job history data, the job posting data includes posting and acceptances in only 20% of the total number of actual promotions found in the PeopleSoft data.[2] With such a large percent of vacancies filled outside the job posting system, and no policy or explanation regarding when the system was utilized or by-passed, no meaningful analysis of promotions can be conducted from this dataset.

[1] See middle of page 24 of her report; Declaration at 47:17-19.

[2] See Table 19, pages 28-29 of Drogin, February 2003 report. Lateral moves are not counted in the PeopleSoft promotions in this study.

7. Dr. Haworth relied on the job posting data, but made no attempt to evaluate or study the completeness of the job posting data.[3] At her deposition, when asked whether she had done any " ... analysis for any position in the job posting data versus Global PeopleSoft", she answered, "I don't recall doing such."[4] Further, when asked "So you don't know what proportion of positions that were filled in the Global PeopleSoft were filled by posting for any hourly job?" she answered " ... I do not know what proportion of the moves into support manager, whether demotions, promotions or laterals, were therefore covered by the posting."[5]

8. In fact, it can only be concluded that the job posting data is "nearly useless" according to Dr. Haworth's published statements in the Employee Relations Law Journal. Dr. Haworth's failure to note the high degree of incompleteness of the job posting data, the apparent lack of any system governing when the job posting was used, and her failure to present any study of these obvious problems directly contradict the first caveat she espoused in an article

[3] Dr. Haworth was aware there was or might be a problem with the job posting data, since she had read my report, which indicated the job posting data was incomplete, and also attended my deposition at which I described the problem.

co-authored with her husband published in the Employee Relations Law Journal:[6]

> "The information collected from applicants must be sufficient to allow a proper analysis of the selection process in a race- and gender-neutral environment. To this end, there are two general caveats. First, information that is collected but never verified or checked for accuracy is nearly useless."

Job Posting Selections Contribute to Gender Segregation by Department

9. Ignoring the defects with job posting data described above, Dr. Haworth fails to note, or present any explanation of, obvious gender segregation patterns indicated by her job posting promotion analysis. For example, her analysis shows that female bidders for Department Head jobs receive significantly more promotions in the departments with the highest percent female than would be expected based on their application rate, and significantly fewer promotions in departments with highest percent men. Tables 1a and 1b below list the ten departments with the

10. Tables 1a and 1b show that women received 728.6 more offers for Department Head jobs in highly female departments than expected, and 170 fewer offers than expected in highly male departments, based on their percent among applicants. These disparities are statistically significant: For the over-promotion of women into Department Head in highly female departments with Z-value of 19.41, there is only 1 chance in 10 to the 70th power that a disparity this large would occur under random selection. For the under-promotion of women into Department Head in departments with the lowest percent female the Z-value of -3.18 indicates there is less than 1 chance in 700 that a disparity this large would occur under random selection.[9] For both of these analyses, the expected number is based on the percent of women among applicants who applied for the positions, as determined from the job posting data. Thus, Dr. Haworth's job posting analysis demonstrates that gender segregation by department is perpetuated, in part, through the job posting system.

2003 Assistant Manager Training Program Corroborates Plaintiff's Analysis

11. Prior to January 2003 Wal-Mart had no system for hourly employees to express interest or apply for any entry level salary management positions. In January 2003 Wal-Mart introduced for the first time a system for accepting applications for their new Assistant Manager Trainee Program (also referred to as the Management-In-Training Program, or, simply, MIT Program). During a one week period Wal-Mart received about 30,000 applications through

---

[9] Dr. Haworth's table on page 22 of her report shows that women received 62.6 fewer promotions into Department Head jobs in the Home Furnishing Department, resulting in a Z-value for this disparity of -3.35. The Home Furnishing Department had only 23% women among its employees at year-end 2001, but was not included in Table lb above, because the number of employees in this department was below the 5000 level that I used for selecting departments. If Home Furnishings had been included in Table lb, then the disparity, and pattern of under-promotion of women in predominately male departments would be more pronounced. Her declaration uses similar, although somewhat changed numbers, reflecting a shorter time frame. Declaration at 43-44.

this system, and about 1400 selections were made during March.

12. Dr. Haworth presents an analysis of the data from this MIT Program, and reports that "The percentage of females who voluntarily expressed interest in 2003 in promotion to management levels (44%) is similar to the 41% women were among those who were promoted in the Assistant Manager Trainee positions in the five years prior to the inception of this program."[9] Her statement ("44% is similar to 41%") suggests that the 2003 MIT program indicates the selection of female hourly employees to positions as MIT during 1998-2002 was consistent with their interest and qualifications for such positions.[10] In fact, the MIT data she presents shows the exact opposite, and corroborates the analysis of promotions into MIT positions that I presented in my report.

13. Assume, as Dr. Haworth does, that the January 2003 MIT program was fair and unbiased with respect to gender[11]. Under this assumption, the

[9] Page 25 of Haworth report. Declaration at 51:7-10.

[10] She also suggests the bid rate for Support Manager positions in the job posting data is consistent with the actual promotions into MIT positions, on page 25 of her report. However, in her deposition testimony, page 116, lines 6-10, she admitted that this comparison is not meaningful. Her Declaration does not include this suggestion.

data from the MIT program might be used to obtain the correct unbiased percentage of women among the most qualified hourly employees who want to enter salary management positions. Dr. Haworth incorrectly suggests the fair availability percentage would be 44%, i.e. the percentage of women among all those applying in the MIT program. However, the correct percentage of females among the "true, unbiased" availability pool would be those interested and available, and also most qualified. There may be many men and women who submitted applications in the 2003 MIT program who expressed interest in promotion, but for some reason are not among the most qualified. The group of people who are interested, available, and most qualified would be determined by the percentage of females among those actually selected from the process, since presumably (as Dr. Haworth believes[12]) Wal-Mart has selected the best, most qualified applicants. The percentage of women selected in the MIT program was 59.8%. Thus, based on Dr. Haworth's assumptions, the most accurate availability figure of women who are interested in MIT positions among those most qualified would be 59.8%.

14. In my February 2003 report I presented an analysis of promotions into MIT positions during available", and she had "no information" that affirmative action was being used to select women.

1997-2002. I determined the percentage women in the pool of those available for promotion to be 59.6%, as shown in Table 23 of my report. My determination of this percentage was based on the percent of women in the historical feeder pools for the MIT positions.[13] The 59.6% availability figure I derived in my promotion analysis is nearly identical to the 59.8% availability figure derived from the January 2003 MIT Program selections, as described in the previous paragraph. Based upon my analysis, I found that there was a shortfall of about 3000 females promoted to MIT positions during 1997-2002. Since the 59.8% and 59.6% availability figures are so close, the results of the recent 2003 MIT Program corroborates the female availability for promotions into MIT positions I used to compute this shortfall in female promotions to MIT positions.

15. Moreover, Dr. Haworth has reported that 40.8%[14] of applicants for MIT positions from Sam's Club employees were women, while only 31.4%[15] of those promoted to MIT positions at Sam's during 1996 through first quarter 2002 were women. At her deposition, she was asked if the MIT bid rate of 40.8%

[13] In my report, and at my deposition I explained that insufficient information was available at that time to evaluate the fairness of the January 2003 MIT postings.

[14] Page 30 of Dr. Haworth's redlined report. Declaration at 53:21

was compared to the selections during the period 1996-2002, whether the disparity would be statistically significant.[16] She first answered "I don't know"[17]. When asked again, she said "I don't know, but one would calculate it."[18] Finally, when asked a third time she answered "If you aggregated them all, I think they would be more than two standard deviations."[19] Thus, according to Dr. Haworth's own deposition testimony, there is a statistically significant female shortfall in actual promotions to MIT positions during 1996-2002 at Sam's Club, compared to female availability based on applicants for the MIT program from Sam's in January 2003.

Management Career Selection Incomplete

16. The MCS system is used by Wal-Mart to fill some openings in salary management jobs. Dr. Haworth concludes from her analysis of MCS data that there are no statistically significant selection decisions adverse to women across all the postings for each salaried job. This conclusion is misleading, because the MCS system cannot be considered as an unbiased, fair bidding system as described below, and covers only a small number of salary store management decisions.

[16] Haworth deposition, page 151 lines 7-11.

17. The MCS system is rarely used to fill management positions below Store Manager. As Dr. Haworth reports (page 35 of her report, Declaration at 66:4-6), the MCS system was used to fill only 2% of Co-Manager positions, and less than 1% of Assistant Manager Positions. At her deposition, Dr. Haworth testified[20] that she could not say whether or not the small number promotions into Co-Manager or Assistant Manager positions found in the MCS data were a representative sample from those interested in these positions. Accordingly, no meaningful analysis of promotions into Co-Manager or Assistant Manager can rely on the MCS system. The only store a salary management position for which the MCS system appears to have been used on any kind of regular basis is the Store Manager job.

18. The MCS appears to be used most of the time for filling Store Manager openings, but still the number of moves found in the MCS is about 400 fewer than the number found in the PeopleSoft data, according to Dr. Haworth's calculations. (Report at 35; Declaration at 66:5). Dr. Haworth gives no explanation why there would 400 Store Manager openings filled outside of the MCS system. In Addition, as explained in my February 2003 report, the MCS system cannot be considered an unbiased bidding system due to the requirement that prior approval is necessary before an employee can bid. Moreover,

Dr. Haworth fails to point out the fact that women promoted into Store Manager positions are disproportionately assigned to smaller stores than men, and hence earn less money.[21]

D. COMPENSATION

19. In my February 2003 report I presented several analyses of compensation of all hourly and salaried store management employees, based upon the statistical technique known as linear regression. Dr. Haworth presented an analysis of compensation for hourly employees, and for salaried store management employees restricted to Store Managers. She did not present any compensation analysis for Co-Managers and Assistant Managers in her report, or any other salaried employees, though she did perform them.[22]

---

[21] I examined whether women were disproportionately assigned to smaller stores. Promotions into Store Manager were divided up according to whether the target store was large or small, where 'large' stores were those with size 60,000 square feet or more. For each year, and for Sam's and non-Sam's stores, I determined the shortfall of women promoted into large stores compared to what is expected from their proportion among promotees. The overall Z-value for this analysis is -3.97, indicating a statistically significant pattern where women were moved into smaller stores.

[22] She admitted in her deposition that she had performed such analyses, see page 320, lines 14-18, and page 322 lines 14-18. Her backup materials indicate the results she found showed a pattern adverse to women.

20. Dr. Haworth also used linear regression analysis to do her compensation studies, but used a different model than I did. She claims that her studies "properly model the decision process"[23]. She cites deposition testimony, the Store Manager Survey, and certain statistical tests as the basis for her conclusions.

Compensation for Hourly Employees

21. Dr. Haworth incorrectly decided it is necessary to divide the hourly employees into about 7500[24] separate subunits and do separate regressions for each subunit. Moreover, she improperly includes certain explanatory variables in her regressions that are either tainted, or not considered by Wal-Mart in setting pay rates. Accordingly, her analysis is inaccurate and unreliable. The following paragraphs describe the defects in her analysis in more detail.

22. She ended up with such a large number of separate regressions by first dividing employees by store, then further dividing them by whether they held grocery or non-grocery jobs, then further dividing the non-grocery jobs into the six specialty divisions[25] and the remaining non-grocery jobs. In many stores, her analysis separates employees into eight subunits within a store[26]. There is no basis in Wal-Mart policy, or statistical justification for the extreme disaggregation of the data used by Dr. Haworth. The consequence of her disaggregation is to reduce the number of employees analyzed in each regression to a small group, sometimes as low as 20-30 employees.[27] In many cases there are so few employees in a subunit that the regression for this group could not be run.

Overly Disaggregated Analysis, Stores

23. Dr. Haworth ignores established, documented company wide policy controlling much of the compensation process, and contradicting her methodology. She cites Store Manager discretion[28] in setting pay rates as an important reason for her decision to do separate store regressions. In fact, Store Managers are constrained in the amount of discretion they have in setting pay rates. Wal-Mart's company wide Field Associate Compensation Guidelines indicate several

---

[26] For example, in SuperCenter stores, Dr. Haworth would separate employees into grocery, non-grocery, and 6 specialty division jobs.

aspects of salary setting and job assignment which require approval at the District and/or Regional Manager level. The Compensation Guidelines state that "the Store Manager needs to have the flexibility to address ... differences"[29] among employees in setting pay rates. However, these Guidelines list several ways in which the Store Manager is constrained in their discretion:

a. "Exceptions to these guidelines will be reported every pay period in the Payroll Exception Report, which will roll up to the Distinct Manager and Regional Vice President."[30]

b. "The People Group and your Regional People manager will act as consultants to ensure consistency in the program's administration and to provide compensation standards for hiring, evaluating and awarding pay increases."[31]

c. "A facility's pay structure is based on local competitive pay rates of comparable jobs, and established in conjunction with the District Manager, Regional Vice President, and Regional People Manager."[32]

d. In setting the starting rate for new hires, " ... any increase above 6% of the Starting Rate requires District Manager or Specialty Group Regional Manager approval."[53]

e. " ... all associates' pay levels should be reviewed and any pay inequities caused by the Start Rate adjustments should be identified and discussed with your District Manager."[54]

f. A national pay structure specifies a $0.25 per hour gap between Start Rates in consecutive pay classes (i.e. pay class 1 to 2, pay class 2 to 3, etc.)[55]

24. Moreover, store management employees frequently change stores, districts and even regions.[56] These personnel decisions made by Wal-Mart reflect control exerted above the Store Manager level, further indicating that stores are not isolated from each other. By doing separate regressions for every store

---

[53] Field Associate Compensation Guidelines, WMHO000678. I found that during the period May 1999 through April 2000 (the one year period following the effective date of these Guidelines) approximately 90% of the stores had at least one instance where there was a new hire paid at least 6% above the starting rate in that store for the pay class into which the employee was hired. Moreover, I found that approximately 40% of all hires were initially paid at least 6% above the starting rate in that store for the pay class into which the employee was hired.

subunit, Dr. Haworth fails to capture the effect of District, Regional, and company wide control over the compensation process.

Overly Disaggregated Analysis, Subunits within Store

25. Dr. Haworth claims each store contains too broad of a group of employees for making meaningful comparisons. So, she divides each store into as many as eight subunits for separate analysis (i.e. grocery, non-grocery, and the six specialty divisions. Her disaggregating of each store into sub-groups is not justified by any written Wal-Mart policy, nor did she conduct any statistical analyses to justify her assertions that the subunits she defines within a store have different "pay structures".[57]

26. Dr. Haworth admitted at her deposition that Wal-Mart guidelines do not mention department as a factor to consider in setting pay rates.[58] Wal-Mart's Field Associate Compensation Guidelines indicate how starting pay rates, and increases thereafter, are to be set for hourly jobs, and make no distinction between department or divisions. Thus, according to company wide Wal-Mart policy expressed in its Field Associate Compensation Guidelines, there is no separate "pay structure" for grocery, non-grocery, and each of the six specialty divisions.

[57] The Chow tests she incorrectly claims justify her disaggregation of employees by store, were never applied to tests for differences between subunits within stores.

[58] Page 81, line 14 through page 82, line 8, and pages 201-203 of Haworth deposition.

27. There is a great deal of movement between departments[39] in a store, indicating that Dr. Haworth's departmental subunits in a store do not have isolated decision making structures. Dr. Haworth testified at her deposition that it is ultimately the Store Manager's decision to reassign employees between departments.[40]

28. Dr. Haworth's disaggregating of stores into subunits within the store, and doing separate analysis for each sub-group, makes it impossible to identify important gender patterns that may occur in a store. For example, if men and women are disproportionately assigned to different departments, which are in separate sub-groups in Dr. Haworth's analysis, then the pay rates for these men and women would never be included in the same regression, and therefore never compared.

Store Manager Survey Improper and Unreliable

29. Dr. Haworth relies extensively on the manager survey[41] to justify her method of disaggregating employees and variable selection in regression model, despite admitting that the methodology of the survey violates accepted scientific standards, and was conducted in a manner contrary to her recommendations. Moreover, she acknowledged that having attorneys conduct the survey is considered to be biased and unreliable by courts and the scientific community. At her deposition she was asked, "Do you consider this survey as designed and as implemented to be a scientifically acceptable survey?"[42] She answered: "I don't know enough about the survey, and I'm also not a survey expert. I don't know enough about the survey and the way it was administered to be able to reach a judgment on whether it's a scientifically sound survey."[43] However, Dr. Haworth and her staff were deeply involved in the design of the survey and made recommendations on how it should be implemented.[44] She knew the survey was conducted by attorneys in this litigation,[45] although she advised the lawyers for Wal-Mart that having the attorneys conduct surveys was not a good idea,[46] "[b]ecause typically it's difficult for an attorney to collect information in a neutral environment so that they truly get a neutral set of information back."[47]

30. Dr. Haworth testified at her deposition that she was aware that the survey violated important principles in survey design listed in the "Reference Manual on Scientific Evidence"[48], which she admitted is an authoritative treatise on scientific evidence in her deposition[49], and cites in her report.[50]

31. In explaining how she developed her regression models, and determined which variables to include in those models, Dr. Haworth states:

> "Second, we need to gain an understanding of the factors that the decision-makers rely upon when determining the pay rates for hourly employees. With the answers to these questions, the researcher is able to construct a statistical model that reflects the actual decision-making process as closely as possible."[51]

She claims to rely on the store manager survey "to gain an understanding of the factors that the decision-makers rely upon when determining the pay rates for hourly employees." However, Dr. Haworth fails to point out the most important single factor, cited by more store managers than any other factor as playing a role in determining starting hourly pay. The most frequently cited factor was: "The minimum pay established for the job classification by Wal-Mart's pay guidelines."[82] This same factor was also cited most often as being relied upon by store managers in setting promotional pay increases. Thus, company wide pay guidelines were found to be the most important factor that store managers rely upon in setting pay rates and pay increases. This fact is never pointed out in Dr. Haworth's report[83], and [82] Haworth report, Appendix C-7, (appendix C-16 to her Declaration) and Haworth deposition page 276, lines 9-17. The second most frequently cited factor that Store Managers said they took into account in determining starting pay rates was the "Starting rate in the department in the store at the time the offer is made." This factor is 'nonsensical' because there is no starting pay for a department. The Field Compensation Guidelines indicate there is a starting pay rate for each pay class, regardless of the department. Dr. Haworth agreed that there is no starting pay for a department at her deposition (see page 202 line 10 to page 203 line 3, and page 295 line 19 through page 296 line 8).

[83] On pages 42-44 of her report,(Declaration 93-98) Dr. Haworth lists the factors included in the manager survey, but does not give the percentages of managers who said they relied on each factor, and she could not give any rationale for how the factors were ordered on the 3 page list, as stated on page 275 of her deposition. The most important factor, "The minimum pay indeed, contradicts her interpretation that all store subunits operate with different pay structures and decision making processes. Although the store manager survey suffers from serious defects as described in the previous paragraphs, Dr. Haworth's misinterpretation of the results of this survey undermine the justification she gives for her highly disaggregated models.

Improperly Excludes Hourly Department Heads

32. Dr. Haworth has inexplicably excluded all employees holding hourly Department Head[34] positions from her compensation regressions for hourly employees. Department Heads are among the highest paid hourly employees at Wal-Mart. Dr. Haworth's exclusion of approximately 60,000 hourly employees from her analysis appears to be an error. She never mentioned this exclusion in her report or at her deposition, she never criticized my compensation analysis for including these hourly employees, and there is no reason Department Heads should be excluded. This apparent error in her analysis was discovered through examination of her backup materials that included her computer programs and the raw data files used as input for those programs.

established for the job classification by Wal-Mart's pay guidelines" is listed last on page 44 of her report, and in her Declaration at 98.

[34] Department Heads are designated by job code = 101.

33. Dr. Haworth constructed a variable 'mgrsalever', among others, for identifying employees she wished to exclude from her compensation regressions for hourly employees.[58] The programs used to run her hourly regression analyses include a statement which excludes any employee for whom the variable mgrsalever =1. Since Department Heads are identified by job code = 101, and every employee with job code = 101 has the value mgrsalever=1 in her raw data files, it follows that every employee with job code = 101 is excluded by her programs. It appears that her variable mgrsalever was designed to restrict her regressions to employees who "had never been salaried employees during their employment at Wal-Mart" specified at lines 4-5 of page 47 of her report. See Declaration at 101:17-18. For example, there are a small number of employees as of October 2001 (the date Dr. Haworth used for measuring pay rates in her analysis) who were currently in hourly jobs, but who were previously in salary positions such as Store Manager, Co-Manager, or Assistant Manager. Inexplicably, Dr. Haworth sought to exclude such employees, and set the variable mgrsalever =1 for these former salaried employees. Unlike Department Heads, other employees holding hourly supervisor jobs such as Support Manager (1050), CSM (510) and Lead (910) all have mgrsalever =0, and are included in Dr.

[58] These programs are contained on a CD provided at her April 21, 2003 deposition.

Haworth's regressions of hourly employees (unless excluded for some other reason).

34. If Dr. Haworth intended to include Department Heads in her hourly regressions, but excluded them, then her results are incorrect. On the other hand, if she intended to exclude them, her analysis is not probative. There are an average of about 30 Department Heads per store, and they account for approximately 13% of the hourly employees. As I pointed out in my February report[56], women earned about $1800 less than men during 2001, among full-time Department Heads working over 45 weeks. Accordingly, presenting an analysis of compensation for hourly employees excluding Department Heads without giving any explanation is practically useless. After my rebuttal report was served and my second deposition taken, Dr. Haworth, in her Declaration at 101 n. 134, asserts that she has performed "alternative" regressions that purport to correct this error. I have not been provided any back-up material from which I could assess this assertion.

Arbitrarily Excludes Many Employees from Regressions

35. Aside from Dr. Haworth's exclusion of Department Heads, she also excludes employees from her analysis based upon her use of arbitrary and unexplained restrictions. For example, she has excluded employees from her analysis of hourly employee pay rates if they have ever been demoted while working at Wal-Mart, or had ever been salaried employees during their employment at Wal-Mart.

[56] Drogin report, Table 10.

Improperly Includes Tainted Variables

36. Dr. Haworth includes several tainted variables in her compensation analysis that have the effect of masking gender disparities in pay rates. Dr. Haworth has written in a law review article[57] that it is inappropriate to include variables in a model when the values of the variable itself may be influenced by employer discrimination. However, she has included several such variables in her models.

a. The gender distribution among departments is far from being a random distribution.[58] This uneven distribution originates at time of hire[59] as a result of Wal-Marts' uneven gender assignment to initial department. The initial hire separation by gender is re-enforced by the job posting system, where women are significantly less likely to be promoted into the highly male departments, and significantly more likely to be promoted into the highly female departments[60].

[58] For example, see Table 14 on page 21 of my February report.

[59] I analyzed the assignment of new hires to departments, and found that women were disproportionately assigned at hire into the 10 departments with the highest percent female, and found the disparity to be highly significant (Z=125.59). This analysis was conducted on all hires at Wal-Mart, using the department at the time of hire, store, year of hire, starting status (pt or ft).

b. Starting pay rate is another tainted variable Dr. Haworth includes in her analysis. Table 15 on page 23 of my February 2003 report indicates that women are paid less than men at time of hire. That table shows women hired in 1996 were paid between 20 and 40 cents less per hour than men hired in the same job, on the average, for the jobs with the most hires. I have performed a more refined analysis of gender differences in starting pay rate, using Dr. Haworth's data file provided with her backup materials. My analysis shows that initial pay rates for women are less than men's, and this difference is statistically significant.[61]

c. Dr. Haworth includes among her explanatory factors the variable "whether or not someone has ever worked in a grocery division". Again, this variable reflects uneven assignment of males to grocery departments, compared to women.[62]

[60] See Tables 1a and 1b above.

[61] I compared the starting pay rates of men and women hired into hourly jobs, in the same store, in the same year, in the same starting pay group, and having the same first status (pt/ft), based on Dr. Haworth's raw data file of hourly employees active or on leave as of October 2001. The disparity for this comparison has a Z-value of -71.63, indicating a high degree of statistical significance for the shortfall in female starting pay rates.

d. Dr. Haworth includes the variable "whether someone was promoted in the past year" in her regressions, but gives no explanation or justification for including this variable. In fact, this is another improperly included tainted variable, since the promotion discrimination is an important issue in the case and my February 2003 report presents several results indicating that the promotion decisions at Wal-Mart have significant adverse impact on women.

Variables Included in Regressions Without Justification or Explanation

37. Aside from the tainted variables, there are several other variables that Dr. Haworth included in her regression model for which no explanation or justification is presented. These include:

Whether or not someone has changed stores at any time during their career;

---

[62] I compared the percent of men to the percent of women who have ever held a grocery job among those included in Dr. Haworth's raw data file of hourly employees active or on leave as of October 2001. The analysis controls for year of hire, and first store, and results in a Z-value of -71.36, indicating a high degree of statistical significance for the pattern that the percent of women who were "ever grocery" is less than the percent for men, based on Dr. Haworth's raw data.

Whether or not someone was hired as part-time or full-time;

Whether or not someone's job code is one of the Sales Associate job codes[63];

Interaction term between Sales Associate and department;

Whether or not someone ever received a premium for working night shifts;

Whether or not someone had ever held secondary job responsibilities;

First pay group;

Division.

Incorrect Application of Chow Test

38. Dr. Haworth incorrectly applies statistical theory to perform her analysis. She refers to a statistical procedure known as the "Chow Test" to justify her decision to do separate regressions for every subunit of every store.[64] The test is named after its author, Gregory C. Chow. His original article is attached as Ex. 4. In fact, the statistical theory on which the Chow Test is based does not justify her conclusion that separate regressions must be run for every store sub-component.

[63] It should be noted that indicators for each Job code are already included as separate variables.

[64] Page 47 of Haworth report, "A statistical test called a 'Chow' test allows us to determine whether there are statistically significant differences between stores with respect to their compensation structures. If the structural differences between stores are statistically significant, then there is also a statistical justification for conducting a separate regression analysis for each store."

a. The statistically significant results from the Chow Test would indicate only that there might be at least one variable that is different in two or more stores. It does not imply that every variable in every store has a different relationship to pay rate. In fact, the method she employed tells her nothing about which stores or which factors might be different.[65] Dr. Haworth's regression implementation is equivalent to assuming that every factor in every store has a different relationship to pay rate. It could be, based on her variables, that only one store is different from other stores.

b. Dr. Haworth did not perform any Chow Tests for studying whether her store sub groupings into each of the specialty divisions are appropriate.[66] At her deposition she claimed to have done Chow tests qualifying candidate to disseminate his views, the CCEA allows wider ranging political debate among a greater variety of voices than if effective political participation were limited to those who could afford to broadcast their views with private funds alone.

[66] At her deposition she could not recall doing any Chow test for testing whether her models differed in any way among specialty departments, and was not certain whether she had done Chow tests, which would have led her to separate grocery and non-grocery. See page 180 lines 25 – page 181 line 4, and page 179 lines 8-19. After her deposition, I was provided with a new disk of data that purported to include grocery/non-grocery chow tests. The date of the output for this analysis indicates that it was done after her deposition.

Most crucially, the public funding provided by the CCEA and the matching provision allow a variety of voices not only to speak, but also to be heard. For self-government, "the point of ultimate interest is ... the minds of the hearers." Meiklejohn, supra, at 26. "It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to ... political ... and other ideas ... which is crucial." Red Lion, 395 U.S. at 390 (discussing broadcast media). The "right to receive information and ideas ... is fundamental to our free society." Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557, 564 (1969). Speech is protected for "its capacity for informing the public." First Nat'l Bank v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 777 (1978).

The CCEA's matching provision not only makes Arizona's public financing system more inviting to candidates who might otherwise be deterred by the prospect of being drastically outspent, the matching provision itself makes a contribution to the goals undergirding the First Amendment. Vigorous debate among various viewpoints may actually be impeded when one voice is able to drown out others. This point has been recognized with respect to speech by the government itself. See Warner Cable Communications v. Niceville, 911 F.2d 634, 638 (11th Cir. 1990) ("the government may not speak so loudly as to make it impossible for other speakers to be heard by their audience"); accord R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. v Shewry, 423 F.3d 906, 923 (9th Cir. 2005); AMSAT Cable v. Cablevision Ltd. P'ship, 6 F.3d 867, 872 (2d Cir. 1993).

In an age in which citizens get most of their information from expensive broadcast media, "a debate in which only one party has the financial resources ... to purchase sustained access to the mass communications media is not a fair test of either an argument's truth or its innate popular appeal." Banzhaf, 405 F.2d at 1102. "[T]he public interest in providing access to the marketplace of 'ideas and experiences' would scarcely be served by a system ... heavily weighted in favor of ...those with access to wealth." Columbia Broad Sys., Inc. v. Democratic Nat'l Comm., 412 U.S. 94, 123 (1973). See also id. at 196 (Brennan, J., dissenting) ("in light of the current dominance of the electronic media as the most effective means of reaching the public," if only a few individuals can afford to broadcast their messages, this "renders even the concept of 'full and free discussion' practically meaningless").

The CCEA's matching provision makes "a significant contribution to freedom of expression by enhancing the ability of candidates to present, and the public to receive, information necessary for the effective operation of the democratic process." CBS, Inc. v. Fed'l Communications Comm'n, 453 U.S. 367, 396 (1981). By furthering the public's interest in being exposed to all sides of public debate, it helps to "ensure that competition among actors in the political arena is truly competition among ideas." Fed'l Elections Comm'n v. Mass. Citizens for Life, 479 U.S. 238, 259 (1986), rather than a melee in which "success ... may go to the advocate who can shout loudest or most often." Banzhaf, 405 F.2d at 1102.

Petitioners view "the context of competitive electoral politics" as a zero-sum game, "in which one candidate's gain is another's loss." (McComish Petitioners' Merits Brief [McComish Br.] 57.) That description betrays a blinkered perspective that fails to consider "a primary First Amendment policy," Banzhaf, 405 F.2d at 1102: the public interest in a debate in which a variety of views may be heard.

B. The Arizona Statute Promotes The Public's Interest In Debate Among Multiple Viewpoints Through the Constitutionally Preferred Means Of "More Speech, Not Less."

Unlike constitutionally problematic efforts to foster increased public exposure to varied viewpoints, Arizona's approach recognizes that, even in service of that essential goal, government may not "restrict the speech of some elements of our society in order to enhance the relative voice of others." Buckley, 424 U.S. at 48-49.[2] Far from restricting or constraining any speech, the Arizona statute is crafted with an eye to the principle that "it is our law and our tradition that more speech, not less, is the governing rule." Citizens United, 130 S. Ct. at 911.

[2] But see Meiklejohn, supra, at 24-26 (comparing free speech in democratic society to discussion at town meeting, whose rules regulate speech to make possible effective discussion, by allowing different views to be heard).

For many decades, when speech of some sort has been deemed problematic, this Court has counseled that "the remedy to be applied is more speech, not enforced silence." Whitney, 274 U.S. at 377 (Brandeis, J., concurring). Since Justice Brandeis first proposed this principle in the context of advocacy of violent revolution, it has been applied in striking down restrictions seeking to avert a variety of anticipated harms. See Brown v. Hartlage, 456 U.S. 45, 61 (1982) ("In a political campaign, a candidate's factual blunder is unlikely to escape … notice … and correction…. The preferred First Amendment remedy of 'more speech, not enforced silence' thus has special force"); Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, 403 U.S. 29, 47 (1971) (plurality opinion) (when liability for defamation might impede vigorous discussion, "the solution lies in the direction of ensuring [citizens'] ability to respond, rather than in stifling public discussion of matters of public concern"). See also Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397, 419 (1989) ("the way to preserve the flag's special role" is not to prohibit flag burning, but "to persuade [flag burners] that they are wrong"). The CCEA promotes wide-ranging debate precisely by funding "more speech," rather than by legislating "enforced silence."

When this Court has struck down limitations on speech as more extensive than necessary, it has often suggested more speech, representing a different point of view, as a less speech-restrictive remedy to the perceived problem. See 44 Liquormart v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484, 507 (1996) (plurality opinion) (instead of banning price advertising for alcohol, state could achieve "goal of promoting temperance" through "educational campaigns focused on the problems of ... drinking"); Lorillard Tobacco Co. v. Reilly, 533 U.S. 525, 586 (2001) (Thomas, J., concurring) (instead of limiting tobacco advertising unduly, state "could seek to counteract that message with 'more speech'"). See also Central Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Public Serv. Comm'n, 447 U.S. 557, 571 (1980) (instead of banning promotional advertising by electric utility, state could "further its policy of conservation" by "for example, requir[ing] that the advertisements include information about the relative efficiency and expense of the offered service"). More speech, rather than enforced silence, has likewise often been held to be the constitutionally preferred remedy for potentially misleading speech. See Meese v. Keene, 481 U.S. 465, 481 (1987) ("the best remedy for misleading or inaccurate speech contained within materials [labeled 'political propaganda'] is fair, truthful, and accurate speech"); Bates v. State Bar, 433 U.S. 350, 375 (1977) ("the preferred remedy [for potentially misleading speech] is more disclosure, rather than less").

The challenged provision of Arizona's Clean Elections Act accords with this directive. The state faced serious concerns about the potential for political corruption if candidates were deterred from participating in the public financing system for fear of being drowned out by their opponents' spending. It addressed those concerns without restricting any speech, but through the constitutionally preferred remedy of "more speech." The state does not advocate any particular position on any issue, and does not weight the scales for or against the speech of any candidate. Thus, Arizona's remedy is an appropriate application of foundational First Amendment doctrine.

Thirty-five years ago this Court found that a federal public financing system was "a congressional effort, not to abridge, restrict, or censor speech, but rather to use public money to facilitate and enlarge public discussion and participation in the electoral process, goals vital to a self-governing people." Buckley, 424 U.S. at 92-93. Neither the matching funds trigger nor the passage of time has called that conclusion into question.

C. The Statute Enhances Debate Without Compelling Speech.

The matching provision of Arizona's public financing system does not compel speech any more than it suppresses it. To the contrary, in every way it respects the "individual freedom of mind" protected by the First Amendment. West Virginia State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 637 (1943).[3]

[3] Besides violating the rights of the compelled individual, compelled speech does not further society's interest in open debate. It tends, rather, to inhibit it, both by preventing the speaker from presenting his actual views, and because viewpoints are fairly represented only when presented by "persons who actually believe in them, who defend them in earnest." Mill, supra, at 104.

Relying on the principle that compelled dissemination of speech one disfavors amounts to compelled speech, Pacific Gas & Elect. Co. v. Pub. Utils. Comm'n, 475 U.S. 1 (1986); Miami Herald Publ. Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974), Petitioners argue that being required to report spending and fund-raising data, which will trigger matching funds to publicly financed opponents if certain thresholds are surpassed, is comparable to compelled dissemination of opponents' speech. (E.g. McComish Br. 54.) "[T]he financial reporting requirements of Arizona's system literally force [candidates] to press a button on their computer that will trigger the payment of subsidies to the very participating candidates they oppose," thereby compelling them "to help disseminate private political speech, which they abhor." (Id. at 24.)

The matching provision cannot plausibly be viewed as compelling dissemination of opponents' speech, even accepting Petitioners' questionable assertions that Pacific Gas and Tornillo govern scenarios not involving the conscription of private property, and that Tornillo applies to scenarios not implicating freedom of the press.[4] Essentially, Petitioners' complaint amounts to no more than that a candidate is required to perform an act (financial reporting) that may, if other conditions obtain (he has spent above the threshold, he has a publicly financed opponent), constitute one link in a causal chain leading to matching funds being disbursed to his opponent.

[4] The Court explained that Tornillo was more specifically about "the principle that the State cannot tell a newspaper what it must print," for fear of "dampen[ing] the vigor and limit[ing] the variety of public debate." Pruneyard Shopping Ctr. v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74, 88 (1980).

A causal link of this sort cannot be sufficient to constitute dissemination. If it were, any candidate who agrees to participate in a debate in which his opponent gets equal time is voluntarily disseminating his opponent's speech. By Petitioners' reasoning, California's "civil Gideon" statute, providing publicly funded attorneys to low-income defendants in certain civil suits, Cal. Gov. Code § 68651 (operative July 1, 2011), compels plaintiffs in such cases to disseminate speech they oppose, in that it is plaintiffs' action that causes defense counsel's speech to be funded. Or if the Department of Health shuts down – or gives an unfavorable health rating to – a restaurant on the basis of reports the owner is required to file, and the Department publicizes that fact, then, on Petitioners' analysis, the restaurant owner was compelled to disseminate speech he disfavored. Indeed, there is no end to what could be considered compelled dissemination on Petititioners' reasoning. If a socialist worker in Indonesia taps the rubber that is used to manufacture the tires on trucks used to deliver the Wall Street Journal, the worker could complain that as a condition of employment he is compelled to help disseminate speech he abhors. Petitioners' contention that the Clean Elections Act compels high-spending privately funded candidates to disseminate their opponents' speech is no more plausible.

II. THE ARIZONA LAW DOES NOT CHILL SPEECH.

Petitioners' speculation that debate might somehow be chilled by a funding mechanism that makes it possible for more than one candidate to be heard has no support in observable fact, common sense, or the law.

A. Petitioners' First Amendment Concerns Are Based On An Unrealistic View Of Actual Campaign Behavior.

Petitioners' claims that speech is deterred or postponed by fear of triggering matching funds to an opponent, or that Arizona's public financing scheme discriminates against privately funded candidates, reflect a view divorced from the realities of actual campaign behavior.

1. Candidates Do Not Refrain From Speech to Avoid Triggering Matching Funds.

Petitioners' central complaint that candidates' speech is deterred by the prospect of triggering the release of matching funds is unsupported by evidence, and defies basic principles of campaigning for office. As made clear by the Court of Appeals, 611 F.3d 510, 523-24 (9th Cir. 2010), the record does not support any such claims, even with respect to Petitioners themselves. To the contrary, there is ample evidence that concerns about triggering matching funds played no part in Petitioners' strategizing. Id. (See also Clean Elections Institute Respondents' Merits Brief [Institute Br.] 6-7).

That evidence accords with what a modicum of familiarity with political campaigning would suggest. A candidate's top priority is almost invariably to get his message out. See Joseph Napolitan, Napolitan's Rules: 112 Lessons Learned From a Career in Politics, in Winning Elections 29 (Ronald Faucheux, ed. 2003). Particularly for candidates who are not already well known to voters, spending heavily is not a choice, but a necessity. Ruth Ann Weaver-Lariscy & Spencer Tinkham, The Influence of Media Expenditure and Allocation Strategies in Congressional Advertising Campaigns, 16 J. of Advertising No. 3, at 13 (1987). Moreover, according to generally accepted political campaign strategy, it is crucial for a candidate to get his message out first, so that he, and not his opponents, can frame the issues in the race, and define who the candidates are and what they stand for. See Denise Baer, Contemporary Strategy and Agenda Setting, in Congress and Elections American Style 55 (James Thurber ed. 1995); Joe Garecht, 5 More Secrets for Winning a Political Campaign, at http://www.localvictory.com/strategy/secrets-for-winning-a-political-campaign.html. Consequently, it would be unusual – and likely self-defeating – for a candidate to refrain from spending to get his message out in order to prevent an opponent from getting her message out later.

Privately financed candidates cannot know in advance how much money they will raise. This fact makes it all the more implausible that they might somehow plan to raise the maximum amount possible while remaining just below the fundraising threshold that would trigger matching funding.

Presumably they opted for private financing because they thought doing so would be to their advantage, because they believed either (1) they could raise more funds than the maximum level matched under the CCEA, see Ariz. Rev. Stat. § 16-952(E), (2) they would be advantaged by having funds in hand earlier, or (3) they would benefit from a race in which both they and their opponents were able to spend more. It would defeat any of these strategies for privately financed candidates not to maximize their fundraising. And once the funds are in hand, there would be no incentive not to spend them, for raising the money is already enough to trigger the matching funds. § 16-952(B).

In general a candidate would not run for office if she did not believe that her message was superior to that of her opponents, and hence likely more appealing to voters. A candidate who believes this would have no reason to refrain from broadcasting her message in order to prevent her opponent from acquiring the means to broadcast his message to an equal extent.[5]

[5] Ironically, Petitioners argue that "[a]nyone who takes ideas seriously will be chilled by the prospect of being instrumental in funding the dissemination of ideas one opposes." (McComish Br. 41.) But a candidate who takes ideas seriously is precisely one who would not shrink from presenting his ideas simply because the cost was that his opponent could do the same. He would welcome the opportunity to debate.

2. Delayed Spending Is Neither Factually Nor Legally Likely to Constitute Evidence of a Chilling Effect on Speech.

Even less plausible is Petitioners' argument that the speech of privately financed candidates is chilled because the trigger provision allegedly provides an incentive for candidates to delay spending. (McComish Br. 36, 42, 56; Arizona Free Enterprise Club's Freedom Club PAC Petitioners' Merits Brief [AFEC Br.] 16-17, 34.) The only incentive for delay alleged by Petitioners is an attempt to thwart the law. Moreover, it is implausible that the law in fact causes candidates to defer spending, and it would not constitute a chilling effect if it did so.

Petitioners assert that the trigger provision causes candidates to delay political activity until close to the election "so that matching funds arrive too late to be used by the publicly financed candidate." (AFEC Br. 16.) This is a remarkable argument. The only incentive alleged for a privately financed candidate to postpone spending is as an effort to circumvent the public financing system, so that opponents will not receive the funds to which they are entitled under law. It is peculiar to regard such efforts to cheat the system as a burden imposed by the system. Even more remarkably, as Petitioners admit, (McComish Br. 36), such manipulations are illegal under the Clean Elections Act. Ariz. Rev. Stat. § 16-958(C) (prohibiting conspiracies to postpone campaign donations in order to postpone reporting that will trigger matching funds to opponents). Petitioners' argument therefore amounts to a claim that the Clean Elections Act burdens candidates' speech by providing an incentive to defer spending in ways that the Act itself explicitly prohibits. That is not a coherent objection.

In any event, deferring spending to deprive opponents of matching funds would be self-defeating. First, as noted supra, see sec. II.A.1, it is critical to speak early, in order to define the issues and candidates in a campaign. Second, late spending is unproductive, because many voters will already have voted. In Arizona voting begins 33 days before Election Day,[6] Long Distance Voter, Early Voting Rules, at http://www.longdistancevoter.org/early_voting_rules#arizona, and many voters avail themselves. For example, of 315,879 total votes cast in Pima County in the 2010 gubernatorial general election, 200,158 ballots were submitted before Election Day. Election Summary Report, Pima County, at http://www.pima.gov/elections/results.htm. Consequently, "media needs to be up, and running heavy, when the ballots go out." Gary Nordlinger, Early Voting: Impact on Campaign Strategies, Training, Budgets, in Winning Elections, supra, at 124. Third, late spending is ineffective, because most voters choose their candidates well before Election Day. Id. at 122; see also Stuart Rothenberg, Final Stretch Not as Important as You Think, available at http://rothenbergpoliticalreport.com/news/article/final-stretch-not-as-important-as-you-think (2010). In reality, candidates try to spread their media advertising – their greatest expense, Judith Trent & Robert Friedenberg, Political Campaign Communication 372 (2008) – over as many weeks as they can afford while achieving a heavy enough media presence to make an impact. Tobe Berkovitz, Political Media Buying (1996), at http://www.hks.harvard.edu/case/3pt/berkovitz.html.

[6] Most states now offer early voting. Nat'l Conf. of State Legislatures, Absentee and Early Voting, at http://www.ncsl.org/default.aspx?tabid=16604.

Even if the matching provision did on occasion affect the timing of a candidate's spending, it would be incorrect to conclude that the state is thereby chilling speech. After all, many decisions concerning when to spend campaign funds are influenced in some way by state action. For example, federal candidates regularly make a big fundraising push shortly before the end of an F.E.C. reporting period, in order to demonstrate momentum. See David Leventhal, January Fund-Raising Mania , at http://www.opensecrets.org/news/2011/01/ceo-1-31-11.html (Jan. 31, 2011). Candidates may avoid advertising on holiday weekends, when voters' attention is likely to be elsewhere; most holidays are scheduled by state action. The state action of allowing early voting influences the scheduling of campaign spending. In fact, Election Day itself is scheduled by the government. By Petitioners' reasoning, the fact that candidates are unlikely to spend heavily too far before Election Day – or for that matter, after Election Day – is equally an example of state action chilling political speech. It would be far-fetched to maintain that the scheduling of Election Day (or holidays or a deadline for disclosing funding) exerts a chilling effect on speech. It is equally far-fetched to maintain that the alleged incentive to delay campaign spending provided by the matching provision exerts a chilling effect.

3. Neither Arizona's Public Financing System as a Whole Nor the Triggered Matching Funds Provision Discriminates Against Privately Financed Candidates.

There is equally little merit to Petitioners' complaints that the matching provision discriminates against privately financed candidates.

There is nothing discriminatory in the application of the Arizona statute to multi-candidate races. Petitioners object to the possibility that one candidate's high spending could trigger additional funds to more than one rival candidate, thereby allegedly weighting the scales unfairly against the high spending candidate. But it is plain that additional funding at an equal level all around does not in itself worsen the odds of any given candidate. In fact, candidates often benefit when voters opposed to them are split between more than one candidate. See, e.g., Jon Walker, NY-23: Dem Owens Catches a Lucky Break – Another Three-Way Race, at http://elections.firedoglake.com/2010/09/23/ny-23-dem-owens-catches-a-lucky-break-another-three-way-race (Sept. 23, 2010). To avert just such a scenario, the national Republican Party refrained from funding the campaign of the Republican nominee in amicus curiae Ned Lamont's 2006 Senate race in Connecticut, for fear of splitting the anti-Democratic vote, after Mr. Lamont defeated incumbent Senator Joseph Lieberman in the primary, and Sen. Lieberman sought re-election as an Independent. Anne Kornblut, G.O.P. Deserts One of Its Own for Lieberman, N.Y. Times, Aug. 19, 2006, http://www.nytimes.com/2006/08/19/nyregion/19conn.html.

Nor does the Clean Elections regime discriminate against privately financed candidates when it counts independent expenditures against a publicly financed candidate, as well as opponents' spending, for purposes of calculating matching funds. From the perspective of a candidate, as amici can attest, independent advertising against the candidate has the same impact as advertising by an opposing candidate. Given the proportion of election expenditures made by entities other than candidates, see GAO, Campaign Finance Reform: Additional Information, GAO-10-391SP 45 tbl.42, 47 tbl.44 (2010), at http://www.gao.gov/new.items/d10391sp.pdf ($2.2 million in independent expenditures reported in 2008 Arizona legislative elections compared to $2.1 million spent by privately financed candidates), candidates would be less likely to participate in a public financing system that did not provide funds to respond to adverse independent expenditures. The difficulty of verifying that nominally independent expenditures are truly independent only strengthens the case for counting them in the matching funds calculation.[7]

[7] That difficulty is exacerbated by the lack of transparency surrounding the sources of funding for independent expenditures. See Lisa Rosenberg, Impotent FEC Fails to Act on Disclosure Rules, at http://sunlightfoundation.com/blog/taxonomy/term/

Finally, the obvious rejoinder to all of Petitioners' allegations of disadvantages to privately financed candidates is that many candidates continue to opt for private funding. See id. at 5 tbl.2 (51.2 % of Arizona legislative candidates chose private funding in 2000-2008). Candidates would not choose private funding unless they expected to benefit from doing so.

In sum, there is no evidence that the matching provision of the CCEA deters speech, discriminates against privately financed candidates, or in any other way infringes expressive rights.

B. The Fear Of Opposing Speech Does Not Constitute A "Chill" On Speech As That Term Is Understood Under The Constitution.

Even in an imaginary world in which the matching funds trigger provision deterred many privately financed candidates from broadcasting their messages as widely as they otherwise would, this would not constitute a "chilling effect" in the constitutional meaning of that phrase. An examination of the contexts in which this Court has found debate to be chilled reveals that it is non-speech retaliation (or threats or the possibility thereof) which give rise to a "chilling effect."

The crucial distinction is between two qualitatively different ways in which one may seek to "defeat" speech with which one disagrees: through persuasion or through coercion. One may seek to persuade by countering the speaker's ideas with other ideas, i.e., through the classic remedy of "more speech." Alternatively, one may take the disagreement out of the realm of words and ideas altogether and into the realm of coercion, through crude violence or, for example, through the possibility of "economic reprisal, loss of employment, threat of physical coercion." NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449, 462 (1958). It is the latter sort of response that chills debate, directly or incidentally. By contrast, the threat that speech will be responded to with speech in favor of another viewpoint — the only threat posed by the matching provision — does not chill debate. To the contrary, such a response is debate.

Transparency (Jan. 21, 2011) (only 41% of groups making independent expenditures in 2010 federal elections reported funding sources).

A survey of recognized chilling effects reveals that they all involve some degree of coercion, through the threat of some sort harm in the material world. The following situations have repeatedly been found to chill speech:[8] [8] Other factors may chill speech insofar as they lead to the listed sorts of outcomes. Requirements to identify the author of a leaflet or to disclose membership lists, for example, may chill speech, or association for speech, when they could plausibly expose the author or member to government or community reprisals. Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60, 64-65 (1960); Patterson, 357 U.S. at 462.

- Criminal penalties, or threats or the possibility of prosecution.[9] Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343, 365 (2003) (plurality opinion); Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 244 (2002).

- Government or private threats, harassment, or reprisals. Doe v. Reed, 130 S. Ct. 2811, 2821 (2010) (citing Buckley, 424 U.S. at 74); Hynes v. Oradell, 425 U.S. 610, 626 (1976) (Brennan, J., concurring).

- Public hostility and threats of violence. Gibson v. Fla. Legislative Investigation Comm., 372 U.S. 539, 557 (1963); Patterson, 357 U.S. at 462.

- Loss of employment or professional status or threats thereof. Sheet Metal Workers' Int'l Ass'n v. Lynn, 488 U.S. 347, 355 (1989) (regarding statutory free speech rights); Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 597 (1972).

- Loss of money or forgone earnings. United States v. Treasury Employees, 513 U.S. 454, 468-69 (1995); Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minn. Comm'r of Revenue, 460 U.S. 575, 592 (1983).

- State withholding of benefits. Baird v. State Bar, 401 U.S. 1, 7 (1971).

[9] The doctrine that speech is chilled by laws that are vague, ambiguous, or difficult to understand, Citizens United, 130 S.Ct. at 889, 894-96; NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 432-33, 437-38 (1963), or overbroad, Virginia v. Hicks, 539 U.S. 113, 119 (2003), is based on the attendant possibility of prosecution.

- Risk of civil litigation (including risk of liability and the costs and burdens of litigation itself). Fed'l Elections Comm'n v. Wis. Right to Life, Inc., 551 U.S. 449, 468 (2007); Riley v. Nat'l Fed'n of Blind, 487 U.S. 781, 794 (1988).

- Harm to reputation or community standing. Denver Area Educ. Telecoms. Consortium v. Fed'l Communications Comm'n, 518 U.S. 727, 754 (1996); Lamont v. Postmaster General, 381 U.S. 301, 307 (1965).

Unlike the foregoing examples, the "threat" alleged in this case – that opposing viewpoints will be aired in response to one's own – involves no coercion. It is wholly different in kind from anything that has ever been found to chill speech, and is not a threat of any legally cognizable harm.[10] A candidate has the right to shrink from such debate. But his speech is not being chilled in the constitutional sense when he does so. His interest in having his speech unanswered is not an interest protected by the First Amendment. Cf. Red Lion, 395 U.S. at 387 ("[t]he right of free speech ... does not embrace a right to snuff out the free speech of others").

In sum, Petitioners' argument that § 16-952 chills speech is empirically unsupported – candidate speech is highly unlikely to be deterred. And it is incorrect as a matter of law - if the speech of some candidates were deterred by the prospect of opposing speech, that would not be a constitutionally cognizable chilling effect.

[10] Indeed, given that the possibility of opposing speech does not threaten any legally cognizable harm to Petioners, there is some doubt whether they even have standing to bring this case. See Laird v. Tatum, 408 U.S. 1, 13-14 (1972) ("Allegations of a subjective 'chill' are not an adequate substitute for a claim of specific present objective harm or a threat of specific future harm").

III. BECAUSE THE CCEA EMPLOYS NON-DISCRIMINATORY MEANS TO ACHIEVE IMPORTANT ENDS, DAVIS DOES NOT CONTROL THE OUTCOME OF THIS CASE.

The Arizona trigger provision fundamentally differs from the "Millionaire's Amendment," 2 U.S.C. § 441a-1(a), struck down in Davis, 554 U.S. 724, in both its ends and means, making Petitioners' reliance on Davis unavailing.

A. The Arizona Statute Calls For A Lower Level Of Scrutiny.

The strict scrutiny applied in Davis is inapplicable to this case, because the Arizona statute does not discriminate in any of the ways that made the Millionare's Amendment constitutionally suspect. This Court applied strict scrutiny in Davis, because "the activation of a scheme of discriminatory contribution limits ... impose[d] a substantial burden on the exercise of the First Amendment right to use personal funds for campaign speech." 128 S.Ct. at 2772. Arizona's law imposes no comparable burden.

The scheme struck down in Davis was discriminatory in several significant ways. First, it imposed unequal contribution limits on different privately funded candidates seeking the same office. In this way it was unlike systems, such as Arizona's, in which candidates may voluntarily agree to accept lower contribution limits – or to refrain from accepting contributions at all after qualifying – in exchange for other advantages. See id. at 2772 (citing Buckley, 424 U.S. at 57 n.65). Second, it discriminated even among high spending candidates in a way that served no legitimate government purpose: one candidate could spend any amount without triggering higher contribution limits for his opponent, as long as he spent funds raised from other contributors, while a self-funding candidate could trigger triple contribution limits for his opponent by spending that same amount. Such discrimination violated the precept that "speech cannot be limited based on a speaker's wealth." Citizens United, 130 S.Ct. at 905. Third, it discriminated among members of the public, allowing some to make political contributions three times as great as other were allowed to make, based solely on their political preferences. Such discrimination violated the constitutional demand that "each citizen have an equally effective voice in the election" of office holders. Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 565 (1964).

By contrast, the public financing system at issue in this case is not discriminatory in this or any other way. As explained by Respondents, (Institute Br. 32-37), the CCEA does not discriminate according to speaker, content, or viewpoint.[11] Nor, does the CCEA burden speech in any significant way, as explained in section II, supra. Therefore, it is not subject to strict scrutiny any more than was the public campaign financing system this Court upheld in Buckley, 424 U.S. at 90-108; see also Regan v. Taxation with Representation, 461 U.S. 540, 549 (1983) ("We rejected First Amendment ... challenges to [the public financing provision in Buckley] without applying strict scrutiny").

[11] To Respondents' discussion of the statute's viewpoint neutrality, amici wish only to add that just as Arizona will provide matching funds equally to "pro-life" and "pro-choice" candidates, (Institute Br. 34), so too will it provide funds equally to candidates who favor public financing

Indeed, given that the Arizona statute does not impose any constitutionally recognized burden on speech whatsoever, see supra, at IIB, it is not clear that it should be subject even to intermediate scrutiny. The only point at which the Buckley Court indicated that any degree of heightened scrutiny of public financing might be in order was when considering an equal protection challenge to the denial of public financing to minor party candidates. 424 U.S. at 93-96. No such equal protection issues arise in the current case.

The CCEA does not impose even incidental burdens on speech like the ones potentially imposed by regulations to which the Court has applied intermediate scrutiny in the context of campaign finance regulation. Those regulations have been of two kinds: contribution limits, Randall v. Sorrell, 548 U.S. 230, 246-48 (2006); Buckley, 424 U.S. at 25, and disclosure requirements. Citizens United, 130 S. Ct. at 914; Buckley, 424 U.S. at 64-66. Contribution limits entail a "restriction upon the contributor's and those who don't. Candidates opposed to public financing may accept – and have accepted – public campaign funds. (See AFEC Br. 13-14.)

ability to engage in free communication," even if "only a marginal" one, Buckley, 424 U.S. at 20, and they constrain "one aspect of the contributor's freedom of political association." Id. at 24. The Arizona statute imposes no such restriction or constraint. Disclosure requirements "may burden the ability to speak" in some circumstances, such as when disclosing the identity of a speaker may lead to "threats, harassment, or reprisals" against the speaker. Citizens United, 130 S. Ct. at 914. The Arizona statute imposes no such potential burden.

It is not clear, therefore, that the Clean Elections Act implicates rights protected by the First Amendment in a way serious enough to warrant any form of heightened scrutiny. But two things at least are certain: first, the strict scrutiny exercised in Davis is inapplicable; and second, the Act readily withstands intermediate review.

B. The CCEA Serves Important State Interests.

1. The Statute Reduces Corruption and the Appearance of Corruption.

This Court has repeatedly recognized preventing corruption and the appearance thereof as not just important, but compelling, state interests in campaign finance regulation. E.g., Fed'l Election Comm'n v. Nat'l Conservative Political Action Comm., 470 U.S. 480, 496-497 (1985) ("preventing corruption or the appearance of corruption are the only ... compelling government interests thus far identified for restricting campaign finances"); accord Davis, 128 S.Ct. at 2773. The Millionaire's Amendment was found to disserve that interest, both because it discouraged use of personal funds, thereby increasing reliance on outside contributors, and because in some cases it raised contribution limits, thereby increasing contributors' potential influence. Davis, 128 S.Ct. at 2773. By contrast, the Arizona statute provides candidates an alternative to relying on private contributions. Cf. Buckley, 424 U.S. at 96 ("public financing as a means of eliminating the improper influence of large private contributions furthers a significant governmental interest"). The challenged matching provision makes it more attractive for candidates to take advantage of this alternative,[12] by assuring that they will be able to remain competitive even against highly funded opponents.

[12] Petitioners back-handedly concede this point in objecting that the provision provides too much incentive to participate, alleging that one Petitioner "was coerced into running as a publicly financed candidate." (McComish Br. 45.) The claim of coerciveness is far-fetched. In reality, as was found regarding Maine's nearly identical public financing system, the CCEA "provides incentives to candidates to make the public financing route attractive, but the incentives hardly are overwhelming or of an order that can be said to create profound disparities." Daggett v. Webster, 74 F. Supp. 2d 53, 57 (D. Me. 1999), aff'd sub nom. Daggett v. Stearns, 205 F.3d 445 (1st Cir. 2000).

2. That the Act May Also Serve the Purpose of Enhancing the Variety of Public Debate Does Not Render It Constitutionally Suspect.

Petitioners' argument that the real interest served by the Clean Elections Act is to "equalize electoral opportunities, resources, and influences" or "level[] the playing field," (e.g. McComish Br. 64), is a misleading distraction.

As the decision below makes clear, it can hardly be denied that the Arizona statute serves the anti-corruption purpose. 611 F.3d at 525-27. If it also serves another interest, that does not detract from the Act's principal purpose or somehow render it constitutionally suspect. When more than one interest is proffered by the state, it is sufficient that one of those interests is weighty enough to meet the requirements of heightened scrutiny, whether intermediate or strict scrutiny is applicable. See Doe, 130 S. Ct. at 2819 (because the State's interest in preserving the integrity of the electoral process was "undoubtedly important," there was no need "to address the State's 'informational' interest" in the Public Records Act) (intermediate scrutiny); Washington State Grange v. Wash. State Republican Party, 552 U.S. 442, 446 (2008) (after "reject[ing] as illegitimate three of the [state's] asserted interests" for California's blanket primary, proceeding to consider whether "the remaining interests ... were ... compelling") (strict scrutiny).

Moreover, notwithstanding Petitioners' objections to an "illegitimate" government interest at play, (AFEC Br. 60), this Court has never indicated that the public's exposure to more wide-ranging political discourse – or expanded opportunities for political participation – are not worthy purposes. Rather, the Court has held that certain means of achieving those goals are illegitimate, in particular the means of "restrict[ing] the speech of some elements of our society in order to enhance the relative voice of others." Buckley, 424 U.S. at 48-49.

What Petitioners describe as an interest in equalizing electoral influences could more accurately be described as interest in assuring that a variety of voices is heard, a government interest recognized as important by this Court. See supra, at sec. I.A. See also Turner Broad. Sys. v. Fed. Communications Comm'n, 512 U.S. 622, 663 (1997) ("assuring that the public has access to a multiplicity of information sources is a governmental purpose of the highest order, for it promotes values central to the First Amendment").[13]

That interest underlies the First Amendment itself, and could be sufficient on its own to justify § 16-952. But it does not need to be, as the statute serves the important interest of lessening opportunities for – and perceptions of – corruption. If the statute is also motivated in part by an interest in promoting more wide-ranging debate, that in no way undermines its legitimacy.

[13] Turner Broadcasting concerned regulation of broadcast media, a context in which more government regulation may be appropriate than elsewhere. Buckley, 424 U.S. at 49. But assuring that a variety of voices is heard about issues of public concern remains an important interest, even if it does not, in non-broadcast contexts, justify measures that limit freedom of expression.

CONCLUSION

Because the Arizona statute addresses the compelling problems of government corruption and the appearance thereof in a way that promotes the values of the First Amendment, without infringing any protected liberties, the judgment of the Court of Appeals should be affirmed.

INTEREST OF THE AMICUS CURIAE[1]

Amicus Service Employees International Union ("SEIU") is one of the largest unions in North America. It represents 2.2 million workers in service industries throughout the United States and Canada. SEIU's members' voluntary contributions make SEIU's political action committee, the SEIU Committee on Political Education, one of the nation's largest PACs. Directly and through its affiliated local unions, SEIU actively participates in elections at all levels of federal, state, and local government, including in the state of Arizona. Because SEIU's members want to participate in fair and transparent electoral processes, SEIU has a substantial interest in the outcome of this litigation.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The Court should affirm the decision of the Ninth Circuit. This case involves a challenge to an Arizona law that subsidizes campaign speech for the purpose of reducing the risk of corruption in its electoral process. Petitioners claim that Arizona's manner of calculating this subsidy burdens the speech of those who choose not to accept the subsidy. There is a well-developed First Amendment jurisprudence that makes clear that such subsidies raise different and less substantial First Amendment concerns than government restrictions of speech and should be subject to intermediate judicial scrutiny. Petitioners' failure to acknowledge this difference infects virtually every aspect of their argument.

Specifically, Petitioners make two First Amendment claims that constitute direct assaults on this Court's holding in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976), upholding the federal public financing regime for Presidential elections. In their first Question Presented, they argue that Arizona's public financing law violates a non-participating candidate's free speech rights because it assertedly penalizes candidates who choose to speak with their own funds and effectively forces them to subsidize the speech of their opponents. A substantially similar claim was considered and rejected by the Court in Buckley, which held that laws that subsidize speech advance — rather than deter — First Amendment values, and do not force non-participants to subsidize participants.

[1] This brief is filed with the written consent of all parties. No counsel for a party authored this brief in whole or in part, and no counsel or party funded its preparation or submission.

Petitioners' second Question Presented similarly makes a claim that is inconsistent with the holding of Buckley. Petitioners argue that because Arizona's public financing regime is relatively more helpful to candidates with relatively less access to the large sums of money it sometimes takes to run a successful political campaign, it runs afoul of the Court's holdings that "equalization" is not a legitimate goal of campaign finance law.

But this claim could be made against any public financing scheme, because it can always be argued that public financing benefits candidates with relatively less access to money and so in that way "equalizes" political campaigns. Notwithstanding this same equalizing effect, the Court in Buckley approved Congress' Presidential public financing scheme, while at the same time making clear in contrast that laws whose sole purpose is to "equalize" all candidate's opportunities by restricting speech are unlawful. Nothing about the particular way Arizona's public financing law operates distinguishes it in relevant respects from the public financing law upheld in Buckley.

This Court's decision in Davis v. Federal Election Comm'n, 554 U.S. 724 (2008), does not support either of Petitioners' claims. There the Court struck down a law which directly and asymmetrically restricted self-financing candidates' speech more than others, for the sole purpose of leveling the playing field as between rich and poor candidates. Arizona's law shares neither of those characteristics.

Regulations aimed at reducing the risk of corruption of the political process, and the appearance of such risk, advance compelling government interests, and the most comprehensive solution to the problem of quid pro quo corruption is a system of public financing that makes it possible to compete for political office without having to raise contributions at all, acting "to reduce the deleterious influence of large contributions on our political process, to facilitate communication by candidates with the electorate, and to free candidates from the rigors of fundraising." Buckley, 424 U.S. at 91.

Arizona's law directly advances these compelling interests and fits comfortably among the laws this Court has upheld against First Amendment challenge. The Court should decline Petitioners' invitation to overrule these precedents and radically reconfigure both campaign finance and First Amendment jurisprudence.

ARGUMENT

SEIU often contributes to candidates up to the maximum amount allowed by law, and it operates a substantial independent expenditure program of behalf of candidates it supports. On Petitioners' way of thinking, SEIU therefore is an entity that is "burdened" and "punished" as a result of Arizona's public financing scheme. We do not share this view. Arizona's law allows us – and everyone else – to spend freely to provide independent support to candidates we endorse. We make such expenditures notwithstanding the Arizona "trigger" mechanism for many reasons, including a belief that our spending will be effective in reaching particular voters, and that our speech will be more persuasive than any additional speech triggered by our activity.

In any event, our experience is that whatever burden we suffer as a result of this and other public financing regimes is greatly outweighed by the fact that public financing enhances our members' and the public's sense that elections are honest and fairly conducted. We would much rather participate in an election that is fair and free of any taint of corruption than in a purely privately-financed election, even though our resources might allow us to play a more prominent role in the absence of public financing.

But Petitioners' and amici's policy preferences regarding public financing are of little legal significance. Whether public financing "appear[s] 'bad,' 'unwise,' or 'unworkable' is [to the Court] irrelevant." Buckley, 424 U.S. at 91. The legally significant point is that the voters of Arizona, acting though referendum, choose to subsidize candidates' speech and encourage participation in Arizona's public financing program because they thought it would help address the problem of corruption in their electoral process. As we show in what follows, the First Amendment does not prevent them from implementing this policy judgment.

I. A.R.S. § 16-952 Should Be Subject to Intermediate, Not Strict, Judicial Scrutiny

Both of Petitioners' claims are predicated on their view that Arizona's law restricts their speech and should be scrutinized accordingly. But Arizona's law neither compels Petitioners to speak nor restricts their right to speak. Instead, Arizona provides content neutral subsidies for speech by candidates who voluntarily agree to abide by expenditure limits. These subsidies directly promote First Amendment values and only indirectly implicate Petitioners'

First Amendment interests. As the Court held in Buckley, because public funding laws are a state effort "not to abridge, restrict or censor speech but rather to use public money to facilitate and enlarge public discussion and participation in the electoral process, goals vital to a self-governing people," a public financing law "furthers, not abridges, pertinent First Amendment values." 424 U.S. at 93.

While the First Amendment "certainly has application in the subsidy context," governments "may allocate competitive funding according to criteria that would be impermissible were direct regulation of speech or a criminal penalty at stake." Nat'l Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, 524 U.S. 569, 587-588 (1998). "So long as legislation does not infringe on other constitutionally protected rights, [the legislature] has wide latitude to set spending priorities." Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Wash., 461 U.S. 540, 549 (1983). Congress or a state government may "selectively fund a program to encourage certain activities it believes to be in the public interest" and doing so does not constitute discrimination "on the basis of viewpoint." Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173, 193 (1991). In addition, a government entity may provide funds to "facilitate a wide range of speech" by private individuals or organizations, Board of Regents of Univ. of Wis. System v. Southworth, 529 U.S. 217, 231, 233 (2000), provided that the government complies with the "requirement of viewpoint neutrality in the allocation of funding support." Id. at 233. In sum, "[t]here is a basic difference between direct state interference with a protected activity and state encouragement of an alternative activity." Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464, 475 (1977).

For these reasons, this Court has repeatedly rejected the argument that "strict scrutiny applies whenever Congress subsidizes some speech, but not all speech" as "not the law." Regan, 461 U.S. at 548. As long as "governmental provision of subsidies is not aimed at the suppression of dangerous ideas." id. at 550 (internal citations omitted), the government has broad powers to encourage actions deemed to be in the public interest.

Thus, strict scrutiny applies only to "laws that by their terms distinguish favored speech from disfavored speech on the basis of the ideas or views expressed," and laws that "compel speakers to utter or distribute speech bearing a particular message." Turner Broad. Sys. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 642, 643 (1994) (citations omitted). "In contrast, regulations that are unrelated to the content of speech are subject to an intermediate level of scrutiny because in most cases they pose a less substantial risk of excising certain ideas or viewpoints from the public dialogue." Id. Because Petitioners challenge a speech subsidy, this Court should subject the challenged provision to intermediate, rather than strict scrutiny and determine only whether the challenged provision bears a "substantial relation" to a "sufficiently important" governmental interest. Citizens United v. FEC, 130 S. Ct. 876, 914 (2010) (quoting Buckley, 424 U.S. at 64, 66).

2. Arizona Law Does Not Compel Petitioners to Subsidize Hostile Speech

Petitioners' contrary claim is that the law should be subject to strict scrutiny and struck down because it "penalizes and deters free speech by forcing privately-funded candidates and their supporters to finance the dissemination of hostile political speech whenever they raise or spend private money ... above a spending limit." First Question Presented. They assert that Arizona's program forces non participating candidates to "subsidize hostile speech," Pets. Br. 41, and its establishment is "the functional equivalent of the compelled speech regime struck down in Pacific Gas & Elec. Co. v. Public Utilities Comm'n, 475 U.S. 1 (1986)." Pets. Br. 42.

In Buckley v. Valeo, this Court rejected a substantially similar challenge to the federal law providing public financing of Presidential elections, which was claimed to violate the First Amendment because it effectively required people "to finance the dissemination of ideas with which they disagree." 424 U.S. at 91 n.124. The Court observed that > [l]egislation to enhance these First Amendment values is the rule, not the exception. Our statute books are replete with laws providing financial assistance to the exercise of free speech, such as aid to public broadcasting and other forms of educational media, and preferential postal rates and anti-trust exemptions for newspapers. Id. at n.127.

On that reasoning, the Court rejected any presumption that the law was unconstitutional and dismissed First Amendment challenge to the public financing law. That holding controls here.

The distinguishing "facts" that support Petitioners' "compelled speech" claim are a creation of their own rhetoric, and bear no relation to the actual operation of Arizona's law. Petitioners claim that Arizona "conscript[s] [the] labor" of candidates who choose not to participate in public funding, Pets. Br. 55, and that politicians in Arizona are "being required to assist in the rebuttal of their own speech." Id. at. 51. Less colorfully, they claim that they are being required to pay for their political opponents' speech. Id. at 55.

These factual assertions are false. Petitioners are not having their labor conscripted or their funds used by their opponents. Instead, Arizona is subsidizing the speech of candidates who opt in to its public funding campaign finance regime. Petitioners disapprove of the manner of adjusting the public subsidies that participating candidates receive. But petitioners and other candidates and independent groups do not pay for that increase in their opponents' spending any more than they pay for the initial public spending subsidy. Just like the Presidential public financing at issue in Buckley, "the scheme involves no compulsion upon individuals to finance the dissemination of ideas with which they disagree." 424 U.S. at 91 n. 124.

Buckley v. Valeo is one of an unbroken line of cases in which the Court has drawn a distinction between laws that require a person to pay for or associate with speech with which he disagrees, see e.g. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 475 U.S. 1, and laws in which the government has chosen to subsidize one speaker and another unsubsidized speaker asserts that choice has burdened his speech rights, see, e.g., Finley, 524 U.S. 569; Rust, 500 U.S. 173.

Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., on which Petitioners' compelled speech argument principally relies, Pets. Br. 42, itself explicitly distinguishes on two separate grounds PG&E's compelled speech claim from the challenges to the public campaign financing system sustained in Buckley. Id. at 15. First, the requirement that PG&E disseminate the views of its opponents identified "a favored speaker" and "force[d] the speaker's opponent – not the taxpaying public – to assist in disseminating the speaker's message." Id. The Court held that "[t]his kind of favoritism goes well beyond the fundamentally content-neutral subsidies that we sustained in Buckley and in Regan v. Taxation With Representation of Washington, 461 U.S. 540 (1983)," and therefore "burdens the expression of the disfavored speaker." Id. at 14-15.

Second, the Court held that PG&E impermissibly was required "to associate with speech with which [it] may disagree," id. at 15, because the speech would have been disseminated in envelopes that PG&E owned and that bore its return address, id. at 18. The danger that PG&E would "be required to alter its own message as a consequence of the government's coercive action . . . [arose] from a content-based grant of access to private property." Id. at 16-17 (emphasis added).

In this case, by contrast, the public financing system is content-neutral and does not require any speaker to finance the speech of his or her opponents: both the initial public campaign funding and any subsequent adjustments are provided by "the taxpaying public." In addition, Arizona's law presents no risk that candidates or groups that make independent expenditures will be forced to associate with speech with which they disagree. Rather, all disbursements of these public funds will be paid to the campaign accounts of the candidates who will use them, and any speech enabled by these funds will bear those candidates' names pursuant to disclosure requirements. No one could possibly think that a publicly-funded candidate's advertisements were being endorsed by his privately-funded opponent.

We are aware of no case in which this Court has applied the compelled speech strict scrutiny standard in circumstances involving the speech effects of government subsidies that neither restrict nor compel private parties' speech. The fact that a non-participating candidate's spending might affect the amount of subsidy provided to a participating candidate raises none of the constitutional infirmities present in compelled speech cases like PG&E.

3. Strict Scrutiny Does Not Apply Because Arizona's Public Financing System Does Not Restrict Speech

Just as this is not a "compelled speech" case, neither is it a case challenging a law that directly restricts speech.

No candidate is compelled to participate in Arizona's campaign public financing regime. A candidate who chooses not to participate is free to spend unlimited funds on his campaign, and his independent supporters likewise are not limited in what they may spend on his behalf. The only rules that restrict nonparticipating candidates' activities are the background (and unchallenged) contribution limits and disclosure rules that were in place before Arizona implemented public financing and apply equally to participating candidates.

This case is thus unlike Davis. The federal "Millionaires Amendment" struck down in Davis penalized candidates who exercised their constitutional right to fund their campaigns with their own money by imposing on such candidates direct and asymmetrical restrictions on their speech rights – self-funded candidates operated under lower contribution limits than candidates who were not able to contribute substantial amounts to their own campaigns. Davis, 554 U.S. at 751.

The Court in that case did not strike down that law merely because it imposed "negative consequences on individuals and groups for choosing to exercise their First Amendment rights." Pets. Br. 42. It struck down the law because the "negative consequences" were a direct violation of self-financing candidate's constitutional rights.

Contribution limits are restrictions on speech. Government subsidies are not. While the "millionaire" candidate in Davis has a First Amendment right not to have his speech discriminatorily restricted when he exercises his First Amendment right to spend his money, the candidate who chooses to decline public funding has no analogous First Amendment right to stop someone else from receiving a public subsidy that is tailored so that the public funding remains a viable option even in a relatively more expensive political campaign. Davis does not control this case.

4. The Arizona Law Furthers Legitimate Governmental Interests

Petitioners' second claim is that Arizona's law is unconstitutional because it furthers an illegitimate purpose – assertedly "to equalize 'influence' and financial resources among competing candidates and interest groups." Second Question Presented. Once again Petitioners' argument is painted with too broad a brush.

Any public financing law could be said to have the effect of benefitting the less well financed candidate relative to the better financed candidate. If that were enough to invalidate a campaign finance law, no public financing law would survive – including the Presidential public funding law affirmed by the Court in Buckley. But that is not enough.

It is undisputed that Arizona's law, like all public financing laws, is intended to reduce the risk of corruption of the political process, and the appearance of such risk. It is equally undisputed that these are legitimate — indeed compelling — government interests. McConnell v. FEC, 540 U.S. 93, 136 (2003); FEC v. Nat'l Conservative Political Action Comm., 470 U.S. 480, 496-97 (1985); Buckley, 424 U.S. at 25-30, 38.

Petitioners claim that the law is nevertheless invalid because it also has an allegedly illegal "equalizing" effect. In support of their view that speech subsidies that could be said to favor the poor over the rich for that reason violate the First Amendment, Petitioners rely on Davis. But that reliance is once again misplaced, for two reasons.

First, as discussed above, supra p. 10, Davis is a case about a law that restricted speech, with all that implies. This is not.

Second, in Davis the asymmetrical contribution limits restricted self-financing candidates' speech without serving anticorruption interests. Davis took as its starting point the holding in Buckley that contribution restrictions were constitutional because they were justified by the compelling state interest in eliminating corruption or its appearance. Distinguishing Buckley, the Court in Davis then explained that the Millionaire's Amendment could not be justified by that same compelling state interest, since "discouraging use of personal funds disserves the anticorruption interest," and so the state could not rationally further that interest by providing non-self-funded candidates a higher contribution limit than self-funded candidates. 554 U.S. at 741. Instead, in Davis, the sole asserted government interest was to "level electoral opportunities for candidates of different personal wealth." Id. It was one of the principal holdings of Davis that this was not a legitimate governmental interest. Id.

But Arizona's law, in contrast, addresses corruption and the appearance of corruption. The assertion that, like any public financing law, it also could be said to have effect of improving the electoral opportunities of those with more limited access to private funds does not invalidate the law, or distinguish it from the law upheld in Buckley.

Petitioners and their amici make much of the assertion that the ballot initiative's drafters intended that the law have a "leveling" effect in addition to its anti-corruption purpose. But "leveling" by enhancing speech to make campaigns competitive is not unlawful, and even if it were "[i]t is a familiar principle of constitutional law that this Court will not strike down an otherwise constitutional statute on the basis of an alleged illicit legislative motive." United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 383 (1968). See also, e.g., City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S.

277, 291 (2000) (rejecting the argument that a ban on public nudity was "'aimed' at suppressing expression" because "one purpose of the ordinance [was] to combat harmful secondary effects").

The question is not the alleged mixed motive of the legislature, but rather whether "the inevitable effect of a statute on its face . . . abridged constitutional rights." O'Brien, 391 U.S. at 384, 385 (citing Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233 (1936), and Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339 (1960)). A.R.S. § 16-952 does not on its face have the "inevitable effect" of restricting speech. Indeed, as explained in Respondent's brief, p. 16, it has not appeared to deter political expenditures in Arizona even incidentally, and it has not deterred amicus SEIU's speech. To the contrary, the fact that roughly two thirds of candidates choose to participate in the system and one third do not suggests that this level of funding and method of adjustment is well-calibrated to ensure that public funding is attractive to candidates without making it irrational for some candidates to opt out, should they so choose.

The voters evidently concluded that such a regime best balanced the State's interest in reigning in campaign fundraising (and its attendant harms) with the interest in establishing a public funding regime that would continue to attract candidates even in races in which spending would be over the amount of the statutory thresholds. If Arizona can implement a public financing law, it can also implement reasonable measures to encourage candidates to participate in public financing, and to make public financing a reasonable choice even when candidates expect a campaign may generate a more-than-normal amount of political spending. These are legitimate state interests that are wholly unrelated to the suppression of speech.

5. The Challenged Trigger Provision Bears a Substantial Relation to The Law's Anti-Corruption Interests

The "trigger" of A.R.S. §16-952 bears a "substantial relation" to the accomplishment of Arizona's interest in reducing corruption and its appearance. Citizens United, 130 S. Ct. at 914 (quoting Buckley, 424 U.S. at 64). The trigger tailors the level of funding to the financial competitiveness of the race.

Arizona could have chosen to fund each campaign at the level of the cap, eliminating the feature of the law to which Petitioners object. But such a uniformly high funding rate would have resulted in a substantial drain on the state's budget, and would have led to a level of spending the state could reasonably determine was not generally necessary to inform the public and accomplish the law's other important purposes. So instead it determined to set funding at a level that it judged will be adequate in the normal case, and then to provide funding at the higher level (up to the statutory cap) when other spending in the campaign makes the lower amount insufficient to fund a competitive campaign.

The trigger thus furthers the same general anti-corruption purpose as the law of which it is a part. It makes the public financing system effective and efficient, supporting the law's anti-corruption purposes. Indeed, A.R.S. §16-952(C)(3) requires that independent expenditures in favor of participating candidates also be counted when determining how much funding other participating candidates will receive. The law in this way ensures that participating candidates have an appropriate funding level even when facing other participating candidates.

This system of tailoring the public subsidy to the financial competitiveness of the relevant races does not undermine its constitutionality; if anything, it strengthens it. If Arizona had instead simply funded all races at the maximum level, its system would have been closely parallel to the federal Presidential funding law the Court upheld in Buckley, but participating candidates in some less competitive races would have received substantially more funding than their non-participating opponents, wasting state resources and placing those non-participating candidates at a greater competitive disadvantage.

Calibrating the level of funding to reflect the other financial expenditures in the race also protects candidates' ability to opt out of the public financing system. It does so by limiting the risk that nonparticipants will be substantially outspent by a participating opponent. If Arizona had simply decided to disburse the maximum amount of funds to all participants rather than reserving most of the funds for competitive races, there would be many more cases in which participating candidates substantially outspent nonparticipating candidates.

Candidates are often uncertain regarding their private fundraising abilities. Had they been faced with the prospect of such generously funded participating opponents, many likely would have felt the safer course would be to participate and receive the same subsidy. By instead adopting a more carefully calibrated method for calculating subsidy levels, Arizona voters ensured that viable nonparticipating candidates can safely opt out of the system without fearing they might be massively outspent by participating opponents. Because participants are guaranteed only a modest subsidy initially and receive more only if their opponents have raised substantial additional sums, viable nonparticipating candidates can feel safe in the knowledge that they will rarely be outspent.

Petitioners nevertheless argue that they suffer disadvantages if they opt out of the system because their opponents will have access to public funding at the statutory threshold level and, if they and their independent supporters spend above that amount, their opponents will receive increased public funding up to the maximum set by statute. They complain that knowledge of these aspects of the law will affect their spending decisions, and in particular will influence candidates to spend less than they otherwise might. The public finance law might even persuade a candidate to forgo private financing and to opt into the public financing system. This regulation, Petitioners complain, thus places them "on the horns of a dilemma" as they adjust their speech conduct to the regulatory regime. Pets. Br. 42.

A similar dilemma faces all candidates who are considering whether to accept the benefits and burdens of participating in any public financing system, including the federal Presidential public financing system upheld in Buckley. The existence of the public funding option, and the fact that opponents may choose to accept public funds, will influence the choices candidates make. The availability of public funds up to a certain limit discourages candidates from choosing to spend above that limit by forcing them to reject public funds in order to do so.

But most regulations put regulated parties "on the horns of a dilemma": They must choose whether to suffer whatever burden the regulation creates or to forgo the behavior that is being regulated. A person wishing to make a political independent expenditure, for example, must evaluate the benefits of making that expenditure against the burdens of complying with substantial disclosure and disclaimer rules. A person wishing to make a political contribution must weigh the benefit he hopes to gain against the cost of having his name made public, and the need to maintain records so that he does not inadvertently violate contribution limits if he makes additional contributions. If the mere fact that regulation of First Amendment conduct puts choices to the regulated party gave rise to strict scrutiny, every campaign finance regulation would be constitutionally suspect. That is not the law and that should not be the law.

The choice to reject public financing in Arizona evidently is a viable one. Many candidates – including some Petitioners – have chosen to opt out of the public system and continue to raise and spend unlimited public funds and to win elections after doing so. Candidates who opt out have to work to raise more funds privately, but they obtain several other advantages. Many candidates expect or hope that they will raise more the maximum funding their participating opponents can receive under A.R.S. § 16-952 and that being able to outspend their participating opponents will help them win. It is not only candidates who expect to raise such large amounts who might decide to opt out, however. Other candidates might predict that a higher level of campaign spending, even if done equally by both campaigns, will redound to their benefit because they believe the strength of their arguments is superior or that their staff will design more effective ads. In addition, even when candidates do not initially predict that a higher level of spending will aid their campaigns, they may opt out because of the value of retaining the ability to initiate a change in the level of the spending in the race if, and only if, they think it will help them capture or retain the lead. Because only nonparticipants may choose whether to exceed the initial spending caps, many might rationally opt out of the system in order to obtain this strategic advantage over nonparticipating opponents. These are not choices that on their face abridge the constitutional rights of non participating candidates.

For all of these reasons, the Arizona "trigger" provisions advance the statute's important anti-corruption purposes and pass constitutional muster.

CONCLUSION

The decision of the court of appeals should be affirmed.

STATEMENT OF INTEREST[1]

The Union for Reform Judaism ("URJ") consists of approximately 900 member congregations dedicated to the practice of Reform Judaism in North America. For the past fifty years through its Religious Action Center ("RAC"), the URJ has been, and remains, actively engaged in many of the ethical and moral issues confronting our country. The URJ establishes positions on these crucial questions by resolutions presented to its representative bodies, including its biennial plenary congregational assemblies and its Board of Trustees. Both the URJ itself, and the organization of Rabbis serving the Reform Jewish Movement – the Central Conference of American Rabbis – have passed repeated resolutions supporting campaign finance reform as of central importance to the effective functioning of a democratic nation.

For amicus URJ, these resolutions reflect prescient ancient doctrine. The Talmud – a collection of Rabbinic writings that form the basis of Jewish law – warns that "as soon as a man receives a gift from another he becomes so well disposed towards him that he becomes like his own person, and no man sees himself in the wrong." Talmud, Tractate Ketubot, 105b. Even from the days of the Pentateuch, our sages have warned against undue influence which "blind the eyes of the discerning and upset the plea of the just." Deuteronomy, 16:19. As the ancients recognized, any time something of value changes hands, the potential exists for those in position of power to see the world in a tinted hue. Public financing, when voluntarily accepted, provides resources for candidates to make their case to the public in a manner that is free from any opportunity of unintentional distortion. Publicly financed candidates should not be penalized for voluntarily accepting funding that accomplishes this ancillary good, and matching funds ensure the means to remain competitive in a manner that facilitates additional speech rather than restricting the speech of others.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

As the Ninth Circuit succinctly summarized:

> This is a challenge to the constitutionality of the "matching funds" provision of Arizona's Citizens Clean Elections Act, Ariz. Rev. Stat § 16-952. The Act establishes a legal framework within which the State of Arizona may provide public financing to candidates for state political offices. A candidate who chooses to participate in the Act's voluntary public financing scheme relinquishes her or his right to raise private campaign contributions. Instead, she or he receives an initial grant of funds from the state to spend on her or his campaign. The challenged provision ensures that if the participating candidate has an > opponent who is not participating in the public financing system and whose campaign expenditures or contributions exceed a threshold set by the Act, she or he receives additional matching funds from the State.

McComish v. Bennett, 611 F.3d 510, 513.

But the additional matching funds are not unlimited:

> During both elections, matching funds, combined with the initial grant, may not exceed three times the amount of the initial grant. Ariz. Rev. Stat. § 16-952(E). This means that a nonparticipating candidate who is able to raise funds in excess of three times the amount of his or her participating candidate's initial grant gains a potentially unlimited financial advantage in the campaign.

Id. at p. 517. Nevertheless, it is the non-participants who are seeking to invalidate the statute.

The Ninth Circuit rejected the challenge and upheld the statute. As Judge Kleinfeld noted in concurrence, "Because the challenged scheme imposes no contribution or spending limits, it does not restrict speech at all. . . ." Id. at p. 528. Judge Kleinfeld went on to explain:

> But the First Amendment does not protect the candidate's interest in winning, just his interest in being heard. There is no First Amendment right to make one's opponent speak less, nor is there a First Amendment > right to prohibit the government from subsidizing one's opponent, especially when the same subsidy is available to the challenger if the challenger accepts the same terms as his opponent.

Id. at p. 529.

From Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976) through Citizens United v. Federal Election Commission, ___ U.S. ___, 130 S.Ct. 876 (2010), the consistent core teaching of this Court's campaign finance jurisprudence is "to assure (the) unfettered interchange of ideas for the bringing about of political and social changes desired by the people." Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. at 14, quoting Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 484 (1957). Thus, where, as here, the campaign finance regime enhances, rather than restricts, debate it not only passes constitutional muster, but indeed furthers the goals and objectives of the First Amendment.

Accordingly, and for the reasons set forth below, amicus respectfully requests that the decision of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals be affirmed.

ARGUMENT

In sustaining limits on campaign contributions but not on expenditures, the Buckley Court established the applicable analytical framework:

The First Amendment affords the broadest protection to such political expression in order "to assure (the) unfettered interchange of ideas for the bringing about of political and social changes desired by the people." Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 484, 77 S.Ct. 1304, 1308, 1 L.Ed.2d 1498 (1957). Although First Amendment protections are not confined to "the exposition of ideas," Winters v. New York, 333 U.S. 507, 510, 68 S.Ct. 665, 667, 92 L.Ed. 840 (1948), "there is practically universal agreement that a major purpose of that Amendment was to protect the free discussion of governmental affairs, . . . of course includ(ing) discussions of candidates. . . ." Mills v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214, 218, 86 S.Ct. 1434, 1437, 16 L.Ed.2d 484 (1966). This no more than reflects our "profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open." New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270, 84 S.Ct. 710, 721, 11 L.Ed.2d 686 (1964). In a republic where the people are sovereign, the ability of the citizenry to make informed choices among candidates for office is essential, for the identities of those who are elected will inevitably shape the course that we follow as a nation. As the Court observed in Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, 401 U.S. 265, 272, 91 S.Ct. 621, 625, 28 L.Ed.2d 35 (1971), "it can hardly be doubted that the constitutional guarantee has its fullest and most urgent application precisely to the conduct of campaigns for political office." 424 U.S. at 14-15.

The very purpose of the First Amendment is to "secure the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources." Id. at 49-50.

Just last year in Citizens United, supra, the Court again re-emphasized the importance of the "open marketplace of ideas protected by the First Amendment." 130 S.Ct. at 906. Speaking for the majority, Justice Kennedy there wrote that "it is inherent in the nature of the political process that voters must be free to obtain information from diverse sources in order to determine how to cast their votes," id. at 899, and again that "it is our law and our tradition that more speech, not less, is the governing rule." Id. at 911.

Citizens United overruled Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U.S. 652 (1990), adopting the rationale of Justice Kennedy's Austin dissent which noted "we confront here society's interest in free and informed discussion on political issues, a discourse vital to the capacity for self government." 494 U.S. 698-699.

The touchstone, then, of this Court's analysis in each campaign finance decision is whether on balance the restriction promotes or inhibits speech. Those schemes that on the whole restrict speech, have been rejected as in Citizen's United, while those that do not are upheld. So, for example, this Court has uniformly sustained "disclaimer and disclosure requirements," even though they "may burden the ability to speak but they 'impose no ceiling on campaign-related activities' and 'do not prevent anyone from speaking.'" Citizens United, 130 S.Ct. at 914, quoting Buckley, 424 U.S. at 64 and McConnell v. Federal Elections Commission, 540 U.S. 93, 201 (2003).

Likewise, by memorandum in Republican National Committee v. Federal Election Commission, 445 U.S. 955 (1980), this Court affirmed Judge Mansfield's decision on behalf of a three judge District Court, 487 F.Supp. 280 (S.D.N.Y. 1980), sustaining the Presidential Election Campaign Act of 1971 ("PECFA") against constitutional challenge. There, the plaintiffs attacked conditioning eligibility for public campaign funds upon compliance with expenditure limitations. In rejecting that contention, Judge Mansfield, affirmed by this Court without comment, wrote that "The Fund Act merely provides a presidential candidate with an additional funding alternative which he or she would not otherwise have and does not deprive the candidate of other methods of funding which may be thought to provide greater or more effective exercise of rights of communication or association than would public funding." 487 F.Supp. at 285. Judge Mansfield concluded that "as long as the candidate remains free to engage in unlimited private funding and spending instead of limited public funding, the law does not violate the First Amendment rights of the candidate or supporters." Id. at 284.

The First Circuit Court of Appeals in Daggett v. Commission on Governmental Ethics and Election Practices, 205 F.3d 445 (1st Cir. 2000) applied the rationale of Republican National Committee, supra, in upholding Maine's campaign finance statute. 205 F.3d at 467. Using a mechanism quite similar to Arizona's statute, Maine provides an initial grant, and then a dollar for dollar match of funds raised by non-participating opponents above the initial grant, up to double of that first grant. Plaintiffs challenged the matching funds scheme, positing, as the Circuit Court characterized it, "a claim of a First Amendment right to outraise and outspend an opponent, a right that they complain is burdened by the matching funds clause." 205 F.3d at 464. Recognizing that the matching funds provision enables response and thereby broadens the marketplace of ideas, the First Circuit soundly rejected that argument in reliance on Buckley's holding that enhancing debate is precisely the object of the First Amendment:

> Moreover, the provision of matching funds does not indirectly burden donors' speech and associational rights. Appellants misconstrue the meaning of the First Amendment's protection of their speech. They have no right to speak free from response – the purpose of the First Amendment is to "'secure the "widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources."'" Buckley, 424 U.S. at 49, 96 S.Ct. 612 (citations omitted); see Pacific Gas & Elec. Co. v. Public Utils. Comm'n, 475 U.S. 1, 14, 106 S.Ct. 903, 89 L.Ed.2d 1 (1986) (there exists no right to speak "free from vigorous debate"). The public funding system in no way limits the quantity of speech one can engage in or the amount of money one can spend engaging in > political speech, nor does it threaten censure or penalty for such expenditures. These facts allow us comfortably to conclude that the provision of matching funds based on independent expenditures does not create a burden on speakers' First Amendment rights.

In language equally applicable to the Arizona statute, the First Circuit further explained why matching funds do not burden the non-participant:

> We cannot say, however, that the matching funds create an exceptional benefit for the participating candidate. Maine's Act does not provide an unlimited release of the expenditure ceiling – it allocates matching funds for the participating candidate of only two times the initial disbursement. Thus, a non-participating candidate retains the ability to outraise and outspend her participating opponent with abandon after that limit is reached. Further, the non-participating candidate holds the key as to how much and at what time the participant receives matching funds.
>
>
> Moreover, the participating candidate, not having any way of foreseeing the timing or amounts of any matching funds, is unable to budget, to commit time for radio or television, or to plan, produce, or distribute printed material.

205 F.3d 468-469.

In North Carolina Right to Life Committee Fund For Independent Political Expenditures v. Leake, 524 F.3d 427 (4th Cir. 2008), the Fourth Circuit upheld an identical North Carolina matching funds statute, finding that matching funds further First Amendment values as held in Buckley, and do not chill or penalize the non-participant.

> Our analysis must begin with the Supreme Court's decision in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 96 S.Ct. 612, 46 L.Ed.2d 659 (1976). The Court made clear in Buckley that public financing of political campaigns does not, in itself, violate the First Amendment. 424 U.S. at 57 n. 65, 96 S.Ct. 612. In fact, the Court observed that the Federal Election Campaign Act's (FECA's) public financing scheme "furthers, not abridges, pertinent First Amendment values" because it "facilitate[s] and enlarge[s] public discussion and participation in the electoral process, goals vital to a self-governing people." Id. at 92-93, 96 S.Ct. 612.

> The thrust of the plaintiffs' First Amendment argument against the matching funds provision is that it "chill[s] and penalize[s] contributions and independent expenditures made on behalf of [nonparticipating] candidates." Appellants' Br. at 32. The plaintiffs argue that their political speech is chilled because spending in excess of the specified > trigger results in public funds being disbursed to a participating candidate whom the plaintiffs do not support. Therefore, according to the plaintiffs, they choose to spend less money (and thus engage in less political speech) in order to prevent candidates they oppose from receiving public funds.

>
> The plaintiffs remain free to raise and spend as much money, and engage in as much political speech, as they desire. They will not be jailed, fined, or censured if they exceed the trigger amounts. The only (arguably) adverse consequence that will occur is the distribution of matching funds to any candidates participating in the public financing system. But this does not impinge on the plaintiffs' First Amendment rights. To the contrary, the distribution of these funds "furthers, not abridges, pertinent First Amendment values" by ensuring that the participating candidate will have an opportunity to engage in responsive speech. See Buckley, 424 U.S. at 92-93, 96 S.Ct. 612.

524 F.3d at 437.[2] See also Gable v. Patton, 142 F.3d 940 (6th Cir. 1998) (upholding Kentucky's post-trigger matching statute, even though post-trigger public match was double the amount raised by non-participant).

[2] Thus, contrary to the amicus brief for the Center for Competitive Politics (at p. 13), matching funds do not intervene in the debate; they in truth enable and enhance the debate.

Before Davis v. Federal Election Committee, 554 U.S. 724 (2008), the one outlier taking a contrary position on matching funds was Day v. Holahan, 34 F.3d 1356 (8th Cir.1994), which found a chilling effect on the speech of the non-participant. But the First Circuit in Daggett rejected Day, succinctly identifying the flaw in its rationale: "We cannot adopt the logic of Day, which equates responsive speech with an impairment to the initial speaker." 205 F.3d at 465. Moreover, the Eighth Circuit's subsequent decision in Rosenstiel v. Rodriguez, 101 F.3d 1544 (8th Cir. 1996), ruling constitutional a statute that removes participants' expenditure limits when a non-participant raises private funds in excess of a stated trigger, calls Day's vitality into question. The Daggett Court explains:

> The State, as well as amici, assert that Day was called into question by the Eighth Circuit's subsequent decision in Rosenstiel v. Rodriguez, 101 F.3d 1544 (8th Cir.1996), which held that a provision waiving the expenditure ceiling for a participating candidate once a non-participating opponent reached a certain threshold did not burden the non-participant's First Amendment rights. See id. at 1553. Although Day involved independent expenditures while Rosenstiel regarded candidate expenditures, the logic of the two cases is somewhat inconsistent. In Rosenstiel, the fact that a candidate's expenditure triggered the release of his opponent's spending > limitation did not burden his First Amendment rights; yet in Day, the fact that a non-candidate's spending triggered matching funds burdened the speaker's First Amendment rights. We recognize that there may be a difference between expenditures by a candidate and those by a non-candidate, but nonetheless agree that the continuing vitality of Day is open to question.

205 F.3d at 464, n.25.

Accordingly, "until Davis, [supra], these [matching] schemes were generally considered constitutionally permissible." Note, 122 Harv. L. Rev. 375, 381 (2008). They have also enjoyed wide-spread public support.

Faith communities have long recognized the importance of campaign finance reform. "The issue of campaign financing is far more than a political matter. It goes to the heart of the ethical and moral life of a nation." General Board of Church & Society of the United Methodist Church, Resolution #5071, 2008 BOR. In August, 1999, more than 20 Christian denominations or churches, the Unitarian Universalist Association and the amicus Union for Reform Judaism ("URJ") formed Religious Leaders for Campaign Finance Reform, declaring, through Rabbi David Saperstein of the URJ's Religious Action Center that, "campaign finance reform is not an esoteric technical issue of election regulations, but one that goes to the essence of the ethical and moral life of our nation." New York Times, Aug. 21, 1999, p. A9, col. 1. And so in 1984, the amicus URJ[3] explicitly endorsed public campaign finance through matching funds. Resolution, Congressional Campaign Finance Reform, Board of Trustees, May, 1984.

Other faith communities reach the same conclusion. In 2008 the Assembly of the United States Presbyterian Church endorsed campaign finance legislation containing matching funds provisions. Lift Every Voice: Democracy, Voting Rights and Electoral Reform, Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), 2008, p. 22. The Church Assembly's Stated Clerk recalled in support the words of Reinhold Niebuhr that "man's (human) capacity for justice makes democracy possible but man's (human) capacity for injustice makes democracy necessary." Id. at p. 1.

However, "The more that access to elected officials is linked to wealth, the greater the likelihood that the civil rights of the poor and minorities will be eroded. Without major campaign finance reforms (i.e., clean money reforms that provide public financing of elections), the prospects for future public policies that support social and economic justice are extremely limited." Campaign Finance Reform, 2000 Action of Immediate Witness, Universalist Association of Congregations. Consequently, both the Universalist Association and the NAACP have explicitly endorsed campaign finance reforms in all relevant particulars similar to the Arizona matching funds regime and the very similar Maine statute upheld in Daggett, supra. See Campaign Finance Reform, 2000 Action of Immediate Witness, Universalist Association of Congregations; and Action Alert, Feb. 1, 2010, NAACP-Supported Public Financing of Congressional Campaigns Bill Introduced in the House and Senate.

Even so avid a guardian of First Amendment rights as the American Civil Liberties Union supports voluntary public financing plans provided "they ensure candidates have a true choice as to whether to participate and provide sufficient and equitable funding for all legally qualified candidates to run an effective campaign." Release, April 19, 2010, ACLU Board Addresses Campaign Finance Policy.

Since Davis, supra, two Circuits have felt compelled by that decision to hold matching funds statutes unconstitutional. Green Party of Connecticut v. Garfield, 616 F.3d 213 (2d Cir. 2010); Scott v. Roberts, 612 F.3d 1279 (11th Cir. 2010). With all due respect, these decisions misread Davis.

First, Davis was not a matching funds case. Rather, there, if a candidate exceeded a limit of personal expenditures on his/her campaign, the ceiling on contributions which his/her opponent could accept tripled, while the non-participant remained subject to the original cap. Because this put the self-funding candidate at a serious disadvantage, the Court held it unconstitutionally burdened his ability to spend his own money. The reading of Davis by the Green Party and Scott Courts:

> oversimplifies and overbroadens the Court's reasoning, and it ignores the critical constitutional distinction between government restrictions on speech and government subsidies of speech. While the Court may well set its sights on asymmetrical public funding, Davis is hardly the warning shot these commentators think it is. (Emphasis added)

Note, 122 Harv. L. Rev. 375, 381 (2008).

Davis is factually inapposite beyond this distinction. Davis treated similarly situated candidates asymmetrically. This important distinction is emphasized by the observation in Davis that if the "elevated contribution limits applied across the board, Davis would not have any basis for challenging those limits." 554 U.S. at 737.

Conversely here – as upheld by this Court in Buckley, supra, and Republican National Committee, supra – public "opt-in" financing schemes create two different groups of candidates based on the candidates' own choices. Opt-in programs bear limitations which a candidate weighs in making a determination whether to participate. Thus, unlike in Davis, the non-participating candidate in Arizona is never similarly situated and has a choice of various options available to all candidates. Indeed, by not opting in, the Arizona privately financed candidate at all times retains the potential to outspend the publicly funded candidate since matching funds are capped.

Neither Davis, nor any other decision of this Court undermines this core tenet of public campaign funding jurisprudence: so long as the statute at issue enhances rather than limits the marketplace of political ideas it furthers, and does not run afoul of, the First Amendment. This Court has never struck down a matching public funds program, and nor should it start now. The First Circuit in Daggett v. Commission on Governmental Ethics and Election Practices, supra, the Fourth Circuit in North Carolina Right to Life Committee Fund For Independent Political Expenditures v. Leake, supra and the Ninth Circuit in this case have it right: public matching funds in the manner and method of the Arizona statute only enhance and improve the public political debate, for the benefit of us all.

The thrust of Petitioner's contrary argument is that assured publicly funded responsive speech burdens contributions to non-participant candidates. But even if this were true, this Court has never subjected any restraints on contributions to strict scrutiny. Fed. Election Comm'n v. Colo. Repub. Fed. Campaign Comm., 533 U.S. 431 (2001) (observing that ever since Buckley the Court has understood that limits on expenditures deserve closer scrutiny than restrictions on contributions); Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Gov't PAC, 528 U.S. 377 (2000) (construing Buckley as providing that contribution limitations warrant less compelling justification than expenditure limitations); Fed. Election Comm'n v. Massachusetts Citizens for Life, Inc., 479 U.S. 238 (1986) ("We have consistently held that restrictions on contributions require less compelling justification than restrictions on independent spending").

Rather, from Buckley through Citizen's United, this Court has repeatedly and consistently held any slight burden on adverse party contributions because of public funding does not, and should not, outweigh the important public value of the fullest possible open and free political discourse, an objective only furthered by the Arizona statute, and matching funds statutes like it. As the late Judge Skelly Wright recognized 35 years ago,

> Nothing in the First Amendment prevents us, as a political community, from making certain modest but important changes in the kind of process we want for selecting our political leaders. Nothing bars us from choosing to move closer to the kind of community process that lies at the heart of the First Amendment conception – a process wherein ideas and candidates prevail because of their inherent worth, not because prestigious or wealthy people line up in favor, and not because one side puts on the more elaborate show of support.

[4] Lest there be any doubt, the Ninth Circuit majority details a long and sordid history of quid pro quo corruption in Arizona politics. 611 F.3d at 514-515. This, of itself, is a sufficiently compelling state interest to survive even strict scrutiny. Buckley, supra; Vote Choice, Inc. v. DiStefano, 4 F.3d 26, 39-40 (1st Cir. 1993). A fortiori it suffices here.

INTEREST OF AMICUS CURIAE[1]

The Wyoming Liberty Group believes that the great strength of Wyoming rests in the ambition and entrepreneurialism of ordinary citizens. While limited government is conducive to freedom, unchecked government promotes the suppression of individual liberty. In a state where the people are sovereign, the Group's mission is to provide research and education supportive of the founding principles of free societies. Its mission is to facilitate the practical exercise of liberty in Wyoming through public policy options that are faithful to protecting property rights, individual liberty, privacy, federalism, free markets, and decentralized decision-making. The Wyoming Liberty Group promotes the enhancement of liberty to foster a thriving, vigorous, and prosperous civil society, true to Wyoming's founding vision. The issues presented in this case are of interest to the Wyoming Liberty Group because they involve the fundamental, and threatened, right of citizens to freely participate and share their point of view in the electoral and political process.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

1. Arizona's experiment in speech leveling suffers from similar flaws found in other coerced-speech cases, rendering it invalid under any level of scrutiny. The Ninth Circuit's failure to value the import of free speech in public life has undone the chilling effects doctrine.

2. This Court should affirm its chilling effects doctrine, affording bright line adjudication and remedial standards for all speakers nationwide.

3. More than one thousand pages of injuries, expert testimony, and evidence submitted in the Joint Appendix explain why this Court should liberalize its chilling effects doctrine. The Ninth Circuit's manipulation of the chilling effects doctrine should be reversed to establish salient standards protective of representative speech.

4. This Court should announce an easily understood chilling effects doctrine that would afford future speakers streamlined methods of adjudicating free speech challenges.

ARGUMENT

The speech levelers have returned. Before this Court stands the muting howl of egalitarianism.[1] An intense interest in speech handicapping – the very interest deemed antithetical to the First Amendment by this Court in Buckley v. Valeo – finds itself increasingly wed to campaign finance systems around the nation. 424 U.S. 1, 49 (1976) (The "concept that government may restrict the speech of some elements of our society in order to enhance the relative voice of others is wholly foreign to the First Amendment"). The Constitution demands a simple divorce, forever severing this Bergeronesque interest from this Court's First Amendment jurisprudence.

I. Nothing Clean About Clean Elections: Only the Anointed May Speak

Arizona's experimentation with the speech leveling effects of the Citizens Clean Elections Act currently stands before this Court for constitutional review. The system that dares not speak its own name – The Arizona Speech Handicapping Project – imposes a carefully designed system to favor speakers who curry favor with the state while silencing those outside the fold. Curiously labeled clean, Arizona's system ensures that real injuries are worked against speakers just because they wish to have nothing to do with the state's "Clean Elections" project.

[1] See A.R.S. § 16-940(A) (declaring the purpose of Arizona's "Clean Elections" to make clean all political discourse and elections "by diminishing the influence of special-interest money").

Born out of a desire to limit the harms of briberies and other illicit dealings like those found arising out of the AZscam controversy, the people of Arizona passed the Citizens' Clean Elections Act by popular initiative in 1998.[3] Like using a sledgehammer to extinguish the nuisance of a cricket's chirp, Arizona's project runs far and wide over protected speech and association in pursuing its goal of political purity. Not content with being overbroad, the system's focus is lopsided due to reliance on speech-inhibiting "matching funds." A.R.S. § 16-952(A)-(C). As such, it does very little to combat real corruption found in quid pro quo arrangements of the tried-and-true Buckley variety, while doing a great deal to otherwise limit and abridge speech through its matching funds program.

In a move of marketing genius, matching funds are touted as a means to "enable" the "speech of [traditional candidates'] opponents" rendering them, at least superficially, as constitutionally suspect as Quaker Oats. McComish v. Bennett, 611 F.3d 510, 524 (2010). All bravos for clever titles aside, when examined in the deeper context of this Court's First Amendment jurisprudence, Arizona's matching fund program establishes content-based speech triggers that work real, if sometimes difficult to detect, injuries against political speakers that must be stricken unless the law is narrowly tailored to serve a compelling governmental interest. See, e.g., Republican Party of Minnesota v. White, 536 U.S. 765, 774-75 (2002); Eu v. San Francisco County Democratic Central Comm., 489 U.S. 214, 222 (1989).

a. Matching Funds and This Court's Coerced Speech Cases

This case would present little controversy if the "Clean Elections" system was just a rising tide that lifted all First Amendment boats. See Davis v. FEC, 554 U.S. 724, 737 (2008) (had the Federal Election Campaign Act "simply raised the contribution limits for all candidates, Davis' argument would plainly fail"). Instead, Arizona's project achieves another interest entirely: Speech redistribution. This is accomplished by affording special benefits only to state-favored candidates. See A.R.S. § 16-952(A)-(C).

The primary purpose of Arizona's "Clean Elections" system is found in an interest thought traditionally adverse to the First Amendment – "diminishing the influence of special-interest money." A.R.S. § 16-940(A). Stated another way, Arizona's project aims to reduce the influence of some speakers while enhancing the influence of others, namely those favored by the state as "clean" candidates. Independent voices need not apply.

The "Clean Elections" system found in Arizona closely resembles the speech redistributing program before this Court in Davis, 554 U.S. 724 (2008). There, this Court struck down an asymmetrical contribution limit scheme because the "vigorous exercise of the right to use personal funds to finance campaign speech produce[d] fundraising advantages for opponents in the competitive context of electoral politics." Id. at 739. Unsatisfied with the disastrous speech leveling effects of the Millionaire's Amendment found in Davis, Arizona goes where few states have gone before. It delivers actual, rather than hypothetical, cold-hard-cash benefits to one class of candidates: Those favored by the state, the "clean." Chilling.

What this Court noted in Davis holds true: Laws that apply uniformly and which respect the bounds of the First Amendment will ordinarily pass scrutiny. But when government enacts uneven, asymmetrical, lopsided burdens that are triggered due to disfavored speech by the state, or which picks winners and losers out of the marketplace of ideas, serious constitutional problems arise. See, e.g., Pacific Gas & Elec. Co v. Public Util. Comm'n of Cal., 475 U.S. 1 (1986) (plurality opinion); Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974). Arizona enjoys no authority to "license one side of a debate to fight freestyle, while requiring the other to follow Marquis of Queensbury Rules," but that is precisely what "clean elections" achieves. R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377, 392 (1992).

It is helpful to examine this Court's trilogy of coerced speech case sets in order to see why Arizona's project is unconstitutional. Pinpointing the unique burdens found in each line of cases illustrates that Arizona's "Clean Elections" system is simply more of what has come before the Court in the past: Unoriginal, state-centered efforts to prop up certain speakers while hushing disfavored speakers.

A first line of coerced speech cases ("Carrying Cases"), represented by Miami Herald Publishing Co., involve regulatory programs where: Government invokes a supposed authority to set (1) speech triggers that demand supplementary (2) coerced support for others' speech, and which include (3) direct cost, space, or physical burdens. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 475 U.S. 1; Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705 (1977); Miami Herald, 418 U.S. 241.[4] The result in each

[4] Red Lion Broadcasting v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969) is a notable exception to this trend. Red Lion is an anomaly in First Amendment jurisprudence and relates to the scarcity of access to public airwaves. Beyond that, the Court noted the precariousness of the doctrine in its opinion by explaining that "if experience with the administration of those doctrines indicates that they have the net effect of reducing rather than enhancing the volume and quality of coverage, there will be time enough to reconsider the constitutional implications." Id. at 393. The resulting validity of Red Lion is questionable. 1985 Federal Communications Commission, Fairness Doctrine Report, 102 F.C.C.2d 143, 158-96 (1985) (where the Federal Communication Commission explains that the Fairness Doctrine inhibits, rather instance is without much guesswork: Government possesses no ability to adjust our veritable marketplace of ideas through contrived traps, triggers, and talliates. Miami Herald, 418 U.S. at 247 ("Government-enforced right of access inescapably 'dampens the vigor and limits the variety of public debate'"). Indeed, this Court reaffirmed in Riley v. National Fed. of the Blind of North Carolina, Inc. that "[t]he right to speak and the right to refrain from speaking are complementary components of the broader concept of individual freedom of mind." 487 U.S. 781, 797 (1988) (internal quotation marks omitted).

A second line of cases ("Non-Carrying Cases"), as represented by Davis, involve: (1) Speech triggers that coerce private individuals to (2) support ideological opponents, but which (3) lack direct cost, space, or physical burdens. 554 U.S. 724 (striking down a system that penalized speakers for the "vigorous exercise of the right to use personal funds to finance campaign speech"); Day v. Holahan, 34 F.3d 1356, 1360 (8th Cir. 1994) ("The knowledge that a candidate who one does not want to be elected will have her spending limits increased and will receive a public subsidy equal to half the amount of the independent expenditure, as a direct result of that independent expenditure, chills the free exercise of that protected speech"); Buckley, 424 U.S. at 57 n.65 than promotes, the First Amendment and questions the constitutional validity of Red Lion Broadcasting).

(Congress "may engage in public financing of election campaigns and may condition acceptance of public funds on an agreement by the candidate to abide by specified expenditure limitations" though such conditions must be constitutional and non-coercive). In that sense, these cases are one step removed from the first in that they do not demand would-be speakers to directly carry the message of their opponents. Even so, this Court has found it damning enough that speech triggers invoke inhibitions against speech in the first place, rendering them constitutionally void. When government demands that speakers are forced to choose between the "First Amendment right to engage in unfettered political speech" and speech triggers that benefit their ideological opponents, the First Amendment wins. Davis, 554 U.S. at 726.

A third line of cases ("Subsidizing Cases"), as represented by National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, include an absence of speech triggers with indirect coerced support for controversial speech, and do not involve cost, space, or physical burdens. 524 U.S. 569 (1998). Because this third class merely creates more speech without disincentivizing others, this Court has upheld these programs. See, e.g., Finley, id.; United States v. American Library Ass'n, 539 U.S. 194 (2003) (plurality opinion) (upholding the requirement of installing Internet content filters before libraries could receive federal subsidies). Thus, where government makes available a speech or speech-enabling subsidy to everyone, this Court has found no cognizable First Amendment harm.

It is important to note that in the Non-Carrying Cases, no direct ownership, physical burden, or cost disincentives were imposed on would-be speakers by the state, yet the programs were equally repugnant under the Constitution. These cases all involve the furtherance of this Court's recognition of the import in protecting the individual freedom of mind. Stated more concretely, government attempts to favor some discussion at the expense of disfavored speech "transcends constitutional limitations on their power and invades the sphere of intellect and spirit which it is the purpose of the First Amendment to our Constitution to reserve from all official control." Wooley, 430 U.S. at 714 (quoting West Virginia State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 642 (1943)).

The Non-Carrying line of cases proves an observation of import, namely that this Court has taken seriously the need to protect against self-censorship that occurs from the operation of laws that accrue select benefits to some because others exercised their First Amendment rights. This is so because even without "direct government censorship," self-censorship "is no less a burden on speech that is susceptible to constitutional challenge." Day, 34 F.3d at 1360; see also City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publishing Co., 486 U.S. 750, 757-58 (1988). While government may become more adept at stifling speech through quiet and subtle regimes of self-censorship, a clarification of this Court's chilling effects doctrine would help protect the full scope of the First Amendment from speech handicapping programs nationwide.

Arizona's "Clean Elections" project is a carefully constructed program designed to afford speech benefits to a limited class while ensuring that disfavored speech will be dampened. As discussed more thoroughly in Section III.A, infra, Arizona's project works cognizable harms against those independent of the state ("unclean" or "traditional" candidates) just for speaking against those who curry favor with the state. The remaining question is whether Petitioners should be forced to shoulder the burden of compiling lengthy expert opinions, affidavits, and protracted evidentiary support just to speak or whether this Court's chilling effects doctrine suggests an easier and more direct remedy of constitutional injuries of this ilk. See, e.g., Citizens United v. FEC, 130 S.Ct. 876, 889 (2010) ("The First Amendment does not permit laws that force speakers to retain a campaign finance attorney, conduct demographic marketing research, or seek declaratory rulings before discussing the most salient political issues of our day"). The Ninth Circuit's cursory invocation of intermediate scrutiny while imposing daunting evidentiary requirements on would-be speakers must be reversed by this Court.

b. Strict Scrutiny is Warranted for Speech Triggers Like Those Found in Arizona

A keystone principle of First Amendment jurisprudence rests in this simple rule: "government may not regulate [speech or actions] based on hostility – or favoritism – towards the underlying message expressed." R.A.V., 505 U.S. at 386. That principle goes a step further because it is of no particular defense that Arizona's project might not discriminate against particular viewpoints. The First Amendment demands that speech handicapping regimes which inhibit "public discussion of an entire topic" are equally invalid. Consolidated Edison Co. of New York, Inc. v. Power Service Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 530, 538 (1980). In short, "the First Amendment means that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter, or its content." Police Dept. of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 95 (1972).

Arizona's "Clean Elections" system is a carefully marketed government censorship program of the most odious form. See Cox v. State of Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536, 580 (1965) (opinion of Black, J.). Arizona generously supports those candidates deemed "clean" and who wish to incur the financial patronage of the state. A.R.S. § 16-947. State-bankrolled candidates receive a generous dole from the state to fund their primary and general campaigns. A.R.S. § 16-951 (detailing state cash-drops to "clean" candidates). And what remains particularly offensive, beyond the absurd notion of the state funding political actors' campaigns in the first place, is the ratcheting effect of its handicapping "matching" funds – promising nearly a dollar of government subsidized cash to those candidates deemed "clean" by the state when independent voices speak. A.R.S. § 16-952(A)-(C). In this sense, Arizona's project falls by the way of similar programs brought before this Court in the past, all of which, cleverly or not-so-cleverly, push some voices out of the marketplace of ideas in order to favor others. See, e.g., Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp., 463 U.S. 60, 65 (1983); Consolidated Edison Co., 447 U.S. at 535-36; Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S. 455, 462-63 (1980); Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc., 427 U.S. 50, 63-65 (1976) (plurality opinion); Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 95-96 (1972).

A review of Arizona's "Clean Elections" law must invoke strict, and in this case, fatal, scrutiny because it inflicts speech burdens based on the identity of disfavored speakers and unpopular speech. In its most basic form, Arizona's project works unconstitutional harms against those who speak against the state – a notion commonly attributed to totalitarian regimes, but never permitted in this Republic. "Clean elections" assures purity of political discourse by silencing speech against state-favored candidates. Purity indeed.

In Arizona, there are three tiers of speakers. First Class speakers are deemed "clean" by the state because they agree to take government money. Curious. Second Class speakers are deemed "unclean" because they wish to maintain a healthy degree of independence from the state and otherwise eschew government funding of their campaign. Curiouser. Those speakers who struggle to maintain an identity separate from the state and who struggle to find private support for their own campaigns are saddled with the burdens of the "Clean Elections" law. There is also a third class of speakers in Arizona damaged by "clean elections," and confined to Steerage: Dissenting citizens. Those few individuals who dare assemble together, like those found in the Arizona Free Enterprise PAC, will face near dollar-for-dollar government subsidies given for every dollar they use to speak out against state-sponsored candidates. Curiouser and curiouser.[5] Unlike "non-participating" candidates, these independent groups cannot avail themselves of any state benefits, damning them to the ninth layer of Arizona's unconstitutional inferno.

As recognized in Republican Party of Minnesota and elsewhere, government systems that impose burdens on speech due to the basis of its content must be subject to strict scrutiny. 536 U.S. at 774. Here, where the State of Arizona has saddled unique burdens upon a particular class – individuals and independent candidates who speak against state-favored candidates – strict scrutiny must necessarily apply. To survive this often-fatal review, Arizona must meet the heavy burden that a compelling interest exists to ceivable relation to discrimination. As evidence of Wal-Mart's centralized policies, for example, it noted that Wal-Mart's Home Office "controls the temperature and music in each store throughout the country." Pet. App. 190a. And as evidence of strong corporate culture, it noted that employees "do the Wal-Mart cheer" during shift changes. Id. at 188a-189a. Nowhere has anyone explained why air-conditioning policies and morale-boosting exercises should make the difference between a multibillion-dollar nationwide discrimination class action and individual claims by employees with tangible grievances.

[5] Lewis Carroll and Martin Gardner, THE ANNOTATED ALICE, ALICE'S ADVENTURES IN WONDERLAND 35 (1960).

The Ninth Circuit's reliance on policies and culture with no proven connection to discrimination is inconsistent with Falcon and Rule 23(a). Rule 23(a) requires commonality. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(2). Without proof that a common policy of distributing discretion was adopted to effectuate discrimination, or that discretion was exercised in a discriminatory fashion because of central policies and culture, that commonality is absent. That is true even if statistical disparities might suggest that some local decisionmakers exercised their discretion improperly (and thus that a number of persons affected by local decisions might have valid individual claims).

Companywide policies and culture normally are beneficial and implicate none of Title VII's concerns—which is why federal law requires or encourages them in a variety of contexts. See, e.g., U.S.S.G. §§ 8B2.1, 8C2.5(f). Indeed, such policies and culture typically reduce the risk of discrimination by increasing consistency and focusing employees on relevant business considerations. But even a policy of leaving "decisions to the unchecked discretion of lower level supervisors should itself raise no inference of discriminatory conduct." Watson v. Fort Worth Bank & Trust, 487 U.S. 977, 990 (1988). Likewise, "a decision by a company to give managers the discretion to make employment decisions, and the subsequent exercise of that discretion by some managers in a discriminatory manner, is not tantamount to a decision by a company to pursue a systematic, companywide policy of intentional discrimination." Sperling v. Hoffmann-La Roche, Inc., 924 F. Supp. 1346, 1363 (D.N.J. 1996). Rather, subjectivity in employment decisions "cuts against any inference for class action commonality" because subjective assessments necessarily vary with the person making them. Stastny, 628 F.2d at 279 (emphasis added); see also Love v. Johanns, 439 F.3d 723, 730-731 (D.C. Cir. 2006) (rejecting the view that "'a common policy of discrimination exists when significantly subjective decision-making operates on a national basis with discriminatory results'" (alterations omitted)).

The most the Ninth Circuit could claim here was that Wal-Mart's policies, "in part through their subjectivity, provide[d] a potential conduit for discrimination." Pet. App. 53a (emphasis added). Wal-Mart's "strong corporate culture," it opined, "may include gender stereotyping," and its personnel policies are "vulnerable to gender bias." Id. at 54a-55a. (emphasis added). But that sort of speculation about what might be and what could be is precisely what Falcon forbids. Rule 23(a) conditions class certification on the existence of specified criteria, including commonality. See p. 21, supra. Speculation that a common issue might exist is no substitute for a finding, supported by adequate evidence, that a common issue does exist. As Judge Kleinfeld noted: "'Vulnerability' to sex discrimination is not sex discrimination." Dukes v. Wal-Mart, Inc., 509 F.3d 1168, 1194 (9th Cir. 2007) (Kleinfeld, J., dissenting). Absent "significant proof" of an actual companywide policy or culture of discrimination that gave rise to the alleged instances of discrimination, the Ninth Circuit lacked any basis for concluding that Rule 23(a)'s requirements were met. And, as Falcon made clear, "actual, not presumed, conformance with Rule 23(a) remains * * * indispensable." 457 U.S. at 160.

C. The Ninth Circuit's Reliance on Social Framework Analysis Is Inconsistent with Falcon

Much of the Ninth Circuit's flawed reasoning stems from its reliance on plaintiffs' sociology expert, Dr. William Bielby. See Pet. App. 54a-60a. Dr. Bielby asserted that Wal-Mart's policies and culture were "vulnerable to gender bias" based on a "social framework" analysis. See ibid. The Ninth Circuit's reliance on that analysis strays unacceptably from Falcon and Rule 23(a).

Social framework analysis "denote[s] the use of general conclusions from social science research to help determine specific factual issues in a case." John Monahan et al., Contextual Evidence of Gender Discrimination: The Ascendance of "Social Frameworks," 94 Va. L. Rev. 1715, 1726 (2008). Under such an analysis, "the expert uses her judgment rather than traditional empirical methods to link social science propositions to a particular case." Greg Mitchell et al., Beyond Context: Social Facts as Case-Specific Evidence, 60 Emory L.J. (forthcoming 2011) (manuscript at 3), available at http://ssrn.com/abstract=1564724. "[T]he expert does not reach the conclusion that a specific decision was made with discriminatory intent; that judgment is for the fact finder." Melissa Hart & Paul M. Secunda, A Matter of Context: Social Framework Evidence in Employment Discrimination Class Actions, 78 Fordham L. Rev. 37, 45 (2009). Rather, the expert "offer[s] his or her knowledge of the social science research and identif[ies] the characteristics of policies challenged in the particular workplace that research has linked with higher likelihood of bias and stereotype." Ibid.

Reliance on such social framework analysis as a basis for class certification has been roundly criticized—and rightly so. "'Issues of causality in the social sciences have a long and rich methodological tradition.'" Gregory Mitchell, Good Causes and Bad Science, 63 Vand. L. Rev. En Banc 133, 138-139 (2010). But social framework analysis dispenses with those traditional and accepted methods of proving causation. Instead, it relies on the existence of a common policy that is merely "vulnerable" to discrimination and invites the jury to assume that the vulnerability of that common policy caused all the individual instances of alleged discrimination. It thus "improperly treat[s] findings drawn from aggregate data as if they revealed constant effects across individuals and settings." Monahan et al., Contextual Evidence, supra, at 1735. It "ignore[s] the potential confounding and moderating variables that were statistically or experimentally controlled in the research settings but that could not be controlled in the specific case where the behavior in question occurred." Id. at 1735-1736. And it improperly permits experts to "make unreliable descriptive claims that are used to establish commonality, such as claims about * * * the uniformity of actual or likely bias across disparate locations that the experts have not systematically studied in any detail." Mitchell, supra, at 142.

As the authors of the authoritative casebook on law and social science make clear: "No field of social science of which we are aware permits its experts to speculate that a general finding, derived from group averages or ecological correlations, applies to each member of the group or applies to one specific group member but not to another." Monahan et al., Contextual Evidence, supra, at 1734; see also John Monahan & Laurens Walker, Social Science in Law 597-605 (7th ed. 2010); John Monahan et al., The Limits of Social Framework Evidence, 8 Law, Probability & Risk 307, 316 n.50 (2009). Social framework analysis, however, rests on precisely that flawed methodology.

Ironically, moreover, social framework analysis suffers from the same subjectivity it assails as a conduit for discrimination. Rather than apply scientifically reliable methods, a social framework expert relies on "subjective judgments and interpretations of case-specific data to decide which general principles apply and which do not, to determine which causal hypotheses should be rejected and which should be accepted, and to decide how much weight to give conflicting pieces of possibly unrepresentative evidence within a record as assembled by the parties in the context of litigation." Monahan et al., Contextual Evidence, supra, at 1740. "One of the ironies of these cases is that the experts use subjective judgment to indict the subjective judgment of managers." Mitchell, supra, at 141 n.19.

Dr. Bielby's testimony in this case exemplifies all those defects. Dr. Bielby did not "conduct an audit study (in which persons of different sexes with matching qualifications pose as applicants for the same job), a controlled experiment into the effects of stereotyping on managerial decisions at Wal-Mart, or an objective observational study of conditions at Wal-Mart." Monahan et al., Contextual Evidence, supra, at 1747 (footnote omitted); see also Mitchell et al., supra, at 3 (Dr. Bielby "conducted no observational, statistical or experimental tests to determine that any particular employment practice of Wal-Mart actually contributed to any sex disparities in pay"); Mitchell, supra, at 138 (outlining standard scientific procedures Dr. Bielby failed to follow); Monahan et al., Limits of Social Framework Evidence, supra, at 313. Rather, Dr. Bielby "simply reviewed discovery materials and judged Wal-Mart's practices to contain features that social science studies suggest can be associated with intergroup bias." Mitchell et al., supra, at 3 (emphasis added).

From that review, Dr. Bielby "opined that Wal-Mart had a strong and uniform corporate culture that influenced how personnel decisions were made and that Wal-Mart's personnel and accountability systems were unduly subjective and discretionary." Mitchell, supra, at 136. "Given that the deposition testimony and exhibits that he relied on were the product of questioning and selection by advocates for the plaintiffs, and given that he reviewed the record using an entirely subjective analytical method after knowing the plaintiffs' statistical evidence of disparities, it is not surprising that Dr. Bielby reached conclusions supporting the plaintiffs' class claims." Id. at 137 (footnote omitted). "Plaintiffs at the class certification stage need experts willing to say that there are common organizational practices exposing the class members to a common risk, and that is what Dr. Bielby and the other social framework experts have been providing without a reliable basis for doing so." Id. at 142; see also Monahan et al., Contextual Evidence, supra, at 1748 (Dr. Bielby "reli[ed] on methodologically inadequate subjective judgments").

The district court acknowledged that "Dr. Bielby's opinions have a built-in degree of conjecture." Pet. App. 195a. And it recognized that he "cannot definitively state how regularly stereotypes play a meaningful role in employment decisions at Wal-Mart." Ibid. Indeed, while Dr. Bielby criticized Wal-Mart's policies as "vulnerable" to gender bias, he "conceded that he could not calculate whether 0.5 percent or 95 percent of the employment decisions at Wal-Mart might be determined by stereotyped thinking." Dukes v. Wal-Mart, Inc., 222 F.R.D. 189, 192 (N.D. Cal. 2004). The district court nonetheless certified the class, dismissing the shortcomings of Dr. Bielby's testimony on the ground that "this is the nature of this particular field of science." Pet. App. 195a.

The appeal of Dr. Bielby's approach to class-action plaintiffs is obvious. To achieve class certification, the theory posits only the possibility of discrimination seeping through "vulnerable" companywide policies. It thereby leaves proof of any actual companywide policy of discrimination to a merits trial that—because of the hydraulic pressure to settle that class certification produces—will never occur. See pp. 31-32, infra. Plaintiffs, however, are not entitled to class treatment simply because it is possible that the alleged discrimination stems from a common policy that might allow discrimination to occur. They must adduce the "significant proof" of a "general policy of discrimination" that Falcon and Rule 23(a) require. Absent "significant proof" that a common discriminatory policy is to blame, there is simply no sufficiently common issue to justify combining otherwise disparate claims of discrimination into a nationwide class action.

D. The Ninth Circuit's Decision Distorts Organizational Decisionmaking and Threatens Corporate Diversity Initiatives

The Ninth Circuit's decision is not only wrong as a matter of law. It is also bad policy. By rejecting Falcon's significant proof standard, the decision distorts how firms make basic organizational decisions necessary to manage a successful enterprise.

To compete in today's global marketplace, corporations must strike a careful balance among centralized policies, local discretion, and corporate culture. See pp. 8-12, supra. Those decisions are driven by business realities—like the need to react quickly to the marketplace while also ensuring a consistent product—that have nothing to do with discrimination. Those sensitive and difficult organizational decisions can often mean the difference between a thriving business that employs thousands of workers to serve millions of customers and a corporate train wreck.

By relying on those commonplace organizational tools as grounds for class certification, the decision below distorts corporate structural decisionmaking. As this Court has recognized, class certification is usually the entire game in class-action litigation. "Certification of a large class may so increase the defendant's potential damages liability and litigation costs that he may find it economically prudent to settle and to abandon a meritorious defense." Coopers & Lybrand v. Livesay, 437 U.S. 463, 476 (1978).[8] "Many corporate executives are unwilling to bet their company that they are in the right in big-stakes litigation, and a grant of class status can propel the stakes of a case into the stratosphere." Blair v. Equifax Check Servs., Inc., 181 F.3d 832, 834 (7th Cir. 1999). The potential for "an all-or-nothing verdict presents too high a risk, even when the probability of an adverse judgment is low." Castano v. Am. Tobacco Co., 84 F.3d 734, 746 (5th Cir. 1996). Certification thus imposes substantial costs "[i]rrespective of the merits." Newton, 259 F.3d at 167. Even luminaries such as Judge Friendly have described such settlements as "blackmail." Henry J. Friendly, Federal Jurisdiction: A General View 120 (1973). It was in part that very concern—that "[a]n order granting certification * * * may force a defendant to settle rather than incur the costs of defending a class action and run the risk of potentially ruinous liability"—that led to Rule 23's amendment in 1998 to permit interlocutory appeals of certification orders. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(f) & advisory committee note; Blair, 181 F.3d at 834.

Nagareda, Aggregation and Its Discontents, 106 Colum. L. Rev. 1872, 1875 (2006); Robert G. Bone & David S. Evans, Class Certification and the Substantive Merits, 51 Duke L.J. 1251, 1285-1286 & n.129 (2002); George L. Priest, Procedural Versus Substantive Controls of Mass Tort Class Actions, 26 J. Legal Stud. 521, 522, 554 (1997). Even proponents of social framework analysis acknowledge that, "after a class is certified, the pressure on the employer to settle the dispute * * * is substantial." Hart & Secunda, supra, at 50. Thus, "as a practical matter, class certification operates as a kind of victory on the merits." Ibid.

By attaching potentially case-dispositive consequences to a corporation's decisions to adopt centralized policies, delegate implementation authority, and foster a strong corporate culture—even when those decisions have nothing to do with discrimination—the Ninth Circuit's opinion skews organizational decisionmaking. Having "company-wide policies" or a "strong corporate culture," even ones wholly unconnected to discrimination, may now mean the difference between a multibillion-dollar, must-settle nationwide class action and individual discrimination claims resolved on their merits in traditional proceedings. High-level managers seeking to structure their businesses for success now must make those decisions with an artificial thumb on the scale to avoid the specter of a potentially ruinous class certification order.

The consequences are all the more troubling because it is not even clear what corporations can do to avoid them. The Ninth Circuit faulted Wal-Mart for its "company-wide corporate practices and policies" while, in the same breath, criticizing those policies for leaving "excessive subjectivity" in the hands of local decisionmakers. Pet. App. 51a. The court thus faulted Wal-Mart for being both too centralized and too decentralized at the same time. Corporate managers making basic organizational decisions should not be forced into an impossible Catch-22 situation where virtually any organizational structure they might adopt becomes grounds for class certification.

The Ninth Circuit's decision threatens those same negative consequences for corporate diversity and antidiscrimination initiatives as well. As explained above, see pp. 12-17, supra, most large firms in the United States today have made strong, public commitments to eradicating discrimination and promoting diversity. To implement those initiatives, however, corporations must often rely on the same organizational tools they use in managing any other aspect of their business—centralized policies, local implementation, and corporate culture.

The Ninth Circuit's reasoning threatens to render even those important initiatives sufficient evidence of "commonality" to justify class treatment of otherwise unrelated discrimination claims. If a company's air-conditioning policy can be cited against it as evidence of commonality, as Wal-Mart's was here, there is no reason its diversity and antidiscrimination policies could not be as well. The Ninth Circuit's decision thus threatens to impede even corporate efforts to promote inclusiveness and equality of opportunity. That perverse result is yet another reason to reaffirm Falcon and reject the Ninth Circuit's contrary approach.

A decision that a discrimination suit should not proceed as a nationwide class action does not leave genuine victims of discrimination without a remedy. Even in the best-managed companies, there may be isolated instances where rogue managers make improper decisions. And in large firms, those instances may add up. But the law provides ample means of redress for those individual claims. Indeed, those remedies are even more expansive now than when this Court decided Falcon. In 1991, Congress amended Title VII to provide for compensatory and punitive damages, not just backpay or equitable relief. See Civil Rights Act of 1991, Pub. L. No. 102-166, §102, 105 Stat. 1071, 1072-1073 (codified at 42 U.S.C. §1981a(a)(1), (b)). Even before that amendment, prevailing plaintiffs could recover their attorney's fees. See 42 U.S.C. §2000e-5(k). Those remedies ensure the vindication of meritorious individual claims without recourse to class actions. There is accordingly no reason to expand the class-action mechanism beyond its traditional bounds by converting ordinary corporate organizational decisions with no proven connection to discrimination into a basis for class certification.

The Ninth Circuit's holding is impossible to reconcile with Falcon's mandate that "actual, not presumed, conformance with Rule 23(a) remains * * * indispensable" and that, in cases like this, that standard requires "[s]ignificant proof" of a "general policy of discrimination." 457 U.S. at 159 n.15, 160. The Ninth Circuit's erroneous decision threatens companies' ability to manage their workforces and impedes the private-sector diversity initiatives that play an increasingly important role in corporate America's efforts to ensure opportunity for all.

CONCLUSION

The judgment of the Ninth Circuit should be reversed.

Respectfully submitted.

INTEREST OF AMICUS CURIAE[1]

The American Association for Justice ("AAJ") respectfully submits this brief as amicus curiae. AAJ is a voluntary national bar association whose members represent plaintiffs in civil actions. AAJ has participated as amicus curiae before this Court in dozens of cases of importance to AAJ members and to the public. AAJ members routinely represent large numbers of persons in federal courts, including in class actions in general and in civil rights class actions in particular. AAJ members have an abiding interest in the interpretation of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and participate in the rulemaking processes of the Judicial Conference.

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Like government in general, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and in particular Rule 23, need "a little play in the joints"[2] if they are to meet the needs of modern litigation. That flexibility is built into the rules, with Rule 1 admonishing that they be construed to provide "just, speedy, and inexpensive" adjudications, and is reflected in the deference trial courts traditionally have been accorded in administering class actions. This court should assure that trial judges have the breathing room they need to make the system work.

[1] Letters of consent from the parties have been filed with the Clerk of Court. Pursuant to Rule 37.6, amicus curiae states that no counsel for a party authored any part of this brief in whole or in part, and no counsel or party made a monetary contribution intended to fund the preparation or submission of this brief.

[2] "We must remember that the machinery of government would not work if it were not allowed a little play in its joints." Bain Peanut Co. v. Pinson, 282 U.S. 499, 501 (1931) (Holmes, J., for the court).

No issue of Wal-Mart's liability is before the court. Wal-Mart conflates questions of whether it is liable with questions about how it is appropriate to adjudicate whether it is liable. This Court was clear in General Telephone Co. of Southwest v. Falcon that those inquiries are distinct. They must remain so.

The questions presented deal with how to adjudicate whether Wal-Mart is liable. The question certified for class adjudication is whether Wal-Mart's behavior—not the behavior of particular agents in particular locations—violates substantive law. Wal-Mart repeatedly refers to its size and de-centralized decisionmaking as reasons why none of plaintiffs' allegations can be adjudicated in one proceeding. But as big as Wal-Mart is, it is one entity, responsible for the actions of its collective parts. The allegations before the court are not, as Wal-Mart apparently wishes they were, that the fingers and toes of a juridical person misbehaved; they are that the juridical person, itself, misbehaved. Establishing, on a classwide basis, whether Wal-Mart acted in one discriminatory manner is a speedier, less expensive, and more just way to adjudicate the issue than determining that question in 500,000 individual adjudications, which would be cost-prohibitive and effectively exculpatory. If the civil justice system is to perform its constitutional role of providing quiescence by resolving disputes peaceably, the size and complexity of a juridical person cannot preclude adjudicating claims that it behaved badly.

Rule 23 traditionally has been interpreted to afford trial courts great flexibility in deciding whether and how to adjudicate claims on a classwide basis. That kind of flexibility recently has been endorsed by bench, bar, and the academy as a key factor in successful administration of the rules in general. The Advisory Committee on Civil Rules last year undertook a major retrospective on the rules. One clear lesson is that informed judges need great discretion to administer cases like this one. This Court should be slow to interfere, at this preliminary stage of adjudication, with the considered rulings of a trial judge charged with overseeing this litigation. The class certification here is a reasoned response to a knotty problem of providing justice to both a large entity assertedly guilty of misconduct and the large number of persons who make the assertion.

ARGUMENT

I. THE QUESTION OF WHETHER WAL-MART EMPLOYS A SINGLE SET OF CORPORATE WIDE DISCRIMINATORY POLICIES IS APPROPRIATELY ADJUDICATED ON A CLASSWIDE BASIS

The lower courts endorsed determining, on a classwide basis, "whether Wal-Mart's female employees nationwide were subjected to a single set of corporate policies (not merely a number of independent discriminatory acts)" that discriminated against them. Pet. App. 78a (emphasis in original). That question is singularly appropriate for class adjudication, resolving a dispute about whether one entity employs one policy that affects all employees in a prohibited manner.

Wal-Mart colorfully asserts that evidence supporting this determination does not bridge the "Falcon gap," noting that this court's decision in General Telephone Co. of Southwest v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147 (1982) held:

> that a plaintiff can potentially bridge the gap between individual and representative claims, and secure authorization to proceed on behalf of absent persons, by adducing "[s]ignificant proof that an employer operated under a general policy of discrimination" that was implemented through "entirely subjective decisionmaking processes" in a manner that affected all class members. Falcon, 457 U.S. at 159 n.15.

Pet'r's Br. 19. That is not quite an accurate description of either the particular statement or the overall rationale in Falcon. Material elided from the statement is telling. The complete language is:

> Significant proof that an employer operated under a general policy of discrimination conceivably could justify a class of both applicants and employees if the discrimination manifested itself in hiring and promotion practices in the same general fashion, such as through entirely subjective decisionmaking processes.

Falcon, 457 U.S. at 159 n.15 (emphases added).

The elided language illustrates two key points. First, subjective decisionmaking is merely an example of one way a "general policy" of discrimination can be manifested, not a limitation on how it might be manifested. It certainly is not the evidentiary requirement Wal-Mart attempts to make it. Second, the Court is addressing primarily substantive law, and not standards under Rule 23. The elided language makes clear that the statement addresses the question on which certiorari was granted: "whether the class action was properly maintained on behalf of both employees who were denied promotion and applicants who were denied employment." Id. at 155. The sentence to which the footnote is appended reads: "We find nothing in the statute to indicate that Congress intended to authorize such a wholesale expansion of class-action litigation." Id. at 159 (emphasis added). Falcon finds, as a matter of substantive law, that the claim of an employee denied promotion is different from the claim of a person denied employment. That is the Falcon "gap":

> Conceptually, there is a wide gap between (a) an individual's claim that he has been denied a promotion on discriminatory grounds, and his otherwise unsupported allegation that the company has a policy of discrimination, and (b) the existence of a class of persons who have suffered the same injury as that individual, such that the individual's claim and the class claims will share common questions of law or fact and that the individual's claim will be typical of the class claims.

Id. at 157.

The Court holds that, for purposes of Rule 23, the claim of denied promotion is not typical of the claim of denied employment unless "the discrimination manifested itself in hiring and promotion practices in the same general fashion." Id. at 159 n.15. See Cooper v. Fed. Res. Bank of Richmond, 467 U.S. 867, 877 (1984) ("Falcon thus holds that the existence of a valid individual claim does not necessarily warrant the conclusion that the individual plaintiff may successfully maintain a class action.")

The court's "significant proof" statement was speculation about what might be required to establish how present employees might show that their claims were typical of, and had commonality with, persons denied employment. That issue is not present in this case, as persons denied employment are not part of the class certified here.[3] The Court made clear that "significant proof" is not a generally applicable evidentiary requirement for class certification: "Sometimes the issues are plain enough from the pleadings to determine whether the interests of the absent parties are fairly encompassed within the named plaintiff's claim, and sometimes it may be necessary for the court to probe behind the pleadings before coming to rest on the certification question." Falcon, at 160. The court made no specific evidentiary demand of the lower courts. Reversal was based on a methodological failure, not an evidentiary one, the district court's "failure to evaluate carefully the legitimacy of the named plaintiff's plea that he is a proper class representative under Rule 23(a)." Id. at 148 (emphasis added), and its failure to provide "rigorous analysis, that the prerequisites of Rule 23(a) have been satisfied." Id. at 161 (emphasis added). The Court in Falcon noted that factual and legal issues related to the merits often are enmeshed with those related to class certification, but it did not collapse Rule 23 into a determination on the merits. With its acknowledgement of the "flexibility" trial courts necessarily are accorded in certifying classes and its refusal to judge those certifications "by hindsight," after trial evidence had been taken, it made clear that it was prescribing no particular requirement regarding evidentiary production in class certification. Id. at 160. See Amchem, Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 619 & 621-22 (1997) (Permitting a certifying court to look beyond the pleadings to the parties' stipulated settlement for the limited purpose of explaining why requirements of Rule 23 were not satisfied but imposing no evidentiary requirement and precluding a court from conflating a certification decision with determinations of merits).

II. THE RULES VEST TRIAL JUDGES WITH THE DISCRETION NECESSARY TO ADJUDICATE CLASS CLAIMS INVOLVING LARGE ENTITIES AND EXERCISE OF THAT DISCRETION SHOULD BE REVIEWED DEFERENTIALLY

The Falcon court, along with many courts before and since, acknowledged that flexibility in administering class actions is a virtue and that trial courts deserve deference in their exercise of it.[4] See Califano v. Yamasaki, 442 U.S. 682, 703 (1979) ("[M]ost issues arising under Rule 23 . . . [are] committed in the first instance to the discretion of the district court"); Reiter v. Sonotone Corp., 442 U.S. 330, 345 (1979) (district courts have "broad power and discretion . . . with respect to matters involving the certification" of class actions).[5] Deference flows in part from recognition of the essentially factual nature of the certification inquiry and in part from recognition of the inherent power of the trial court to manage its caseload. Maldonado v. Ochsner Clinic

[4] The questions presented make no direct reference to an appropriate standard of review. Wal-Mart alludes to one cryptically, in a footnote citing one case that does not quite bear the weight Wal-Mart places on it. Pet'r's Br. 18, n 2, citing Koon v. United States, 518 U.S. 81, 100 (1996). Koon does recite that error of law is per se an abuse of discretion, but it illustrates that point with an example of a court considering, in exercising discretion, an unpermitted factor; evidence outside the record of the case would be an example. This case is much more appropriately viewed, from the appellate level, as deferential oversight of the exercise by a trial judge of matters committed primarily to that judge, the court having noted in Koon that "[t]he abuse-of-discretion standard includes review to determine that the discretion was not guided by erroneous legal conclusions." Id.

[5] Recent circuit court opinions continue to endorse this kind of discretion. See, e.g., Ervin v. OS Rest. Servs., Inc., --- F.3d ---, 2011 WL 135708 (7th Cir. Jan. 18, 2011) ("We review class-certification decisions deferentially, in recognition of the fact that Rule 23 gives the district courts 'broad discretion to determine whether certification of a class-action lawsuit is appropriate.'"); In re Pet Food Prod. Liab. Litig., 629 F.3d 333, 343 (3rd Cir. 2010) (endorsing discretion on certifying subclasses); Coleman v. Estes Express Lines, Inc., 627 F.3d 1096, 1100 (9th Cir. 2010) (permitting interlocutory appeal of class certification order under CAFA within discretion of district court) (noting accord with First and Tenth Circuits)

Found., 493 F.3d 521, 523 (5th Cir. 2007). This case, involving the nation's largest employer, illustrates the wisdom of those positions. In the modern era, class adjudication is often the only practical means of adjusting disputes between gargantuan organizations and groups of persons harmed in the same way by them. Economic reality dictates that certain litigation "proceed as a class action or not at all." Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, 417 U.S. 156, 161 (1974).[6] That statement applies more widely today than it did when made in 1974.[7] And it is true not

---

[6] See also Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 617 (1997) ("'The policy at the very core of the class action mechanism is to overcome the problem that small recoveries do not provide the incentive for any individual to bring a solo action prosecuting his or her rights. A class action solves this problem by aggregating the relatively paltry potential recoveries into something worth someone's (usually an attorney's) labor.'") (quoting Mace v. Van Ru Credit Corp., 109 F.3d 338, 344 (7th Cir. 1997)); Carnegie v. Household Int'l, Inc., 376 F.3d 656, 661 (7th Cir. 2004) (Posner, J.) ("The realistic alternative to a class action is not 17 million individual suits, but zero individual suits, as only a lunatic or a fanatic sues for $30.").

[7] See, e.g., Third Circuit Task Force Report, Selection of Class Counsel, 208 F.R.D. 340 (2002):

> What was thought to be true in 1966 appears to be true today: namely, that the interests of justice are well served by class actions that vindicate rights that might otherwise go unprotected and that spare courts the burden of handling numerous lawsuits, some small and some not so small, arising from a common set of facts. Over the last 35 years, the American legal system has handled a variety of class actions involving an enormous array of claims. In many situations, the class action has been successful in identifying public harms, discovering a substantial percentage of likely victims, making only of cases, like Eisen, involving small individual recoveries. Individual employment claims are complex, and ones of the magnitude asserted here often are not viable if asserted individually. See, e.g., Gentry v. Superior Court, 165 P.3d 556, 564 (Cal. 2007) (finding that ban on class action for individual wage claims averaging $5,000-7,000 was effectively exculpatory as amounts involved were insufficient to support bringing individual claims); Bell v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 9 Cal. Rptr. 3d 544, 570 (Cal. App. 1 Dist. 2004) (rejecting assertion that individual claims as high as $37,000 rendered individualized claims viable and precluded certification of class of overtime claimants); Scott v. Aetna Serv., Inc., 210 F.R.D. 261, 268 (D. Ct. 2002) ("the cost of individual litigation is prohibitive, notwithstanding the high salaries of the Systems Engineers or the sizable potential damages awards."). And a class action can dissipate legitimate fear of reprisal. "[C]urrent employees—whether rank and file, supervisory, or managerial—over whom the employer, by virtue of the employment relationship, may exercise intense leverage" can be inhibited from acting individually: "Not only can the employer fire the employee, but job assignments can be switched, hours can be adjusted, wage and salary increases held up, and other more subtle forms of influence

Neither the size of modern organizations nor the number of facilities they operate should affect whether the existence of discriminatory corporate-wide policies can be adjudicated collectively. Modern business organizations are ubiquitous, large, and growing larger. As of 1801, "there were only 317 corporations in the entire country," Phillip I. Blumberg, The Corporate Entity In An Era Of Multinational Corporations, 15 Del. J. Corp. L. 283, 300 (1990) (footnote omitted), one for every 17,000 persons.[8] "These were almost entirely in banking, insurance, and public service areas; only a handful were manufacturing corporations. This condition began to change with the growth of the textile industry following the introduction of the power loom, the embargo laws against manufactured imports, and the War of 1812." Id. In response to this growth Congress ordered the Census Bureau to begin recording the economic activity of business enterprises.[9] As of the last economic census in 2002, there were 5,885,784 "employing firms" in America (business organizations that employed persons other than the owner),[10] or one for about every 50 persons.[11]

Business organizations have grown not only in number and ubiquity, but in size, stunningly so in the last half century. In 1955, the revenues of the 500 largest American corporations equaled 33 percent of gross domestic product (GDP); fifty years later, they equaled 74 percent of GDP.[12] Today one employer—Wal-Mart—employs more people than the top ten Fortune 500 companies, combined, employed in 1955. Today, 3,500 firms employ 2,500 or more persons.[13] Those very large employers have, like Wal-Mart, many places where they do business. The eight hundred ninety firms that each employ more than 10,000 persons operate almost 600,000 facilities, or 660 facilities per firm. Id.

The certified class in this case is comprised of approximately 500,000 women. Pet. App. 6a, n.3; 112a. That is 0.3 percent of the 130 million people who shop at Wal-Mart regularly[14] and is less than 25 percent of Wal-Mart's workforce. The alternative to litigating the issues certified here for class adjudication is individual litigation. Even at the modest average costs the Federal Judicial Center found extant in federal civil litigation[15] the parties' costs of the alternative are [15] Costs in federal civil cases are, in general, quite low, $15,000, on average, including attorneys' fees, for plaintiffs, and $20,000 for defendants. In a relatively small number of cases, costs are disproportionately high. Emery G. Lee, III & Thomas E. Willging, National Case-Based Civil Rules Survey, Preliminary Report to the Federal Judicial Conference Advisory Committee on Civil Rules (Federal Judicial Center, Oct. 2009), at 2, http://www.fjc.gov/public/pdf.nsf/lookup/dissurv1.pdf/$file/dissurv1.pdf. Cases with disproportionately high costs tend to be clashes of corporate titans, particularly intellectual property disputes. Emery G. Lee III & Thomas E. Willging, Litigation Costs in Civil Cases: Multivariate Analysis, Report to the Judicial Conference Advisory Committee on Civil Rules (Federal Judicial Center Mar. 2010) at 8, http://www.fjc.gov/public/pdf.nsf/lookup/costciv1.pdf/$file/costciv1.pdf.

$17.5 billion. Wal-Mart's proportional share of that $17.5 billion would be $10 billion, which is on the order of a thousand times greater than the amount Wal-Mart could be expected to pay to litigate this action. A recent survey of litigation costs of Fortune 200 companies—Wal-Mart is one—found that mean litigation expenditures for "major cases" —this would be one—were under $2 million for the period 2004-2008.[16] That is a substantial reduction in transactions costs, and case law makes clear that the costs of individual adjudication effectively would bar individual actions and potentially exculpate Wal-Mart from conduct condemned by civil rights statutes at the core of our identity as a nation.

Administering this kind of case requires flexibility traditionally granted by appellate courts and recently strongly endorsed by bench, bar, and the academy. In May of 2010 the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules gathered judges, academics, and practitioners for a conference[17] "designed as a disciplined identification of litigation problems and exploration of the most promising opportunities to improve federal civil litigation." Report of the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules to the Chief Justice of the United States, 1 (2010), available at http://civilconference.uscourts.gov/LotusQuickr/dcc/Main.nsf/$defaultview/9286E143BF0D465185257 7BB004D4450/$File/Report%20to%20the%20Chief%20Justice.pdf?OpenElement. The conference was the kind of "extensive deliberative process" the committee typically employs and that this court has endorsed, Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 620 (1997), drawing "on the collective experience of bench and bar" to facilitate "the adoption of measured, practical solutions." Mohawk Indus., Inc. v. Carpenter, 130 S. Ct. 599, 609 (2009). The carefully designed conference had only one panel specifically dealing with Rule 23 and entertained only one paper on the topic.[18] Defense interests, well-represented at the conference, made no suggestions for amending Rule 23.[19] In reporting to the Chief Justice, the Committee made no mention of any need to deal directly with Rule 23, or particularly with class certification requirements under Rule 23. It did discuss extensively how to deal with issues that arise in administering large cases, in general, and found a strong consensus that close judicial management was a key to assuring that such cases could be litigated efficiently. Report to Chief Justice, at 4.[20] The panel examining empirical data relating to administration of the civil justice system concluded that "procedure should be tailored to the needs of each case early in the pretrial process, through a combination of attorney cooperation, judicial management, and case-type specific rules and protocols."[21] Notably absent from the implementation steps the Advisory Committee will take are any efforts specific to Rule 23 in general or to class certification in particular. Report to the Chief Justice, at 12.

(quoting the Judicial Conference of the United States, Long Range Plan of the Federal Courts 70 (1995) (Recommendation #38)).

Close judicial management—what judges, courts, and scholars want—requires play in the joints. "[W]hile an action is pending in the trial court, it is a living, developing and changing entity," and too close oversight from an appellate court distant from those realities hinders the trial court's ability to manage the case in a fair manner. Simon v. Philip Morris Inc., 200 F.R.D. 21, 48-49 (E.D.N.Y. 2001) (Weinstein, J.). "Merely demonstrating that the district judge's class certification decision is questionable is insufficient procedurally, as such decisions require the application of broad and flexible legal standards to unique sets of facts that do not fit squarely within prior precedent." Id. at 42. This Court should assure that trial judges have it.

CONCLUSION

Class certification should be AFFIRMED.

INTEREST OF AMICI

The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) is a nationwide, nonprofit, nonpartisan organization with more than 500,000 members dedicated to the principles of liberty and equality embodied in the Constitution and our nation's civil rights laws. The ACLU of Northern California is one of its regional affiliates. The ACLU, through its Women's Rights Project, frequently litigates cases, including class actions, concerning sex discrimination in the workplace, and has appeared before this Court in numerous cases involving women's equality, both as direct counsel and as amicus curiae.

The National Women's Law Center (NWLC) is a nonprofit legal advocacy organization dedicated to the advancement and protection of women's legal rights in all aspects of their lives. Since 1972, NWLC has worked to secure equal opportunity for women in the workplace, which includes the right to equal pay and promotions. NWLC has prepared or participated in the preparation of numerous amicus briefs in employment discrimination cases before this Court.

The ACLU and the NWLC are joined in filing this brief by 32 organizations that share a longstanding commitment to civil rights and equality in the workplace. The individual organizations are described in the Appendix to this brief.[1]

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

In support of their motion for class certification, plaintiffs presented evidence demonstrating statistically significant disparities in pay and promotions between men and women at Wal-Mart. Plaintiffs also presented evidence that Wal-Mart relies on subjective criteria to decide on pay and promotions, that those decisions are made by managers exercising largely unchecked discretion, and that managers invested with that authority have engaged in sex stereotyping at Wal-Mart stores across the nation. Together, this evidence raised the question whether Wal-Mart's policies and practices operate to discriminate against women in a manner common to the class. In addition, Wal-Mart's policies and practices prohibit employees from discussing their pay, which further entrenches gender-based disparities by making discrimination exceedingly difficult for individual women to discover or challenge. Under these circumstances, class certification is not only an appropriate mechanism for addressing plaintiffs' claims of employment discrimination – fully contemplated by the class action rules and consistent with Congress' intent in enacting Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Pub. L. No. 88-352, 78 Stat. 253 (codified as amended at 42 U.S.C. § 2000e et seq.) – it is an indispensable one.

Pursuant to Rule 37.6, counsel for amici attests that none of the parties authored this brief in whole or in part and no one other than amici or their counsel contributed money or services to the preparation or submission of this brief.

This Court has recognized that "'broad-scale action against patterns or practices of discrimination'" is "essential" to achieving the purposes of Title VII. EEOC v. Shell Oil Co., 466 U.S. 54, 69 & n.22 (1984) (quoting H.R. Rep. No. 92-238, at 8, 14 (1971), reprinted in 1972 U.S.C.C.A.N. 2137, 2144, 2149), because employment discrimination is a "'complex and pervasive' problem that [can] be extirpated only with thoroughgoing remedies," id. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23 advances these purposes by allowing plaintiffs to aggregate claims and collectively challenge far-reaching discriminatory practices that otherwise might go unaddressed. See infra Part III. Moreover, Congress has recognized that burdensome limitations on Title VII suits, such as Wal-Mart seeks here, may "ignore[] the reality of . . . discrimination" and may be "at odds with the robust application of the civil rights laws that Congress intended." Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act of 2009, Pub. L. 111-2, 123 Stat. 5, § 2(2), codified at 42 U.S.C. § 2005-e note (2009).

Amici agree that the class of female employees at Wal-Mart was properly certified under Rules 23(a) and (b)(2) for the reasons set forth in the Brief for Respondents and do not repeat those arguments here. Rather, this brief highlights three aspects of sex discrimination that plaintiffs' evidence indicates were present at Wal-Mart and that underscore why class treatment of their pay and promotion claims is both appropriate and important.

First, the district court found that evidence presented by plaintiffs in support of class certification demonstrates statistically significant disparities in pay and promotions throughout Wal-Mart that "support an inference of company-wide discrimination" sufficient to satisfy the commonality requirement of Rule 23(a). Dukes v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 222 F.R.D. 137, 188 (N.D. Cal. 2004), reprinted at App. 162a, 281a. Class actions are a traditional and necessary means of addressing such broad-based discrimination claims under Title VII. That is true both in this case and more broadly. Significant disparities persist nationwide between men's and women's wages and their representation in management positions, even when controlled for factors such as experience, employee preference, and occupation type, suggesting that ongoing discrimination is one of the culprits.

Second, evidence presented by plaintiffs indicates that outmoded sex stereotypes influence employment decisions at Wal-Mart and that women are treated as less valued employees than men, regardless of their actual performance. Declarants attested that women were repeatedly told that they should be paid less because they are not breadwinners, that they cannot be effective managers due to their family obligations, and that certain more desirable jobs are "men's work" and off-limits to women. Social science research confirms that such stereotypes can become the basis for employment decisions where an employer delegates unchecked discretion over pay-setting and promotion decisions to local managers utilizing subjective criteria. As a matter of well-established law, subjective decisionmaking practices may be challenged through class actions when the totality of the evidence raises an inference that such practices have resulted in broad-based discrimination. Indeed, class actions are critical in these circumstances to address ongoing sex stereotyping in the workplace that would otherwise go unremedied.

Third, plaintiffs presented evidence indicating that individual women at Wal-Mart face significant barriers in challenging discrimination, including evidence showing that Wal-Mart does not allow its employees to discuss their pay and threatens those who raise questions about pay and promotion decisions. As in many workplaces, these policies and practices make it difficult for women employees even to know when they are being paid less than similarly situated male employees. Retaliation for complaining about discrimination is all too common. The class action mechanism enables women at Wal-Mart and other victims of discrimination to overcome these obstacles, thereby furthering Title VII's purpose of achieving a workplace free from discrimination.

Accordingly, and for the reasons set forth below, the district court's class certification order should be affirmed.

ARGUMENT

I. SEX DISCRIMINATION IN THE WORKPLACE, AS PLAINTIFFS ALLEGE HERE, REMAINS A SERIOUS NATIONAL PROBLEM THAT IS APPROPRIATELY ADDRESSED BY CLASS ACTIONS.

Plaintiffs presented evidence of pay and promotion disparities at Wal-Mart. They alleged company-wide discrimination and presented statistical evidence that overall, women were paid less and received fewer promotions than men, even though women on average had more seniority and higher performance ratings than their male peers. Company-wide discrimination has long been subject to challenge on a class or collective basis where, as here, the evidence raises the inference that "discrimination was the company's standard operating procedure" – not "isolated or 'accidental' or sporadic." Int'l Bhd. of Teamsters v. United States, 431 U.S. 324, 336 (1977). Such challenges remain necessary to address persistent gender discrimination, both in this case and in the workplace generally.

A. Because cases brought by and on behalf of a class of workers present a more complete picture of the employer's conduct than individual suits, and enable company-wide reforms, they have long played an essential role in promoting Title VII's goal of eradicating discrimination in the workplace. See, e.g., Franks v. Bowman Transp. Co., 424 U.S. 747 (1976) (class action); Teamsters, 431 U.S. 324 (government pattern or practice case). Unfortunately, that goal has yet to be achieved with respect to women's equal pay and equal access to management positions. When Congress enacted Title VII in 1964, women working full time were paid approximately 59 percent of what men were paid, on average. U.S. Census Bureau, Historical Income Tables – People, tbl. P-40, available at http://www.census.gov/hhes/www/income/data/historical/index.html (last visited Feb. 21, 2011). At that time, one third of employers in one study openly maintained "'a double standard pay scale for men and women.'" Deborah Thompson Eisenberg, Shattering the Equal Pay Act's Glass Ceiling, 63 SMU L. Rev. 17, 29 (2010) (quoting 109 Cong. Rec. 9199 (1963) (statement of Rep. Green) (debating passage of the Equal Pay Act)).

Although great strides have been made, the wage gap persists: even today, women working full time are paid only 77 percent of the salaries paid to men, on average. U.S. Census Bureau, Current Population Survey, Annual Social and Economic Supplement, tbl. PINC-05, parts 55 & 109, available at http://www.census.gov/hhes/www/cpstables/032010/perinc/toc.htm (last visited Feb. 23, 2011) (calculations based on 2009 annual median earnings for all male and female full-time workers). Women also continue to lag behind men in management. In 2007, 49 percent of non-managers were women, but women made up only 40 percent of managers. U.S. Government Accountability Office, Women in Management: Analysis of Female Managers' Representation, Characteristics, and Pay 6 (2010), available at http://www.gao.gov/new.items/d10892r.pdf (last visited Feb. 23, 2011).

B. Such large disparities in pay and promotions cannot be dismissed as the result of women's "employment choices" in career and family matters. See, e.g., Br. Amicus Curiae of Pacific Legal Foundation in Support of Petitioner at 26. Authoritative studies conclude that, even after controlling for factors believed to influence pay – including workers' qualifications, personal preferences, job responsibilities, occupation type, and industry – an unexplained earnings gap between men and women remains. See Cheryl Travis et al., Tracking the Gender Pay Gap: A Case Study, 33 Psychol. Women Q. 410, 410-11 (2009) (citing studies). This gap can be fairly attributed to discrimination.

The wage gap emerges as soon as students graduate from post-secondary and graduate school programs and increases over time. In the medical profession, for example, gender disparities between earnings for new female physicians and their male counterparts have increased in the past decade and remain unexplained, even after controlling for medical specialty, hours, and practice type. Anthony T. LoSasso et al., The $16,819 Pay Gap for Newly Trained Physicians: The Unexplained Trend of Men Earning More Than Women, 30 Health Affairs 193, 193 (2011). Similarly, women with MBAs are paid less than men in their first post-MBA job and experience less salary growth thereafter. Nancy M. Carter & Christine Silva, Catalyst, Pipeline's Broken Promise (February 2010), available at http://www.catalyst.org/file/340/pipeline%27s_broken_promise_final_021710.pdf (last visited Feb. 21, 2011) (reporting a wage gap of $4,600 in post-MBA jobs after controlling for factors including prior experience, time since MBA, job level, region, industry, parenthood, and different aspirations). Restricting the availability of class actions will constrain courts' ability to address the type of broad-based discrimination that contributes to disparities in pay and promotion and that is alleged in this case.

C. After evaluating competing expert testimony submitted in connection with plaintiffs' class certification motion, the district court found that the statistical disparities in Wal-Mart's workforce "support an inference of company-wide discrimination in both pay and promotions" sufficient to satisfy Rule 23(a)'s requirement of commonality. App. 281a. Plaintiffs presented evidence that women working at Wal-Mart made 5% to 15% less than similarly situated men, even after accounting for factors such as seniority, turnover, and performance. J.A. 518a. Overall, women were paid $5,000 less than men, even though women on average had higher performance ratings in hourly jobs and more years of employment. J.A. 516-517a. The record also reflects statistically significant shortfalls in promotions of women to in-store management positions. App. 176a; App. 212a; J.A. 479a. And women had to wait significantly longer for promotions than their male counterparts. App. 198a; App. 214a; J.A. 484a.

The statistical evidence proffered by plaintiffs of significant pay and promotion disparities, along with the anecdotal and other evidence they submitted, see infra Part II, supports their claim that women working at Wal-Mart faced the kind of broad-based employer discrimination that this Court has long recognized may be challenged by, or on behalf of, classes of employees under Title VII. See, e.g., Franks, 424 U.S. 747; Teamsters, 431 U.S. 324. Gender discrimination in the workplace resulting in significant pay and promotion disparities remains a systemic problem that continues to demand company-wide responses.

II. SEX STEREOTYPES AND SUBJECTIVE DECISIONMAKING PRACTICES OF THE KIND ALLEGED HERE RAISE QUESTIONS COMMON TO THE CLASS AND UNDERSCORE PERSISTENT BARRIERS TO GENDER EQUALITY.

Certification of the class in this case is consistent with well-established legal principles recognizing that subjective decisionmaking processes that lead to discriminatory results can be challenged on a class-wide basis, and that the question of whether an employer's practices served to discriminate company-wide against a group of employees can be established through a combination of statistical and anecdotal evidence.

This Court, in Watson v. Forth Worth Bank & Trust, 487 U.S. 977, 990-91 (1988), recognized the danger that subjective decisionmaking processes may invite reliance on discriminatory stereotypes. The unfortunate persistence of sex stereotypes in the workplace, see Nevada Dept. of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721, 730 (2003) (quoting Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677, 686 (1973)), underscores the continued importance of class challenges to subjective practices in accomplishing Title VII's goals.

Plaintiffs have alleged that Wal-Mart's company-wide, unchecked subjective decisionmaking regarding pay and promotions led to statistically significant gender disparities by permitting managers to discriminate in making these decisions. Plaintiffs proffered, among other evidence, anecdotes of sex stereotyping that shed light on how Wal-Mart's common practice of subjective decisionmaking may have operated to discriminate against women: managers believed that women are not breadwinners, so they deserved to earn less; women are and should be family caretakers, whose family responsibilities prevent them from assuming greater management responsibility at work; and women can and should only perform certain kinds of work, and should therefore be clustered into certain jobs, with their promotion opportunities correspondingly limited. These anecdotes illustrate how Wal-Mart's subjective practices invited managers to translate the discriminatory stereotype that women have less value in the workplace than men into concrete employment decisions.

A. Research Establishes That Unchecked Subjective Decisionmaking Can Result In Discrimination.

1. This Court has long held that subjective decisionmaking that leads to discriminatory results may be challenged under Title VII as a company-wide practice. See Watson, 487 U.S. at 990-91; see also Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. United States, 433 U.S. 299, 301-02 (1977) (pattern or practice challenge to school district's "relatively unstructured procedures" that vested "virtually unlimited discretion" in "each school principal"). As the Court observed in Watson, leaving personnel "decisions to the unchecked discretion of lower level supervisors" can contribute to inequality by allowing managers to make these decisions based, not on objective criteria, but on "subconscious stereotypes and prejudices." 487 U.S. at 990. Social science research confirms that observation.

Stereotypes operate as cognitive shortcuts that shape how information is perceived, processed, and retained. See Audrey J. Lee, Unconscious Bias Theory in Employment Discrimination, 40 Harv. C.R.-C.L. L. Rev. 481, 482 (2005); Linda Hamilton Krieger, The Content of Our Categories: A Cognitive Bias Approach to Discrimination and Equal Employment Opportunity, 47 Stan. L. Rev. 1161, 1188-89, 1202-04 (1995). They "influence how incoming information is interpreted, the causes to which events are attributed, and how events are encoded into, retained in, and retrieved from memory. In other words, stereotypes cause discrimination by biasing how we process information about other people." Id. at 1199.

Limited oversight of managers' decisions can allow decisions influenced by biases and stereotypes to stand without meaningful assessment or correction. See Barbara F. Reskin & Debra B. McBrier, Why Not Ascription? Organizations' Employment of Male and Female Managers, 65 Am. Soc. Rev. 210, 214 (2000) (stating that informal personnel practices "invite cronyism, subjectivity, sex stereotyping, and bias" and "when organizations allow individuals latitude in selecting managers, supervisors may consciously or unconsciously take workers' sex into account"). Unguided discretion in personnel decisions thus often yields decisions that, in the aggregate, result in significant gender disparities in pay rates and supervisory power. See Tristin K. Green & Alexandra Kalev, Discrimination-Reducing Measures at the Relational Level, 59 Hastings L.J. 1435, 1444 (2008); see also Susan Sturm, Second Generation Employment Discrimination: A Structural Approach, 101 Colum. L. Rev. 458, 460-63 (2001) (discussing how unstructured decisionmaking can exacerbate workplace bias). Using informal recruiting and employee referrals to fill positions can further exacerbate existing sex disparities, because managers select people they feel comfortable with and who share their characteristics. See J.A. 539a; Green & Kalev, supra, at 1444; Julie Chi-hye Suk, Antidiscrimination Law in the Administrative State, 2006 U. Ill. L. Rev. 405, 418 (2006).

Subjective decisionmaking does not inevitably produce discriminatory results. Employers can counter reliance on stereotyping by adopting certain safeguards. "[R]esearch show[s] that formalized personnel systems can reduce reliance on stereotypes and favoritism." Green & Kalev, supra, at 1444; Susan T. Fiske et al., Social Science Research on Trial: Use of Sex Stereotyping Research in Price Waterhouse v. Hopkins, 46 Am. Psychologist 1049, 1051 (1991). Such systems include routinely posting opportunities for advancement, holding decisionmakers accountable for the criteria they use to make personnel decisions, monitoring and analyzing pervasive disparities, and monitoring employees' perceptions of discriminatory barriers to advancement. See, e.g., Green & Kalev, supra, at 1443-44 (describing safeguards implemented in consent decrees). An employer's choice with respect to its personnel systems thus may foster or minimize discriminatory, stereotype-influenced decisionmaking.

2. The record evidence indicates that Wal-Mart utilizes employment practices that social scientists have found to facilitate reliance on stereotypes, including delegation of largely unchecked discretion to managers in pay and promotion decisions and reliance on informal, internal recruiting. As the district court found, Wal-Mart's "Home Office" establishes the minimum starting wage for hourly employees, but grants store managers discretion to depart from these rates. App. 176-77a. Store managers may depart from centrally established rates within a two-dollar per hour range, and are authorized to exceed that, with approval from a higher level of management, for rates more than 6% above the centrally established minimum. Id. Higher-level managers exercise unguided discretion to set specific pay rates for lower-level managers within broad ranges set by the Home Office. Id.

Wal-Mart rarely, if ever, posted job vacancies during the class period, and "the parties agree that subjectivity is a primary feature of promotion decisions for in-store employees." App. 180a. Promotions are granted to employees meeting centrally established minimum criteria on the basis of a subjective "tap on the shoulder" process. App. 181a; accord J.A. 578-80a (employee could never find written information about the Management Training Program and promotions were made before positions were posted). One woman attested that workers must be part of the "informal network versus the formal network" to be successful because Wal-Mart is "a very cli[que]-oriented environment" in which women were referred to as "girls" and "Janie Qs." J.A. 304a. Another woman reported that her manager "ran the store like a boys' club," in which male managers regularly socialized with male hourly workers, leaving her to run the store. J.A. 927a. Another was told by a senior vice president that she would not advance because she did not "hunt, fish, or do other typically-male activities" with the "boys" in the company and was not "a part of the boys club." J.A. 741a; accord J.A. 595a (woman employee was told that promotion was based on "whom you knew, not what you knew").

B. Evidence Of Gender Stereotyping At Wal-Mart Sheds Light On How Subjective Decisionmaking Operated To Discriminate Against Women.

Evidence presented by plaintiffs through numerous declarations that are part of the class certification record in this case illustrates the stereotyping that supervisors at Wal-Mart engaged in, which devalued women and their role in the workforce. Kathleen MacDonald testified that her male department manager told her, "God made Adam first, and so women would always be second to men" and would "never make as much money as men." J.A. 1037a. One manager said that the role of female assistant managers was to give women associates someone to discuss their periods with. J.A. 849a. And the record is replete with instances in which women workers are referred to as "girls," J.A. 840a, J.A. 304a, "housewives," J.A. 1188a, and with degrading language, J.A. 917-18a ("squatter" "someone who squats to pee"). These declarations, which reflect the stereotype that women have less value in the workplace than men, bring the statistical evidence of gender-based disparities "convincingly to life." See Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 339 & n. 20. Plaintiffs submitted evidence that this stereotype was expressed in various ways at Wal-Mart.[2]

---

[2] Amici focus here on the evidence illustrating the ways in which this stereotype operated at Wal-Mart stores. Plaintiffs also submitted evidence indicating that managers at the highest levels held such discriminatory views, that sex stereotypes were evident at company-wide functions,

1. As a general matter, it is well recognized that both women and men are subject to the stereotype that men are breadwinners for their families, while women earn "extra" money. See, e.g., Alison A. Reuter, Comment, Subtle but Pervasive: Discrimination Against Mothers and Pregnant Women in the Workplace, 33 Fordham Urb. L.J. 1369, 1400 (2006); Lindsay R. B. Dickerson, Your Wife Should Handle It: The Implicit Messages of the Family and Medical Leave Act, 25 B.C. Third World L.J. 429, 442 (2005) (book review) (discussing widely held assumption that "secondary source of income exists" for women who work). The stereotype that women do not need to work is rooted in the increasingly untrue assumption that women are not breadwinners supporting their families. See Heather Boushey, The New Breadwinners, in The Shriver Report: A Woman's Nation Changes Everything 36 (Boushey & O'Leary eds. 2009), available at http://www.americanprogress.org/issues/2009/10/womans_nation.html (last visited Feb. 25, 2011) (reporting that, in 2008, about 4 out of 10 mothers were breadwinners, compared with about 1 in 10 in 1967). This assumption underlies the view that men are entitled to higher pay and to managerial, career-track jobs, while women do not "need" managerial jobs or equal pay, because they do not support families on their salaries. See and that Wal-Mart had a uniform corporate culture that reinforced these stereotypes. Br. for Respondents at 15-21. Amici do not repeat that discussion here.

Joan Williams, Toward A Reconstructive Feminism: Reconstructing the Relationship of Market Work and Family Work, 19 N. Ill. U. L. Rev. 89, 113-16 (1998) (explaining the tradition of underpaying women "on the grounds that they are just working for 'pin money,'" while men are viewed as breadwinners).

Record evidence suggests that this stereotype was held by Wal-Mart managers in stores around the country who explained apparent pay disparities between men and women by saying that, for example, men make more because they "are working as the heads of their households, while women are just working for the sake of working." J.A. 1313-14a; accord J.A. 1188a (retail is for housewives who just need to earn extra money). Similarly, managers expressed the view that male workers are entitled to more pay because they support their families. E.g., J.A. 1256a (men are paid more because they have families to support); J.A. 1001a (man was given a raise because he had a family to support); J.A. 1114-15a (District Director of Operations explained gender pay disparity, discovered accidentally when male employee left his W-2 in an office, by saying that male employee "supports his wife and his two kids"); J.A. 1037a (men would be paid more because they were the heads of household). As for promotions, a District Manager told one woman that he had selected a male employee for promotion instead of her because the male employee "deserved the position" as the "head of his household," while an unmarried woman, "did not 'need' the position." J.A. 709a.

2. "Family responsibility discrimination," or caretaker discrimination, is similarly rooted in outmoded notions that women are not valuable workers. It occurs when employers deny opportunities to women, particularly pregnant women and mothers, based on the assumption that they are caretakers first and workers second and that they therefore will not be able to perform in demanding supervisory positions. A great deal of "discrimination that mothers experience in the workplace stems from stereotypes and negative assumptions about mothers' competence and commitment to the job that have nothing to do with their actual behavior." Joan C. Williams & Stephanie Bornstein, The Evolution of 'FReD': Family Responsibilities Discrimination and Developments in the Law of Stereotyping and Implicit Bias, 59 Hastings L.J. 1311, 1326 (2008). Where women are believed to be unwilling to travel, commute, or work irregular hours because of perceived caregiving commitments, they are deprived of equal opportunities for management positions, especially where there is no formal way to assess their interest in such positions. See Joan C. Williams & Stephanie Bornstein, Caregivers in the Courtroom: The Growing Trend of Family Responsibility Discrimination, 41 U. S. F. L. Rev. 171, 177-78 (2006); Vicki Schultz, Life's Work, 100 Colum. L. Rev. 1881, 1894-96 (2000). Related to this is the belief that women should stay home and raise a family, rather than pursue a career. See Joan C. Williams, The Social Psychology of Stereotyping: Using Social Science to Litigate Gender Discrimination and Defang the "Cluelessness" Defense, 7 Emp. Rts. & Emp. Pol'y

J. 401, 406 (2003) (discussing Bailey v. Scott-Gallaher, Inc., 480 S.E.2d 502, 503 (Va. 1997) (employer fired a woman after she gave birth because her "place was at home with her child")); see generally Diana Burgess & Eugene Borgida, Who Women Are, Who Women Should Be: Descriptive and Prescriptive Gender Stereotyping in Sex Discrimination, 5 Psychol. Pub. Pol'y & L. 665 (1999).

The record contains numerous examples of Wal-Mart managers openly espousing the belief that women should stay home and raise a family. Julie Donovan was told by a senior vice president that she "should raise a family and stay in the kitchen," rather than advance her career; when she complained to her supervisor, she was told to "shrug it off." J.A. 741a; accord J.A. 1175a (manager told woman she should resign and "find a husband to settle down with and have children to relieve [her] work-related stress"; reporting this to superior made no difference); J.A. 337a (women "should be home barefoot and pregnant"). Melissa Howard – the only female store manager in her district – was asked by a supervisor to resign from her management position because a woman should not be running a Wal-Mart store and she "needed to be home raising [her] daughter." J.A. 931a; accord J.A. 1031-32a (woman who expressed interest in an overnight supervisor position was told by a manager that she could not have the job because she had children); J.A. 845a (store manager said all women should be "at home with a bun in the oven").

Women were assumed not to be able or willing to relocate – one of the company's criteria for being promoted – because of their families, App. 181a, even when that was not the case. Geanette Bell was told by her Store Manager that she would not "want to be in the Management Training Program," despite her inquiries, because she would "not want" to relocate her children. J.A. 641-43a. Another woman was told that a man in her store with less experience was asked to enter the Management Training Program because "he's a man, he doesn't have a family." J.A. 973a. A third was told that the one-year anniversary of her son's death "would not be a good time" for her to enter management training. J.A. 651-52a. And a fourth was told that it would be better to wait until after her pregnancy to enroll in a management training course. J.A. 1108-09a.

3. The stereotype that women are not competent at "male work" also underlies assumptions that women are less valuable workers. This stereotype posits that men are more competent at traditionally male work, including jobs involving physical labor and managerial skills. Williams, The Social Psychology of Stereotyping, supra, at 407, 412 & n.18 (summarizing findings of empirical social psychologists).

By contrast, "women's work" refers to labor traditionally performed by women for no pay in their own homes, or for low pay with few benefits in other peoples' homes. The "occupations . . . in which women work tend to be low paid," in part because "the skills women perform in those jobs have been undervalued" and "are hardly seen as skills at all. Women doing work that resembles domestic work are doing what comes 'naturally.'" Rosemary Hunter, A Feminist Response to the Gender Gap in Compensation Symposium, 82 Geo. L. J. 147, 151-52 (1993). Paradigmatic examples include cleaning and caretaking. In the retail sector, this stereotype can appear in the belief that women are suited only to certain jobs, such as cashier, and to certain departments, such as ladies' clothing, limiting opportunities for advancement. Within departments or stores, it can determine the tasks assigned to workers. Cf. Green & Kalev, supra, at 1448 (noting that, even within the same occupations, women are more likely than their male counterparts to "hold the least valued jobs").

Record evidence suggests that such stereotypes contributed to gender segregation within Wal-Mart and limited women's opportunities. One woman reported that a Store Manager explained that he always assigned women Assistant Managers to Softlines "because that's what women know." J.A. 689-90a; accord J.A. 637-38a (female employee stuck in Cosmetics while men were repeatedly promoted to departments she had expressed interest in, such as Paper Goods and Chemicals). Within departments, women were "required to clean and stock," while "the boys working alongside" them were not. J.A. 674a; J.A. 1188a (store manager specified that a woman should be hired to clean employee lounge and restrooms).

Declarants stated that their expressed interests in rotating through traditionally male domains were dismissed by managers who said that women should not or could not obtain positions in those departments. When Sheila Hall asked to work in hardware, her manager responded by saying, "you're a girl, why do you want to be in Hardware?"; a male co-worker told her that hardware was a "man's job" that women should not do. J.A. 839-41a. Sales associate Alix McKenna, when passed over for a promotion in Sporting Goods for a man with less seniority, was told "You don't want to work with guns." J.A. 1073a. Others were told that women could not do certain jobs at Wal-Mart. See J.A. 1128-29a (manager "needed a man in the job" in Sporting Goods); J.A. 949a (management position in Electronics required heavy lifting and was a "man's job"), J.A. 1110a (lifting furniture as manager of Domestics was a man's job), J.A. 754a (retail is tough, not for women); J.A. 604-05a (told she needed experience unloading trucks, a man was hired who had no such experience); J.A. 656a (supervisors rarely allowed women to unload trucks). Dannette Brown Ballou was actively discouraged by her managers from working in the hardware, automotive, sporting goods, meat, produce, receiving and unloading, and Tire and Lube departments, with comments such as the produce department "needed men because of the lifting of heavy boxes of fruit and women could not do the work" or "what do you know about sporting goods?" J.A. 669-70a.

Segregation in stereotypically "women's" departments at Wal-Mart was pervasive: women were more than 90% of sales associates in infant-toddlers, domestic goods, health and beauty aids, jewelry, hosiery, and ladies sportswear, and they were 30% or fewer of those employed in sporting goods, hardware, meat, maintenance, produce, or security departments. J.A. 486-487a

As illustrated above, plaintiffs presented substantial anecdotal evidence of sex stereotyping at Wal-Mart. The statistical evidence, see supra, Part I.C, found by the district court to "support an inference of company-wide discrimination in both pay and promotions" for purposes of commonality, App. 281a, suggests that Wal-Mart managers acted in accord with the discriminatory stereotypes class members personally encountered. See Teamsters, 431 U.S. at 339 n.20 (looking to similar evidence in collective action challenging discrimination). Together, this evidence fairly raises the question, common to the class, whether Wal-Mart's subjective decisionmaking practices allowed managers throughout the company to translate the discriminatory view that women are not of equal value in the workplace into concrete personnel decisions, rendering class certification appropriate in this case.

III. SYSTEMIC BARRIERS TO INDIVIDUAL ACTIONS REINFORCE THE APPROPRIATENESS OF A CLASS ACTION TO CHALLENGE THE KIND OF DISCRIMINATION ALLEGED IN THIS CASE.

Major obstacles frequently prevent individual women from going to court to challenge discrimination in pay and promotions. The evidence submitted by plaintiffs about Wal-Mart provides a textbook example of how such obstacles operate. For example, evidence was presented of subjective decisionmaking, a pay secrecy policy, and job segregation, all of which operated to make it difficult for a female employee to know whether a similarly situated male employee was being treated differently. The class action mechanism of Rule 23 allows individual women employees to overcome these and other barriers by joining together and presenting systemic evidence of discrimination.

A. Individual Employees Face Difficulties In Learning About Pay Discrimination.

The record indicates that pay practices utilized by Wal-Mart ensured that employees knew little about their peers' salaries and were not well positioned to draw conclusions about disparities.

1. Plaintiffs submitted evidence that subjective, discretionary pay decisions were common practice at Wal-Mart. See supra Part II.A.2. In the absence of "an established compensation system," employees frequently remain in the dark about the decisionmaking process, and "records of the reasons underlying pay decisions rarely exist." Eisenberg, supra, at 50. Information about wages and any rationale for disparities between employees' wages lies directly, and often exclusively, with the employer. If an employee learns of pay disparities at all, it is likely through "information suggestive of discrimination that trickles in piecemeal, in anecdotal fashion, through the sharing of experiences with colleagues." Deborah L. Brake & Joanna L. Grossman, The Failure of Title VII as a Rights-Claiming System, 86 N.C. L. Rev. 859, 891 (2008).

2. Plaintiffs also presented evidence that Wal-Mart maintains a pay secrecy policy, which operated to deter discussions of pay. J.A. 1054a (female assistant manager learned a newly hired male assistant manager made $6,000 more than she was paid, but "had always been told [she] would be fired for discussing salary issues so [she] never discussed this pay difference with anyone for fear that [she] might lose [her] job"); accord J.A. 1036-37a ("[I]t is against Wal-Mart policy to discuss pay."). Women employees reported learning of pay differences only through word-of-mouth or by sheer accident. See, e.g., J.A. 1073-74a (female employee learned, when a male employee confided in her, that he had received a more generous raise, although both had received identical promotions and had worked in the same departments); J.A. 1036-37a (female employee realized that she received a lower rate of pay because "many male associates [at her store] brag[ged] about their pay"); J.A. 1114a (female assistant manager discovered that a less-experienced male assistant manager's salary was $10,000 more than hers when someone found his misplaced W2 and gave it to her).

These practices can limit employees' ability to uncover discrimination. Employees frequently have little or no information about their co-workers' wages and salaries. Employer pay scales are often confidential and, in many workplaces, explicit rules and workplace social norms forbid disclosure of pay. See H.R. Rep. No. 110-237, at 7 (2007) (House Report on the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act of 2007); Leonard Bierman & Rafael Gely, "Love, Sex and Politics? Sure. Salary? No Way": Workplace Social Norms and the Law, 25 Berkeley J. Emp. & Labor L. 167, 168, 171 (2004). One third of private sector employers have rules prohibiting employees from discussing pay with their co-workers. Id. at 168; Rafael Gely & Leonard Bierman, Pay Secrecy/Confidentiality Rules and the National Labor Relations Act, 6 U. Pa. J. Lab & Emp. L. 121, 125 (2003) (reporting results of online survey). In a recent survey of private and public sector employees, 50 percent of respondents, and 61 percent of private sector employees, reported that discussing pay was prohibited or discouraged in their workplace. Only 27 percent of those surveyed reported that pay information was public. Institute for Women's Policy Research, Press Release: Pay Secrecy and Paycheck Fairness (November 2010), available at http://myopenworkplace.com/wp-content/uploads/2010/11/PressRelease_PaySecrecy_16Nov2010.pdf (last visited Feb. 23, 2011). And labor cases confirm that many employers maintain formal or informal policies prohibiting discussions of compensation.[3]

Even when discussion of pay is not explicitly prohibited by an employer, an informal "code of silence" surrounding pay in many workplaces poses a substantial practical barrier to gaining information about coworkers' compensation. Bierman & Gely, supra, at 175. The difficulty in learning about coworkers' pay rates is heightened for new employees, who typically lack the knowledge of workplace culture and the informal connections with coworkers that allow some workers ultimately to penetrate the code of silence regarding compensation.

Without access to data for pay practices across an organization, it is difficult for individuals to recognize or confirm discrimination. Social psychology research explains that, as a result, "people are more likely to hypothesize nondiscriminatory reasons for individual disparities and less likely to perceive discrimination." Brake & Grossman, supra, at 891-92. This is a manifestation of a well-documented "minimization bias," in which targets of discrimination resist perceiving and acknowledging it as such. See Deborah L. Brake, Retaliation, 90 Minn. L. Rev. 18, 25-28 (2005); Jonah Gelbach et al., Passive Discrimination: When Does It Make Sense to Pay Too Little?, 76 U. Chicago L. Rev. 797, 841 & n.173 (2009).

[3] Examples of such policies include rules explicitly prohibiting discussions of wages, e.g., NLRB v. Vanguard Tours, Inc., 981 F.2d 62, 66 (2d Cir. 1992); Jeanette Corp. v. NLRB, 532 F.2d 916, 918 (3d Cir. 1976), a broad confidentiality policy that could be construed to cover discussions of wages, Cintas Corp. v. NLRB, 482 F.3d 463, 465-66 (D.C. Cir. 2007), manager statements that employees could not discuss wages, NLRB v. Main Street Terrace Care Ctr., 218 F.3d 531, 534 (6th Cir. 2000), Wilson Trophy Co. v. NLRB, 989 F.2d 1502, 1511 (8th Cir. 1993), and a prohibition against opening paychecks on the work site, id. at 1510.

Relatedly, unless an employer actually cuts an employee's pay, the decision to grant her a particular salary is seldom experienced as adverse, unlike a firing or a refusal to hire an employee. Pay discrimination often occurs not because a female employee is denied a raise, but because male employees receive larger raises. "Having received a pay increase, the female employee is unlikely to discern at once that she has experienced an adverse employment decision." Ledbetter v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., Inc., 550 U.S. 618, 650 (2007) (Ginsburg, J., dissenting), superseded by statute, Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act of 2009, Pub. L. No. 111-2, 123 Stat. 5, codified at 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5. When an employee does not recognize a pay decision as adverse, she is less vigilant for indicators of discrimination. For example, she is unlikely to seek an explanation from the employer, evaluate it for pretext, or make particular note of any comments suggestive of stereotyping or bias. This further obscures individuals' ability to identify and challenge pay discrimination.

Pay discrimination cases confirm the significant barriers employees face in gathering the information that suggests discrimination. For example, Lilly Ledbetter learned that her male counterparts earned higher salaries via an anonymous letter. See Eisenberg, supra, at 64 n. 331; see also Ledbetter, 550 U.S. at 649-650 (Ginsburg, J., dissenting) (describing barriers to discovering "[c]ompensation disparities"); Boumehdi v. Plastag Holdings, LLC, 489 F.3d 781, 785 (7th Cir. 2007) (plaintiff learned of disparities only when she "accidentally left her pay stub in plain view, and some of her colleagues began laughing and making negative remarks about her pay"); Goodwin v. General Motors Corp., 275 F.3d 1005, 1008-09 (10th Cir. 2002) (plaintiff learned of a pay disparity when a printout listing her own and co-workers' salaries mysteriously appeared on her desk); McMillan v. Mass. Soc'y for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, 140 F.3d 288, 296 (1st Cir. 1998) (plaintiff discovered a pay disparity when her salary and the salaries of other department heads were published in a newspaper).

3. Plaintiffs also submitted evidence of workplace segregation, whereby women were concentrated in departments stereotypically viewed as "women's work" and excluded from those departments viewed as "men's work." See supra Part II.B.3. Workplace segregation exacerbates the problem of inadequate information, because women concentrated in one part of an employer's workforce tend to compare their treatment and pay only with the treatment and pay of other women with whom they work.

See Brake & Grossman, supra, at 892-93 (describing the "generalized tendency" of employees to use same-gender comparisons to evaluate the fairness of their pay, leading women to expect lower pay and men to expect high pay, and emphasizing that tendency means the very fact of widespread discrimination against women can make it less likely that women will perceive discrimination).

B. The Fear Of Retaliation Leads Employees To Remain Silent About Discrimination Of Which They Are Aware.

Plaintiffs presented evidence that women complaining of discrimination at Wal-Mart faced the prospect of retaliation, despite Wal-Mart's "Open Door" policy that purported to allow employees to share concerns without repercussions. One woman who worked at Wal-Mart for twenty-five years reported that a representative from the company's Home Office told her and other female employees who made complaints of sex and race discrimination, "Don't bother using your quarter to call us. I can fire you, without taking any steps, for using the open door." J.A. 973-74a; accord J.A. 693a ("I realized that the Open Door policy at Wal-Mart was a façade and resulted only in retaliation.").

As this Court recognized in Crawford v. Metro. Gov't of Nashville & Davidson County, the "[f]ear of retaliation is the leading reason" why many victims of pay and other discrimination "stay silent." __ U.S. __, 129 S. Ct. 846, 852 (2009) (quoting Brake, supra, at 20). This fear is well-founded. People who challenge discrimination against them are often branded as hypersensitive troublemakers. See Brake & Grossman, supra, at 904 n. 236. This problem is especially serious for employees who wield little power in their workplace, such as low-wage female workers. See Brake, supra, at 36.

Those experiencing discrimination are especially apt to remain silent where an employer has a policy discouraging or prohibiting discussion of wages. Because such policies may lead employees to fear retaliation if they complain of discrimination based on wage disclosures, they can have a "chilling effect" on employees, NLRB v. Vanguard Tours, Inc., 981 F.2d 62, 67 (2d Cir. 1992), or be "coercive," NLRB v. Main Street Terrace Care Center, 218 F.3d 531, 538 (6th Cir. 2000), and in certain circumstances have been deemed an "unfair labor practice" under the National Labor Relations Act, see, e.g., Gely & Berman, supra, at 126-128 (discussing cases).

Employer retaliation sends a chilling message to others in the workplace and suppresses future challenges to discrimination by other individuals. See, e.g., Thompson v. N. Am. Stainless, LP, __ U.S. __, 131 S. Ct. 863, 868 (2011) (asserting that fear of retaliation operates to "dissuade[] [employees] from engaging in protected activity"). Low-wage workers are particularly vulnerable to the threat of retaliation, both because they are more likely to live paycheck-to-paycheck and thus less able to absorb the impact of a job loss, and because, to the extent they work in low-skilled jobs, their employer may perceive them as easily replaceable.

C. The Small Stakes Of Many Claims Hinder Individual Challenges To Employer Discrimination.

For low-wage workers in particular, while the stakes in discrimination cases are high to the individual, they are low in absolute terms. For example, the average claim for an hourly Wal-Mart worker is estimated to be approximately $1,100. J.A. 475a. This can make it prohibitively difficult to find legal representation for these claims, particularly against large employers who have vast legal resources at their disposal. Individuals who proceed pro se are nearly "three times more likely to have their cases dismissed [than those with counsel], are less likely to gain early settlement, and are twice as likely to lose on summary judgment." Laura Beth Nielsen et al., Individual Justice or Collective Legal Mobilization? Employment Discrimination in the Post Civil Rights United States, 7 J. Empirical Legal Stud. 175, 188 (2010). Moreover, the relatively small dollar amounts of many discrimination claims can lead individuals to determine that the costs of challenging discrimination, in the form of social stigma and possible employer retaliation, simply are not worth the potential benefits of proceeding.

D. Class Actions Are Intended To Overcome These Obstacles To Redressing Discrimination.

In the absence of class actions, the barriers women at Wal-Mart and elsewhere face in bringing discrimination claims would threaten to undermine Title VII's reliance on private attorneys general to challenge discrimination and achieve the purposes of the statute. Thus, employees seeking to vindicate their Title VII rights have routinely done so on a class basis. See, e.g., Lewis v. City of Chicago, __ U.S. __, 130 S. Ct. 2191 (2010); Int'l Union, United Auto., Aerospace & Ag. Imp. Workers of Am. v. Johnson Controls, Inc., 499 U.S. 187 (1991); Watson, 487 U.S. 977; Albemarle Paper Co. v. Moody, 422 U.S. 405 (1975). This Court has likewise recognized the importance of class actions in removing structural barriers to litigation in other contexts. See Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 617 (1997); Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797, 809 (1985); Deposit Guar. Nat'l Bank v. Roper, 445 U.S. 326, 339 (1980).

Class actions remove obstacles to systemic discriminatory practices in the following ways:

Collection of pay information. When employees obtain information about their pay and the pay of some comparator coworkers sufficient to initiate a class action, the class mechanism subjects discriminatory pay practices and organization-wide pay data to judicial scrutiny. This is so regardless of whether each employee has been able to gather sufficient information to determine whether she has suffered pay discrimination or whether the individuals had reason to suspect at the time that the decisions were discriminatory.

Protection against retaliation. A particular virtue of class actions for challenging discrimination is that the class nature of the proceeding substantially reduces the likelihood of retaliation and the social costs of coming forward with complaints of discrimination. See, e.g., Mullen v. Treasure Chest Casino, LLC, 186 F.3d 620, 625 (5th Cir. 1999) (approving the district court's presumption that class members still working for the employer might be unwilling to sue individually for fear of retaliation); Simmons v. City of Kansas City, 129 F.R.D. 178, 180 (D. Kan. 1989) (certifying class of police officers challenging discrimination in part to minimize the likelihood of retaliation against individual class members). Class membership gives those individuals who want to speak out against discrimination support and protection, as they are less likely to be individually targeted when they are one of many challenging an employer's practice.

Aggregation of small claims. Class actions make it economically possible for individuals and attorneys to pursue claims for relatively small amounts of backpay that would otherwise go unremedied. Amchem Prods., Inc., 521 U.S. at 617 (noting that the "'policy at the very core of the class action mechanism is to overcome the problem that small recoveries do not provide the incentive for any individual to bring a solo action prosecuting his or her rights'") (quoting Mace v. Van Ru Credit Corp., 109 F.3d 338, 344 (7th Cir. 1997)); Phillips Petroleum Co., 472 U.S. at 809 ("Class actions . . . permit the plaintiffs to pool claims which would be uneconomical to litigate individually"); Deposit Guar. Nat'l Bank, 445 U.S. at 339 ("Where it is not economically feasible to obtain relief within the traditional framework of a multiplicity of small individual suits for damages, aggrieved persons may be without any effective redress unless they may employ the class action device."). This aggregation of claims conserves judicial resources, allowing a pay practice affecting many individuals to be tested in a single proceeding, rather than numerous proceedings, and avoiding inconsistent results.

The obstacles to individual enforcement actions present in the workplace generally and illustrated by the evidence plaintiffs proffered regarding Wal-Mart, threaten to make Title VII's goal of ending employment discrimination merely aspirational. The class action device provides a vehicle for overcoming these obstacles and promotes "the robust application of the civil rights laws that Congress intended." Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act of 2009, 123 Stat. 5, §2(2).

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, the class certification order should be affirmed.

Respectfully Submitted,

INDIVIDUAL STATEMENTS OF INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE

9to5, National Association of Working Women is a national membership-based organization of low-wage women working to achieve economic justice and end discrimination. 9to5's members and constituents are directly affected by disparities in pay compared to their male co-workers, sex discrimination including failure to promote and advancement decisions based on gender stereotypes, the long-term negative effects on their and their families' economic well-being of these pay disparities and discrimination, and the difficulties of seeking and achieving redress for all these issues. Our toll-free Job Survival Helpline fields thousands of phone calls annually from women facing these and related problems in the workplace. The issues of this case are directly related to 9to5's work to end workplace discrimination and our work to promote policies that aid women in their efforts to achieve economic security. The outcome of this case will directly affect our members' and constituents' rights in the workplace and their long-term economic well-being and that of their families.

A Better Balance: The Work & Family Legal Center is a legal advocacy organization dedicated to promoting fairness in the workplace and helping workers across the economic spectrum care for their families without risking their economic security. In particular, A Better Balance is dedicated to advancing laws and policies which seek to strengthen our national and state equal pay and other anti-discrimination laws. As is well-documented in the Walmart case, unfair pay is borne not only of sex discrimination but also maternal bias—this type of bias is one of the most overt forms of discrimination against women in the workplace, often holding them back at work and endangering their long-term economic security. As long as policymakers fail to address these issues, litigation is one of the only remaining avenues to address them and must be pursued.

For 130 years, the American Association of University Women (AAUW), an organization of over 100,000 members and donors, has been a catalyst for the advancement of women and their transformations of American society. In more than 1,000 branches across the country, AAUW members work to break through barriers for women and girls. AAUW plays a major role in mobilizing advocates nationwide on AAUW's priority issues, and chief among them is economic security for all women. Therefore, AAUW supports efforts to ensure pay equity, fairness in compensation, equitable access and advancement in employment, as well as vigorous enforcement of employment antidiscrimination statutes.

The California Women's Law Center (CWLC) is a private, nonprofit public interest law center specializing in the civil rights of women and girls. Established in 1989, the California Women's Law Center works in the following priority areas: Gender Discrimination, Women's Health, Reproductive Justice and Violence Against Women. Since its inception, CWLC has placed a strong emphasis on eradicating sex discrimination in employment. CWLC has authored numerous amicus briefs, articles, and legal education materials on this issue. The Dukes v. Wal-Mart case raises questions within the expertise and concern of the California Women's Law Center. Therefore, the California Women's Law Center has the requisite interest and expertise to join in the amicus brief in this case.

The Coalition of Labor Union Women (CLUW) is America's only national membership organization for all union women based in Washington, DC with chapters throughout the country. Founded in 1974 it is leading the effort to empower women in the workplace, advance women in their unions, encourage political and legislative involvement, organize women workers into unions and promote policies that support women and working families. From its inception CLUW has advocated to strengthen the role and impact of women in every aspect of their lives. CLUW focuses on public policy issues such as equality in employment and educational opportunities, affirmative action, pay equity, national health care, labor law reform, family and medical leave, reproductive freedom, and increased participation of women in unions and in politics. Through its 46 chapters throughout the United States, CLUW members work to end discriminatory laws and policies and practices adversely affecting women through a broad range of educational, political and advocacy activities. CLUW has frequently participated as amicus curiae in numerous legal cases involving issues of gender discrimination. CLUW has provided educational and training programs for many years to educate and inform workers, union leaders and employers about issues of gender equality in the workplace.

The D.C. Employment Justice Center (EJC) is a non-profit organization whose mission is to secure, protect, and promote workplace justice in the D.C. metropolitan area. EJC provides legal assistance on employment law matters to the working poor and supports a local workers' rights movement, bringing together low-wage workers and advocates for the poor. Established on Labor Day of 2000, EJC advises and counsels well over 1000 workers each year on their rights in the workplace. In 2010, more than 40% of the workers served by EJC were women, and a significant number of those claims involved violations of the women's rights through sex-based discrimination in the workplace. It is critically important that all women be afforded a meaningful opportunity to protect their civil rights.

The Feminist Majority Foundation (FMF), a 501(c)(3) non-profit organization founded in 1987, is dedicated to the pursuit of women's equality, utilizing research and action to empower women economically, socially and politically. FMF advocates for full enforcement of Title VII and other laws prohibiting discrimination and advancing workplace equality for women, including in pay and promotions.

Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America, Inc., is the largest women's and the largest Jewish membership organization in the United States, with nearly 300,000 members. While traditionally known for its role in funding health care and other initiatives in Israel, Hadassah also has had a longstanding commitment to the protection of women's rights in the United States. In particular, Hadassah recognizes the need to eliminate wage discrimination and has been a long-time supporter of measures to achieve economic equality and security for women. The availability of class actions to assert claims of discrimination against women in the workplace is necessary to combat such discrimination and bring about real economic equity for women.

Legal Momentum (formerly NOW Legal Defense and Education Fund) has worked to advance women's rights for forty years by using the power of the law and creating innovative public policy. Assuring women's equality in the workplace is central to Legal Momentum's mission. Legal Momentum has litigated cases to secure full enforcement of laws prohibiting sex discrimination, harassment, and retaliation, including Faragher v. City of Boca Raton, 524 U.S. 775 (1998), and has participated as amicus curiae on leading cases in this area, including Burlington Northern & Santa Fe Railway Co. v. White, 548 U.S. 53 (2006), Northern Burlington Industries, Inc. v. Ellerth, 524 U.S. 742 (1998), Oncale v. Sundowner Offshore Services, Inc., 523 U.S. 75 (1998), and Harris v. Forklift Systems, Inc., 510 U.S. 17 (1993).

Legal Voice is a regional non-profit public interest organization that works to advance the rights of all women in Washington, Alaska, Montana, Idaho and Oregon, through litigation, legislation, education and the provision of legal information and referral services. Since its founding in 1978 (as the Northwest Women's Law Center), Legal Voice has been dedicated to protecting and ensuring women's legal rights, including the right to equality in the workplace. Toward that end, Legal Voice has participated as counsel and as amicus curiae in cases involving workplace gender discrimination throughout the Northwest and the country. Legal Voice serves as a regional expert advocating for robust interpretation and enforcement of anti-discrimination laws protecting women.

The National Association of Commissions for Women (NACW) is a non-partisan organization committed to equality and justice for women by increasing the effectiveness of member commissions and serving as their national voice. The NACW has passed several resolutions over the years in support of pay equity for women.

Established in 1955, the National Association of Social Workers (NASW) is the largest association of professional social workers in the world with 145,000 members and 56 chapters throughout the United States and internationally. With the purpose of developing and disseminating standards of social work practice while strengthening and unifying the social work profession as a whole, NASW provides continuing education, enforces the NASW Code of Ethics, conducts research, publishes books and studies, promulgates professional criteria, and develops policy statements on issues of importance to the social work profession.

NASW recognizes that discrimination and prejudice directed against any group are not only damaging to the social, emotional, and economic well-being of the affected group's members, but also to society in general.

NASW has long been committed to working toward the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women. The NASW Code of Ethics directs social workers to "engage in social and political action that seeks to ensure that all people have equal access to the resources, employment, services, and opportunities they require to meet their basic human needs and to develop fully" . . . and to "act to prevent and eliminate domination of, exploitation of, and discrimination against any person, group, or class on the basis of . . . sex." NASW policies support "legislative and administrative strategies that address pay equity and comparable worth initiatives for increasing women's wages....breaking the "glass ceiling," the "Lucite ceiling" for women of color, and the "maternal wall" that affects mothers in the paid labor force..." and "ending sexual harassment and occupational segregation, which clusters women in low-paying, "pink-collar" occupations." NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF SOCIAL WORKERS, Women's Issues, SOCIAL WORK SPEAKS, 367, 370 (8th ed., 2009).

Accordingly, given NASW's policies and the work of its members, NASW has expertise that will assist the Court in reaching a proper resolution of the questions presented in this case.

The National Association of Women Lawyers (NAWL), founded in 1899, is the oldest women's bar association in the country. NAWL is a national, voluntary organization with members in all fifty states, devoted to the interests of women lawyers, as well as all women. Through its members, committees and the Women Lawyers Journal, it provides a collective voice in the bar, courts, Congress and the workplace. NAWL stands committed to ensuring equality in the workplace. NAWL joins as an amicus only to the extent that this brief addresses the general use of the class action vehicle to advance claims of discrimination against women.

The National Campaign to Restore Civil Rights (the Campaign) is a non-partisan movement of more than one hundred civil rights and social justice organizations and individuals working to ensure that our courts protect and preserve equal justice, fairness, and opportunity. The Campaign is interested in Dukes v. Wal-Mart, because this case directly implicates the Campaign's mission to preserve equal justice and defend against the erosion of civil rights protections. Since the beginning of the Civil Rights Movement, class action lawsuits have been an effective and powerful tool for protecting rights and enforcing civil rights laws. From Brown v. Board of Education through the instant case, class action lawsuits have been used to promote civil rights and equal justice. A decision in Wal-Mart's favor will have harmful effects on civil rights and social justice advocates' ability to use litigation to prevent discrimination and promote equality. These effects will be far-reaching and impact many of the Campaign's partner organizations, including racial justice, immigrants', and disability rights organizations, and advocates working on housing, the environment, access to health care, education, employment, and the rights of the aging, women's rights, and the rights of people who are LGBTQ. The Campaign is interested in protecting access to the courts.

The National Committee on Pay Equity (NCPE), founded in 1979, is a coalition of women's and civil rights organizations; labor unions; religious, professional, legal, and educational associations, commissions on women, state and local pay equity coalitions and individuals working to eliminate sex- and race-based wage discrimination and to achieve pay equity. NCPE supports efforts to ensure pay equity, fairness in compensation, equitable access, and advancement in employment, as well as vigorous enforcement of employment antidiscrimination statutes.

The National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW) is a grassroots organization of 90,000 volunteers and advocates who turn progressive ideals into action. Inspired by Jewish values, NCJW strives for social justice by improving the quality of life for women, children, and families and by safeguarding individual rights and freedoms. NCJW's Principles and Resolutions state that "equal rights and equal opportunities for women must be guaranteed" and "discrimination on the basis of race, gender, national origin, ethnicity, religion, age, disability, marital status, sexual orientation or gender identity must be eliminated" and the organization endorses and resolves to work for "employment laws, policies, and practices that provide equal pay for work of comparable worth and equal opportunities for advancement." Consistent with our Principles and Resolutions, NCJW joins this brief.

The National Education Association (NEA) is a nationwide employee organization with more than 3.2 million members, the vast majority of whom are employed by public school districts, colleges and universities. NEA is strongly opposed to employment discrimination, especially discrimination against women in the workplace, and firmly supports the vigorous enforcement of Title VII.

The National Employment Law Project (NELP) is a non-profit organization that advocates on behalf of low income and unemployed workers. NELP believes that work should be a ladder of economic opportunity and a sure path to middle-class financial security. NELP has a long-standing commitment to the enforcement of the nation's civil rights laws, and the use of all tools necessary to vindicate the individual and collective rights of workers, such as women, who are in legally protected classes.

The National Organization for Women Foundation (NOW) is a 501(c)(3) organization devoted to furthering women's rights through education and litigation. Created in 1986, NOW Foundation is affiliated with the National Organization for Women, the largest feminist grassroots organization in the United States, with hundreds of thousands of supporters and contributing members in hundreds of chapters in all 50 states and the District of Columbia. Since its inception, NOW Foundation's goals have included eliminating all forms of sex discrimination in the workplace.

Since 1966, the National Organization for Women Foundation (NOW) NYC has worked to advance the women and girls of New York through public education, grassroots organizing, lobbying, action, and advocacy. Since our inception, NOW-NYC has worked to create a culture where America's most valuable untapped resource- women- can succeed in all realms. NOW-NYC aims to end violence against women, advance women in the workplace, promote reproductive freedom and transform images of women in the media. Our sister organization, The Service Fund of NOW-NYC provides unemployment discrimination clinics.

The Older Women's League (OWL) is a non-profit, non-partisan organization that accomplishes its work through research, education, and advocacy activities conducted through its chapter network. Now in its 30th year, OWL provides a strong and effective voice for the more than 70 million women age 40 and over in America. OWL has long advocated for equality and economic security, and believes that all persons should be free from all forms of discrimination in the workplace, including in pay and promotions.

People for the American Way Foundation (PWAWF) is a nonpartisan citizens' organization established to promote and protect civil and constitutional rights. Founded in 1981 by a group of religious, civic and educational leaders devoted to our nation's heritage of tolerance, pluralism and liberty, PFAWF now has hundreds of thousands of members nationwide. PFAWF has been actively involved in efforts to combat discrimination and promote equal rights, including efforts to protect the rights of women, issues which are directly involved in this case.

Pick Up the Pace is a San Francisco-based non-profit organization whose mission is to identify and eliminate barriers to women's advancement in the workplace, emphasizing the role of law in combating glass ceiling discrimination, cognitive bias, gender stereotyping and work/family conflict. Established in 2005, the organization seeks to raise awareness of cutting edge gender bias issues through public education and legal advocacy as amicus curiae before state and federal courts, including the United States Supreme Court in Thompson v. North American Stainless, Burlington Northern & Santa Fe Railway Co. v. Sheila White, BCI Coca-Cola Bottling Co. v. EEOC, Ledbetter v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company, Inc. and AT&T v. Hulteen.

The Sargent Shriver National Center on Poverty Law (Shriver Center) champions social justice through fair laws and policies so that people can move out of poverty permanently. Our methods blend advocacy, communication, and strategic leadership on issues affecting low-income people. National in scope, the Shriver Center's work extends from the Beltway to state capitols and into communities building strategic alliances. Through its Women's Law and Policy Project, the Shriver Center works on issues related to women's access to high-wage employment. Discriminatory employment policies and practices have a negative impact on women's immediate and long-term employment and economic security. Nondiscrimination in all industries and occupations is vital if women are ever to obtain true economic well-being. The Shriver Center has a strong interest in the eradication of unfair and unjust employment policies and practices that limit women's economic opportunities and serve as a barrier to economic equity.

The Union for Reform Judaism (URJ) includes 900 congregations in North America, encompassing 1.5 million Reform Jews. The URJ comes to this issue out of our longtime commitment to asserting the principle, and furthering the practice, of the full equality of women on every level of life. We oppose discrimination against all individuals, and recognize the need to end sex discrimination in the workplace, including in pay and promotions.

The Washington Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights and Urban Affairs is a non-profit civil rights organization that works to eradicate discrimination by litigating under our nation's civil rights laws. In the Committee's 40-year history, its attorneys have represented tens of thousands of individuals who have experienced discrimination on the basis of their gender, race, national origin, disability and/or other protected characteristic. The Committee's Equal Employment Opportunity Project has successfully prosecuted hundreds of employment discrimination cases, including more than sixty class actions. Although the Project's cases invoke a wide range of civil rights laws, the Project has focused its efforts on enforcing Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. From this extensive employment discrimination and class action litigation history, the Committee has amassed expertise regarding the questions of law and procedure raised in the present matter, and accordingly hopes to assist the Court in resolving these questions.

Wider Opportunities for Women (WOW) works nationally and in our home community of Washington, DC, to help women achieve economic security and equality of opportunity for themselves and their families at all stages of life. Providing equal opportunities for women in the workplace and providing career paths to earning self-sufficiency wages and benefits are key to women's ability to meet the financial needs of themselves and their families. WOW has developed indexes of income needed to cover basic needs at the county level and for different family types and ages to measure that goal. Establishing real opportunities for female employees, creating a workplace free of discrimination and harassment and providing redress for female employees who have been discriminated against are basic values under consideration in this case.

Women Employed is a national organization based in Chicago whose mission is to improve the economic status of women and remove barriers to economic equity. Since 1973, the organization has fought to outlaw pay discrimination, pregnancy discrimination and sexual harassment and to strengthen federal equal opportunity policies and work/family benefits. Women Employed strongly believes that pay discrimination is one of the main barriers to achieving equal opportunity and economic equity for women in the workplace and that class actions are an indispensable tool for eradicating illegal, company-wide employment discrimination.

Women Lawyers of Sacramento ("WLS"), founded in 1962, is the leading women's bar association in the Sacramento Valley of California. WLS supports and encourages every woman lawyer in her career aspirations and helps promote a society that places no limits on where a woman's skills and talent can take her. WLS is dedicated to (1) promoting the full and equal participation of women lawyers and judges in the legal profession, (2) maintaining the integrity of our legal system by advocating principles of fairness and equal access to justice, (3) improving the status of women in our society, and (4) advocating for equal rights, reproductive choice, equal opportunity and pay for women, and current social, political, economic, or legal issues of concern to its members. WLS is premised on the belief that women deserve equal rights, respect, and opportunities in the workplace and society at large. To that end, WLS has a strong interest in the present case, since the Court's decision will have wide-ranging impacts on women nationwide who suffer discrimination in the workplace, including their ability to bring claims and obtain effective relief. The decision will also affect the status of women in society and their ability to achieve equality in the workplace.

Women's City Club of New York (WCC) supports the rights of all disadvantaged people to seek redress through all possible avenues. The class action lawsuit is an important way for individuals to seek justice. Denying them the creation of the class is tantamount to denying them access to justice as they will not be able to afford the cost or time involved in pursuing individual claims. If the Supreme Court reverses the Ninth Circuit decision to allow the class action to proceed, it would not only adversely affect female employees at Wal-Mart. It would hereafter deal a broad blow to women and other victims of discrimination. The WCC cannot be silent about such profound consequences.

The Women's Law Center of Maryland, Inc. is a nonprofit membership organization established in 1971 with a mission of improving and protecting the legal rights of women, particularly regarding gender discrimination, sexual harassment, employment law and family law. Through its direct services, including an Employment Law Hotline, and advocacy, the Women's Law Center seeks to protect women's legal rights and ensure gender equality in the workplace.

The Women's Law Project (WLP) is a non-profit public interest law firm with offices in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Founded in 1974, the WLP works to abolish discrimination and injustice and to advance the legal and economic status of women and their families through litigation, public policy development, public education and individual counseling. Throughout its history, the WLP has worked to eliminate sex discrimination, bringing and supporting litigation challenging discriminatory practices prohibited by federal civil rights laws. The WLP has a strong interest in the proper application of the law to ensure equal treatment in the workplace.

ARGUMENT 5

I. SOCIAL SCIENCES IN GENERAL, AND SOCIOLOGY IN PARTICULAR, PROVIDE SYSTEMATIC AND SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH METHODOLOGIES FOR ANALYZING INDIVIDUAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL BEHAVIOR, AND SHOULD BE CONSIDERED ALONG WITH OTHER SOURCES OF EVIDENCE TO INFORM LEGAL ANALYSIS 5

A. Social Sciences Use Rigorous Scientific Methods 5

B. Sociologists Make Causal Arguments in Limited Circumstances and with Great Methodological Care, Using Aggregate Data and Case Studies to Form Testable Hypotheses about New Cases 6

C. Given the Established Social Science About Corporate Culture and Effective Mechanisms for Limiting Discretion (Which Can Lead to Bias), Well-Done Case Studies that are Methodologically Valid and Which Draw on the Large Body of Social Science Research to Inform Hypotheses about Particular Cases Should be Considered by the Courts 9

D. "Social Framework Analysis" is Not a Sociological Method, but a Rather a Legal Concept that is Actively Debated in Law Reviews, but the Court should assess the Underlying Social Science Methods that Dictate When and How Aggregate Data can Inform Rigorous Case Studies 11

II. ORGANIZATIONAL CULTURES, BOTH FORMAL AND INFORMAL, MAY INFLUENCE MULTIPLE DISCRETIONARY DECISION-MAKERS TO ADOPT COMMON VALUES AND NORMS THAT SHAPE THEIR BEHAVIORS, WITHIN AND APART FROM CORPORATE POLICIES 14

A. Corporations May Use Strategies to Proactively Create and Promote Corporate Cultures that Embody Corporate Identity and Shape Individual-Level Conduct 15

B. Corporate cultures may arise informally through interactions among employees 15

C. The Extent to Which Corporate Culture (Either Formal or Informal) Influences Individual Decision-Making Depends on the Strength of Formal and Informal Cultures as Well as the Degree of Discretion that Corporate Policies Permit 16

III. SOCIAL SCIENCE RESEARCH SHOWS THAT EMPLOYMENT POLICIES AND PRACTICES THAT ALLOW UNCHECKED MANAGERIAL DISCRETION CAN LEAD TO BIASED DECISION-MAKING, WHILE POLICIES AND PRACTICES THAT PLACE LIMITS ON DISCRETION CAN REDUCE THE LIKELIHOOD OF BIAS 17

A. Corporate Policies and Practices that Cede Decision-Making to Individual Managers without Central Oversight or Accountability Mechanisms Predictably Permit Biased Decision-Making 17

B. Social Science Research Has Identified Organizational Policies and Practices that Place Subjective Discretion within Formal Parameters that Reduce the Risk of Biased Decisions without Eliminating Necessary Managerial Judgment 21

1. Formalized personnel practices tend to decrease gender disparities 22

2. Accountability Tends to Reduce Bias in Subjective Personnel Decisions 27

C. Monitoring Tends to Decrease Gender Disparities 29

BRIEF OF AMICI CURIAE AMERICAN SOCIOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION AND THE LAW AND SOCIETY ASSOCIATION IN SUPPORT OF RESPONDENTS

STATEMENT OF INTEREST[1]

The American Sociological Association (ASA) is the national professional and scholarly association of sociologists in the United States. Founded in 1905, the organization has more than 14,000 members, including most sociologists holding doctoral degrees from accredited universities. ASA publishes nine leading peer-reviewed journals.
